To these should be added statutes passed afterwards up to the Revolution, when the colonies were specially named. Shute v. Harder, 1 Yerg. 5-8, 24 Am. Dec. 427. In a note appended by Mr. Justice Cooper, formerly a member of this court, to the case of Glasgow v. Smith, supra, we are furnished with a list of English statutes which have been held in force in this state. 1 Overt. 169. In the case of State v. Miller, supra, the opinion is expressed by Mr. Justice Freeman arguendo that our Code of 1858 repealed all English statutes previously in force here, as well as all prior acts of our own legislature, and that of North Carolina, with certain exceptions stated in § 41, of that body of laws. It is unnecessary to deal with the proposition here as to the English statutes, because the learned justice conceded that although the English statutes were thus repealed as statutes, yet the rules or principles contained in them remained as principles of our common law. What was said in Box v. Lanier, 112 Tenn. 393, 417, 64 L.R.A. 458, 79 S. W. 1042, by Mr. Chief Justice Beard, on the same subject, in approving State v. Miller, must be understood with the same qualification set down in the case last named. Of course, where the Code contains anything contrary to a common-law rule, whether expressed in an ancient act of Parliament or in the decision of a court or judge, the Code provision prevails.

The common-law rule as to Sunday has been expressly recognized in this state in the case of Styles v. Harrison, 99 Tenn. 128, 63 Am. St. Rep. 824, 41 S. W. 333, in which a judgment against Styles, fixing a fine upon him, and purporting to authorize his confinement in the workhouse, was held void because rendered on Sunday. Moreover, the unbroken custom of this state for more than one hundred years, setting apart and treating Sunday as a nonjudicial day, L.R.A.1915D.

would establish its character as such, as a part of the common law of this state, even apart from and in the absence of the decisions referred to: "If a question arise concerning the existence of a general custom, it is to be tried by the justices, because every general custom is a part of the common law." 9 Bacon, Abr. 551; Bro. Trial, pl. 143; Hayward v. Kinsey, 12 Mod. 573.

We have no statutes changing the common-law rule, except as indicated below. To make this clear, it is necessary that we briefly set forth the early statutes of North Carolina and of this state, forbidding the pursuit of common vocations on Sunday, and the service of process on that day, and the provisions of our Code thereon.

The North Carolina act of the year 1741 (chapter 14, § 2) reads: "That all and every person and persons whatsoever shall, on the Lord's day, commonly called Sunday, carefully apply themselves to the duties of religion and piety; and that no tradesman, artificer, planter, laborer, or other person whatsoever, shall, upon the land or water, do or exercise any labor, business, or work of their ordinary callings (works of necessity and charity only excepted), nor employ themselves either in hunting, fishing or fowling, nor use any game, sport, or play, on the Lord's day aforesaid, or any part thereof, upon pain that every person so offending, being of the age of fourteen years and upwards, shall forfeit and pay the sum of 10 shillings proclamation money."

The foregoing provisions were subsequently re-enacted in 1803 (chapter 47), and were later carried into our Code in § 1723 (Shannon's Code, § 3029), and § 1724 (Shannon's Code, § 3031), except the injunction to "apply themselves to the duties of religion and piety."

The North Carolina act on the subject of executing process on Sunday was Acts 1777, chap. 8, § 6: "It shall not be lawful for any sheriff, or other officer, to execute any writ or other process upon a Sunday, or upon any person attending his duty at a muster of the militia, or any election, . . . or any person summoned to attend as a witness, or a juror; and all such service of process is hereby declared illegal and void, unless the same be issued against any person or persons for treason, felony, riot, rescous, breach of the peace, or upon an escape out of prison or custody, and such process shall be executed at any time or place." Nich. & Car. p. 665.

This was reproduced in our Code, § 2902 (Shannon's Code, § 4623), to this extent: "Actions may be abated by plea of the defendant in the following cases: (1) Where the process is issued or served on Sunday, except in the cases prescribed in §§ 4529-4533."

The sections last cited forbid the issuance of civil process on Sunday, except in certain specified cases.

Criminal process: "Any process, warrant or precept authorized to be issued by any of the judges, justices of the peace, or clerks of the court in any criminal prosecution on behalf of the state may be issued at any time and made returnable at any day of the term." Code, § 5031 (Shannon's Code, § 6991).

Section 5033 (Shannon's Code, § 6993): "Arrests by officers for public offenses may be made on any day at any time."

Section 5034 (Shannon's Code, § 6994): "Arrests by private persons for felony may be made on any day and at any time."

Section 4128 (Shannon's Code, § 5940): "He [a justice of the peace] is authorized, however, to try any cause that may be brought before him at any time, and at any place, within the county, unless expressly prohibited by some positive provision of this Code."

This language is perhaps sufficiently broad to enable a justice of the peace to try a case on Sunday; at least, a criminal case; but we are not sure of this. As the question does not arise in the present case, we do not determine it. However, if this language does not give the authority, there is nothing in our Code giving any authority to any judicial officer to try a case on Sunday. Certain it is there is no authority to justify any judicial officer higher than a justice of the peace to perform an act of the kind. It may be that the preservation of the public peace would sometimes require justices of the peace to try and commit persons brought before them on Sunday; but, as stated, as to all other judicial officers the common law remains practically unchanged by our Code and statutes.

We are referred, by the learned assistant attorney general in his brief, to sundry cases wherein it is held that a verdict may be lawfully rendered on Sunday. The decided weight of authority seems to favor this contention. Some of the cases place this rule on the ground that the reception of a verdict is merely a ministerial act, and others on the ground that it is a work of necessity or charity in the way of relieving the jury from confinement, and permitting them to go their way and employ Sunday in such manner as may seem to them enjoyable or beneficial. Parsons v. Lindsay, 3 L.R.A. 658, and note (41 Kan. 336, 13 Am. St. Rep. 290, 21 Pac. 227); Henderson v. Reynolds, 7 L.R.A. 327, and note (84 Ga. 159, 10 S. E. 734); State v. Keatine, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 844, and note (130 La. 434, 58 So. 139).

The great weight of authority, however, is that a judgment cannot be rendered on Sunday, nor any judicial act performed thereon. Charging the jury is a high judicial function, and it cannot be lawfully exercised on Sunday. We so determine, not only in obedience to law, but with deep satisfaction as well, since Sunday is one of the most useful institutions we possess. Aside from its religious aspects, it is a noble police regulation, greatly tending to preserve and increase the public health, affording, as it does, a stated time for rest from labor, and a means of physical and mental recuperation. On those who also regard and use it as a religious institution it bestows an additional benefit. When the laws protecting this institution are disregarded by our trial judges, we can only reverse their judgments, and remand their cases for another trial, and that course will be followed in the present case.

Such action on the part of the trial judge does not fall within the protection of Acts 1911, chap. 32, concerning the duty of appellate courts to overlook mere irregularities and technical objections. To hold court on a day not permitted by law is as fatal as performing the same act at a place other than that prescribed by law.

Reversed and remanded.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

CORNELIUS DORR, JR., Respt.,

v.

LEHIGH VALLEY RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

Carrier — injury to passenger through emergency brake.

1. A railroad company is liable for injury to a passenger by the sudden application of the emergency brake to avoid striking a traveler at a highway crossing if it was negligent in failing to warn him or to observe his danger in time to avoid the accident without resort to the emergency brake.

Same — negligence of traveler — effect.

2. The negligence of a person in peril on a highway crossing, which requires the application of the emergency brake to the train, does not relieve the carrier from liability for consequent injury to a passenger if the necessity of resort to such brake was due to its own negligence.

Same — reliance on traveler's avoiding danger.

3. A railroad company cannot avoid liability for injury to a passenger by the application of the emergency brake to avoid collision with a traveler on a highway crossing on the theory that it might assume that he would leave the track in time to escape injury, if he was manifestly unconscious of the approach of the train.

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, reversing a judgment of a Trial Term for Onondaga County granting a nonsuit in an action brought to sudden start, stops, jerks, jolts, and curves.

As to the liability for injuries to passenger inside car from sudden starting or stopping of car or train, see note to Ottinger v. Detroit United R. Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 225.

The present note is concerned merely with the question whether actionable negligence may be predicated on the sudden stopping of a train in an emergency, including the effect upon that question of any antecedent negligence on the carrier's part in creating the emergency. The note, therefore, excludes cases where, though the injury may have been immediately caused by the sudden stopping of the train in an emergency, the charge of negligence does not rest upon that act, but upon some other act or negligence; e. g., the failure to furnish a passenger a seat, or the starting of the train before the passenger was seated.

A carrier is not liable for injuries to a passenger resulting from the sudden stopping of a train in an emergency not due to the carrier's negligence.

The only negligent act alleged in Todd v. Missouri P. R. Co. 126 Mo. App. 684, 105 S. W. 671, was in suddenly stopping the train on which the passenger was riding, with unusual violence, to avert the peril of a collision with an approaching freight train. It was held that there could be no negligence in doing this, and therefore the passenger could not recover.

A carrier is not liable for injuries caused by the sudden stoppage of a train through the application of the air brake to avoid a collision when the train ran upon a side track through an open switch. Yaeger v. Southern California R. Co. 5 Cal. Unrep. 870, 51 Pac. 190. It was left to the jury to say whether or not the leaving of the switch open was in itself negligence, or whether the carrier was at fault in leaving it open.

recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Kenefick, Cooke, Mitchell, & Bass, for appellant:

There is proof that the train came to a sudden stop with a violent jolt, but there is no proof of any accident, and therefore no basis for the application of the rule of res ipsa loquitur.

Moore, Carr. p. 774; Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 188, 52 L.R.A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, 59 N. E. 925, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 336; Benedick v. Potts, 88 Md. 52, 41 L.R.A. 478, 40 Atl. 1067, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 484; Robinson v. Consolidated Gas Co. 194 N. Y. 37, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 586, 86 N. E. 805; Nelson v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 25 App. Div. 535, 50 N. Y. Supp. 63, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 523; Need-

by the sudden application of the brake just after the train had started, to save another passenger, who, in attempting to board the train, fell and was in danger of going under the wheels, in the absence of any knowledge on the part of one who stopped the train, of the position of the person in the car who was injured by the stop.

A street car company is not liable for an injury resulting from the sudden stopping of a car in order to avoid a collision with a wagon which has been suddenly driven across the track without fault on the part of the company. Cleveland City R. Co. v. Osburn, 66 Ohio St. 45, 63 N. E. 604, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 626.

So, the sudden increase in the speed of an electric car while crossing over the track of a steam railroad, in order to avoid being hit by a train on such road, is not negligence. Corkhill v. Camden & Suburban R. Co. 69 N. J. L. 97, 54 Atl. 522, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 563. It is stated that there was no want of care in either conductor or motorman in attempting the crossing, but that every reasonable precaution was taken and no warning was given that a train was coming. It is further stated that as to the conduct of the motorman in turning on full power when confronted with the imminent danger of a collision, his act evidenced complete presence of mind and the exercise of the highest degree of care. Recovery for injuries by the lurch of the car, caused by the increased speed, was therefore denied.

An instruction to the jury to the effect that a verdict must be found for the plaintiff in an action against the railway company for personal injuries unless it were found that the checking of the train was the result of some unforeseen or unavoidable accident beyond the control of the carrier's agents was held to correctly state the law in Coudy v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 85 Mo. 79.

Sudden stopping in the operation of street cars is a more necessary and usual incident than in the operation of steam or electric railways not on the streets of a city. The mere fact that such a car has stopped suddenly is not negligence, and the carrier is not liable therefor where the stopping is to avoid collision.

The material facts in this case are entirely undisputed. No possible construction of these facts can justify the inference of negligence upon the part of the defendant.

Supp. 609; Gan-guzza v. Anchor Line, 97 App. Div. 352, 89 N. Y. Supp. 1049.

If there was no antecedent negligence on defendant's part which created or contributed to create the emergency which necessitated the application of the brakes, the defendant is not liable, notwithstanding the alleged injury to the plaintiff.

Thus, in Timms v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 183 Mass. 193, 66 N. E. 797, an action for personal injuries from being thrown from the rear platform of an electric street car, upon the car being slackened very suddenly, it is stated that "there is nothing in the evidence to show that there was any defect in the car or in the condition of the rails, and jerks in the motion of street cars are not unusual. As to the apparent sudden stopping, there is nothing to show that it was not caused by some obstacle appearing suddenly in front, such as a horse and wagon or a person on foot, attempting to cross the track a short distance ahead." This language is quoted with approval in McGann v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 199 Mass. 446, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 506, 127 Am. St. Rep. 509, 85 N. E. 570. Citing these cases, the court in Craig v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 207 Mass. 548, 93 N. E. 575, an action for injuries alleged to have been received by reason of the jerking and sudden starting of the closed electric car upon which the plaintiff was about to take his seat, states that if the constant stopping and starting were to avoid collision with persons or carriages crossing ahead of the car, or because of cars ahead of it, there was no negligence on the part of the motorman.

A statute involved in Southern R. Co. v. Brooks, 125 Tenn. 260, 143 S. W. 62, 1 N. C. C. A. 252, made it the duty of a railroad company, upon discovering a person, animal, or other obstruction upon the road, to sound the alarm whistle, put down the brakes, and employ every possible means to stop the train and prevent an accident; and provided that upon failure to observe these precautions, the company should be liable for all damages. In the case at bar the train of the carrier was being brought to a stop at a station, and was running at about 2 miles an hour, when a boy suddenly appeared upon the track some 10 feet ahead L.R.A.1915D.

of the pilot of the engine, whereupon the emergency brake was used, causing the entire train to lurch backward and recoil with unusual force and violence. It will be seen that the carrier was placed in a position of conflicting duties,—that to the passenger and that to the boy. In discussing the question the court says that the duty of railroad companies to safely carry and deliver their passengers is paramount to all others, and that it was not the intention of the legislature in the statute above referred to, to modify or abrogate this duty in favor of trespassers. Continuing it is stated: "We are of the opinion, and hold, that the precautions prescribed should not be observed, when to do so would imminently imperil the lives or limbs of passengers and employees on the train. The object of the statute is primarily to protect human life, and to construe it otherwise than here done would in many cases defeat that object. But less than imminent danger of serious bodily injury or death to those on the train will not excuse observance of the precautions, especially when the life of one on the road is involved. In other words, the probability of slight injuries to passengers and employees, or even serious injuries growing out of unusual positions which they may at the time occupy, will not excuse observance of the statute for the protection of the life of a trespasser. . . . Humanity and public policy require that the duties of railroad companies to their passengers and to persons upon their roads be reconciled as far as possible to do so. No hard and fast rule can be made applicable to all cases. Each case where conflict presents itself must be determined upon its own particular facts. Where compliance with any particular provision of the statute, under attending conditions and environments, such as the speed of the train, a steep descending grade, a trestle or bridge, or other circumstances of peculiar danger, will imperil the lives or limbs of passengers with reasonable certainty, it should not be done. But where the place of the impending collision is level, or the speed of the train reasonably slow,

Messrs. Thomson, Woods, & Woods, for respondent:

Defendant was bound to exercise all the care and skill which human prudence and foresight could suggest; this care extends to all measures necessary and proper to secure the safety of the train and passengers, as well as the management of the train itself.

App. Div. 265, 55 N. Y. Supp. 308; Maverick v. 8th Ave. R. Co. 36 N. Y. 378, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 93; Coddington v. Brooklyn Cross-town R. Co. 102 N. Y. 66, 5 N. E. 797; Levine v. Brooklyn, Q. C. & Suburban R. Co. 134 App. Div. 606, 119 N. Y. Supp. 315; Palmer v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 120 N. Y. 170, 17 Am. St. Rep. 629, 24 N. E. 302; Keegan v. 3d Ave. R. Co. 34 App. Div. 297, 54 N. Y. Supp. 391, affirmed without opinion in 165 N. Y. 622, 59 N. E. 1124; Loudoun v. 8th Ave. R. Co. 162 N. Y. 380, 56 N. E. 988.

If the defendant had used that degree of care and skill in the management and operation of the train which the law required of a carrier towards its passengers, the in-or other conditions exist from which no great danger to passengers will ordinarily follow, or can be anticipated with reasonable certainty, usual conditions being considered, the statute must be observed; especially in favor of human life. And in the event of a collision in the case first stated there will be no liability for injuries done persons or property upon the road, and in the latter there will be none to passengers upon the train. Neither the common law nor the statute requires impossibilities of railroad companies, or makes them liable for damages for acts which they are required by law to do. Their agents in cases of this kind are compelled to determine their duty, and to decide between the conflicting interest of passengers and trespassers instantly and without reflection,—in many cases a most difficult thing to do; and when this discretion is exercised upon reasonable grounds and in good faith, it must be considered, and is entitled to much weight in determining whether there was negligence, and consequent liability, upon the part of the company."

The question has sometimes assumed the form of what is an emergency which calls for an emergency stop.

The fact that a passenger on a street car, who has given the signal to stop, has got down on the running board of the car, ready to alight, does not justify an emergency stop for fear she may step down. Sheppard v. New York City R. Co. 56 Misc. 839, 107 N. Y. Supp. 553.

The fact that a conductor in charge of a street car had been assaulted and stabbed by a negro passenger and was bleeding profusely, as a result of which there was considerable confusion on the car, does not justify such a sudden stoppage of the train as to increase the hazard of the passengers. Willis v. St. Joseph R. Light, H. & P. Co. 111 Mo. App. 580, 86 S. W. 567. It is stated that although there was a necessity for stopping the cars, it should have been accomplished in a reasonable, prudent, and speedy manner, and not with such violence as to increase the hazard of the passengers; L.R.A.1915D.

that it was the duty of the carrier to act so as to avoid danger to its passengers, and not to create a new source of peril.

In making emergency stops, the engineer is not bound to anticipate that a passenger will be in a place of peril.

Thus, the engineer of a freight train containing cattle, the shippers of which are riding in the caboose, who discovers while between stations a fire in one of the cars, is justified in bringing the train to a stop as soon as is consistent with safety to the passengers while in the caboose, and his use of the speediest means to accomplish that purpose, although it necessarily results in more or less severe jolting, cannot be regarded as such negligence as to charge the railway company with liability for injuries resulting to a passenger standing on the platform of a caboose, of whose presence in that place he had no knowledge. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. James, — Kan. —, 100 Pac. 641. The emergency stop was used instead of the service stop, and the time thereby saved being slight, it was argued that the more gradual method would have answered the purpose as well as the abrupt one that was employed, and that the lurch of the caboose that caused his fall was due to the unnecessarily sudden application of the brake, which therefore constituted actionable negligence. It was further claimed in this case that the manner of announcing the fire by the conductor of the train caused the passenger great fear, so that he ran out upon the platform and was in this position of peril; but it was held as a matter of law that there was no negligence in making the announcement as it was made.

But if the emergency is created through the negligence of the carrier, it is liable for such injuries. DORR v. LEHIGH VALLEY R. Co.

So the cases cited above, holding that there is no liability for a sudden stop in an emergency not created by the carrier's negligence, are at least implied authority for the proposition that there is a liability in case of an emergency created by the carrier's negligence.

The happening of an accident which, in the usual and ordinary course of things would not happen with proper care, raises a presumption of negligence, and casts the burden on the defendant of explaining the accident, so as to relieve itself from liability if it can.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of the defendant. The plaintiff, while a passenger on a train of the defendant, was severely injured in the knee by reason of the sudden application of the emergency brake by the engineer. The shock threw the plaintiff against the seat in front of him with great violence. The brake was applied as the train approached a highway crossing at grade, to avoid striking an old man who was attempting to cross the tracks at that point, but who was nevertheless struck by the train and killed. If the use of the brake for this purpose involved no negligence on the part of the persons operating the train, at or about the time of the accident, of course the defendant could not be held liable for the injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff by the violent stop; as, for example, if, in order to avert destructive collision with a sudden landslide immediately in front of the locomotive, the engineer had been compelled to check the movement of the train at all hazards. In the present case, however, the contention of the plaintiff is that the use of the emergency brake as it was used only became imperative because of the previous negligence of the engineer or fireman, or both, in failing seasonably to observe the approach of the old man who was killed, so that the train might have been stopped and his life saved without having recourse to such violent means of stopping it. The accident occurred at Preston Hill crossing on the defendant's line between Camden and Canastota, about a quarter of a mile south of Camden. There were no gates at the crossing, nor was any flagman stationed there. The engine whistle was sounded about half way between Camden station and the crossing; the evidence is conflicting as to whether or not the engine bell was rung. Whatever signals were given it is tolerably certain that they were not observed by an old man named Durr, who was seen by the fireman to be moving slowly toward the tracks as the train approached the crossing. He attracted the attention of the fireman by the slowness of his gait. "He was pushing a lawn mower in front of him," says the fireman, "and was going very slowly, with a rake or something on his shoulder."

Still further on in his testimony the fireman tells us: "He appeared to be old and feeble. I watched him. I did not see him look up. I can't say that I saw him indicate in any way that he realized the approach of our train. I said nothing to the engineer then. We both approached this crossing; he coming slowly and we continuing at our same speed."

The witness had previously said that the train was not then traveling more than 10 miles an hour. As it neared the crossing the fireman, perceiving that the old man was going right on, shouted to the engineer to stop. The engineer up to this time had not seen Durr at all. The warning came too late. The emergency brake was then promptly and vigorously applied, but not in time to save the old man's life.

As has already been suggested, the defendant was not responsible for the resulting injury to the plaintiff, whose knee was badly hurt by impact with the seat in front of him, unless there was some negligence leading up to the use of the brake in this manner. We think that the jury might readily find such negligence in the delay of the fireman to warn the engineer that there was a man in danger ahead. The fireman said he saw Durr when he was an eighth of a mile distant. Durr was then between the tracks of the Rome, Watertown, & Ogdensburg Railroad (which ran parallel with those of the Lehigh at this point) and the tracks of the defendant. He was approaching the latter, apparently oblivious of the presence of any train thereon, yet the fireman allowed the train to run at least 500 feet further before he gave any cautionary warning to the engineer, who testifies that he applied the brake as soon as he heard the cry of the fireman, and it brought his engine to a stop within three car lengths, 150 or 160 feet. These facts certainly warrant the inference that prompt action on the part of the fireman, such as the situation obviously called for, would have resulted in checking the onward movement of the train without any such shock as actually occurred, and perhaps in time to have saved the old man's life.

Upon the evidence in this record it might well be inferred that the old man's death was due in part to his own carelessness; but his contributory negligence would not affect the plaintiff's right of action as a passenger to recover on account of the defendant's negligence so far as it resulted in injury to him. Nor is it necessary to invoke the rule which requires a common carrier to exercise the highest degree of care in the conveyance of passengers to support a recovery by the plaintiff in this case; ordinary care demands that the railroad operatives managing the locomotive drawing a passenger train shall instantly do everything in their power to avoid running down a person in obvious peril upon the track ahead.

It is argued that negligence cannot be predicated of the fireman's omission to notify the engineer of Durr's presence near the track sooner than he did because it has been held that an engineer is not bound to stop his train the moment he sees a person upon the track, but may assume at least in the first instance that he will leave the track in time to escape injury. (citing O'Brien v. Erie R. Co. 210 N. Y. 96, 103 N. E. 895). That statement, however, is not correct in respect to a person who is manifestly unconsciously moving into greater danger by every step he takes.

that the plaintiff was entitled to have the jury pass upon the question whether the defendant exercised due care toward him as a passenger on the occasion of this accident. The order of reversal should therefore be affirmed, with costs in all courts, and there should be judgment absolute against the appellant upon its stipulation.

Ordered accordingly.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

RE ESTATE OF CARMINE D'ADAMO, Deceased,
GIOVANNI D'ADAMO, Appt.

Executor and administrator — relative of foreign subject.

1. A resident brother of a resident foreigner is entitled to administer upon his estate under a statute providing that administration in case of intestacy must be granted to the representatives of decedent entitled to succeed to his personal property who will accept same, in the following order: Husband or wife, child, father, mother, brothers,—where those having priority to him under the statute are nonresidents and therefore disqualified.

Consul — right to administer.

2. The statutory provisions for administration, of the state where a citizen of a foreign country dies, are not superseded by a provision of a treaty between that country and the Federal government that, in the event of any citizen of either country dying without will in the territory of the other, the consul of the nation to which the deceased may belong shall so far as the laws of each country will permit, pending the appointment of an administrator, take charge of his assets, and, moreover, have the right to be appointed as administrator of such estate; and therefore a consul has no prior right of administration over a resident brother of decedent who is first in order of right under the laws of the state.

A PPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme

Note. — As to jurisdiction and power of consul to administer estates, see notes to Telefsen v. Fee, 45 L.R.A. 496, and Re Ghio, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 549. The right of a non-resident to act as administrator is considered in the note to Re Mulford, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 341.

Court, Fourth Department, affirming an order of the Surrogate's Court for Jefferson County denying a petition for the revocation of letters of administration granted to the Italian consul on the estate of Carmine D'Adamo, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Gilbert S. Woolworth, for appellant:

By the provisions of New York law the petitioners, D'Adamo and Fred W. Mayhew are entitled to letters of administration.

Lathrop v. Smith, 24 N. Y. 417; Re Wilson, 92 Hun, 321, 36 N. Y. Supp. 882; Re Lowenstein, 29 Misc. 722, 62 N. Y. Supp. 819; Butler v. Perrott, 1 Dem. 9; Re Campbell, 123 App. Div. 212, 108 N. Y. Supp. 281, affirmed in 192 N. Y. 312, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 606, 85 N. E. 392.

The treaty with Italy does not entitle the Italian consul to letters of administration herein.

The most-favored nation clause in the treaty with Italy does not entitle the Italian consular officers to demand whatever privileges may be accorded consular officers under the convention of March 20, 1911, between the United States and Sweden.

A treaty giving to foreign consuls the right of administration on the estates of their nationals dying intestate in the United States would be void in that respect as being in excess of the constitutional powers of the treaty-making authority and a violation of the rights reserved to the states under the Constitution.

Messrs. Countryman, Nellis, DuBois, & McDermott, for respondent:

Neither appellant, as brother of intestate, nor Fred W. It is within the exercise of the treaty-making power to provide for the administration or intervention in the administration of the estates of foreign subjects by consuls.

The most-favored nation clause of the treaty with Italy entitled the Italian consul to be appointed administrator on the estates of Italian subjects dying intestate, that right being granted to the Swedish consul under the treaty of Sweden with the United States.

The provisions of article XIV. of the Swedish treaty, as extended under the favored nation clause of the Italian treaty, authorizing the appointment of consuls as administrator, is the "supreme law of the land" and supersedes the state laws on the same subject.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Carmine D'Adamo, a citizen and subject of the Kingdom of Italy, died in this state in December, 1912. His residence was in the town of Le Ray in the county of Jefferson. He left a wife, a child, a father, and a mother, who resided in Italy. He left a brother, Giovanni, a resident of New York. Letters of administration upon his estate were granted by the surrogate to the Italian consul. Thereafter Giovanni D'Adamo and one Fred W. Mayhew, the treasurer of Jefferson county, joined in a petition that the letters granted to the Italian consul be revoked, and that the petitioners be appointed administrators in his stead. This application was denied by the surrogate, and the order was affirmed at the appellate division. The county treasurer has acquiesced in that decision. The brother, Giovanni D'Adamo, alone appeals.

The case presents two questions: The one as to the interpretation of the statutes of our own state; the other as to the interpretation of treaties between the United States and foreign nations. The first question is whether, under the Code of Civil Procedure as it stood in June, 1913, when the order under review was made, the brother of the dead man had the right of administration. The second question is whether the treaty between the national government and Italy, construed in connection with a later convention with Sweden, has taken the right away.

1. It is urged in support of the surrogate's decree that because the decedent's brother was not entitled to share in the estate, he was not entitled to administer upon it. The decedent left a wife and an infant child in Italy. His entire estate belongs to them. They are not qualified to act as his administrators. The brother, under the law as it stood when letters were refused to him, and as it stands today, is qualified to act, unless his lack of interest in the estate disqualifies him. We think that it does not.

The law which was in force when this proceeding was determined by the surrogate, and which will remain in force until September 1, 1914, was § 2660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by chapter 403 of the Laws of 1913.* We think that the proper construction of that section is established by the case of Lathrop v. Smith, 35 Barb. 64, id. 24 N. Y. 417. That case construed a section of the Revised Statutes (2 Rev. Stat. p. 74, § 27), which was later incorporated as § 2660 into the Code of Civil Procedure (Laws 1893, chap. 686). Some slight verbal changes were made at that time in the process of revision. Whether these changes of form effected a change of meaning is a question in respect of which there has been a conflict of decision in the courts below. Re Wilson, 92 Hun, 318, 36 N. Y. Supp. 882; Re Campbell, 123 App. Div. 212, 108 N. Y. Supp. 281; Re Wolff, 161 App. Div. 255, 146 N. Y. Supp. 495; Re Lowenstein, 29 Misc. 722, 62 N. Y. Supp. 819; Re Seymour, 33 Misc. 271, 68 N. Y. Supp. 638; Re Patten, 80 Misc. 482, 142 N. Y. Supp. 452. We hold that the meaning remained the same, and that the case of Lathrop v. Smith, supra, is applicable to § 2660 of the Code as it was to the Revised Statutes. We content ourselves with stating our conclusion in this respect, because of amendments which have this year been adopted by the legislature. By chapter 443 of the Laws of 1914, which will take effect on September 1, 1914, § 2660 of the Code of Civil Procedure has become § 2588, and radical changes have been made in it. The result of these amendments will be to establish a new rule hereafter. Discussion of the reasons for our construction of the old rule would, therefore, serve no useful purpose. Confining ourselves to the statute as it read before the amendment of this year, we hold that unless a treaty stands in the way, the brother, Giovanni D'Adamo, is entitled to the grant of letters.

2. This brings us to our second question:

* § 2660. When entitled to letters of administration.

Administration in case of intestacy must be granted to the relatives of the deceased entitled to succeed to his personal property, who will accept the same, in the following order:

1. To the surviving husband or wife.
2. To the children.
3. To the father.
4. To the mother.
5. To the brothers.

Is there any treaty provision that confers a prior right on the Italian consul? By article 17 of the Consular Convention of 1878 between the United States and Italy, "the respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls and consular agents, as likewise the consular chancellors, secretaries, clerks, or attachés, shall enjoy in both countries, all the rights, prerogatives, immunities and privileges which are or may hereafter be granted to the officers of the same grade, of the most favored nation." [20 Stat. at L. 732.]

It is said by the Italian consul that the Consular Convention of 1911 between the United States and Sweden, confers upon Swedish consuls the right to administer, to the exclusion of all other persons, upon the estates of their nationals dying in the United States, and it is insisted that under the most favored nation clause a like privilege must be held to be enjoyed by the representatives of Italy. We must therefore determine whether the convention with Sweden, properly construed, confers upon the representatives of that government the exclusive right asserted.

The extent to which our local law of administration has been displaced by foreign treaties has been, for some years, an unsettled question in this state. The representatives of Italy and of other nations at first based their pretensions upon article 9 of the Argentine treaty of 1853 (10 Stat. at L. 1009), which gave to the consular officers of the respective countries the right "to intervene in the possession, administration, and judicial liquidation of the estate of the deceased, conformably with the laws of the country, for the benefit of the creditors and legal heirs."

The effect of that treaty was the subject of conflicting decisions, both by the surrogates' courts and the appellate division in this state, and by courts of other states. Re Logiorato, 34 Misc. 31, 69 N. Y. Supp. 507; Re Fattosini, 33 Misc. 18, 67 N. Y. Supp. 1119; Re Lobrasciano, 38 Misc. 415, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1040; Re Scutella, 145 App. Div. 156, 129 N. Y. Supp. 20; Re Wyman, 191 Mass. 276, 114 Am. St. Rep. 601, 77 N. E. 379; Re Ghio, 157 Cal. 552, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 549, 137 Am. St. Rep. 145, 108 Pac. 516. The question came before the Supreme Court of the United States in Rocca v. Thompson, 223 U. S. 317, 56 L. ed. 453, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207. The supreme court of California sustained the prior right of the public administrator, and refused to issue letters of administration to the Italian consul. 157 Cal. 552. The Supreme Court of the United States upheld the refusal. In reaching that conclusion, the court left open the question whether the Federal government could constitutionally, in the exercise of the treaty-making power, supplant the commonwealth laws regulating the administration of estates. 223 U. S. at page 329. Assuming such a power, the court held that "there was no purpose in the Argentine treaty to take away from the states the right of local administration provided by their laws, upon the estates of deceased citizens of a foreign country, and to commit the same to the consuls of such foreign nation, to the exclusion of those entitled to administer as provided by the local laws of the state within which such foreigner resides and leaves property at the time of decease." 223 U. S. 334.

The court pointed out that the only privilege conferred was one of intervention, and that by this was meant the right "to enter into a proceeding already begun, rather than the right to take and administer the property." In developing this argument Mr. Justice Day, who spoke for the court, said: "Had it been the intention to commit the administration of estates of citizens of one country, dying in another, exclusively to the consul of the foreign nation, it would have been very easy to have declared that purpose in unmistakable terms."

And he cited as instances of such a purpose a treaty with Peru, made in August, 1887 (25 Stat. at L. 1444, art. 33), but terminated in November, 1899, and a convention with Sweden proclaimed in March, 1911, after the decision by the courts of California of the case which he was then reviewing. These observations with reference to the effect of the convention with Sweden are plainly obiter; but they have been seized hold of as supporting the contention that since the adoption of that convention, in March, 1911, the consuls of Sweden, and hence the consuls of Italy, have the exclusive right to administer upon the estates of their respective citizens dying in the United States. It has been so held by the appellate division in this case and by the surrogates' courts in other cases. Re Baglieri, 137 N. Y. Supp. 175; Re Lombardi, 78 Misc. 689, 138 N. Y. Supp. 1007; Re Riccardo, 79 Misc. 371, 140 N. Y. Supp. 606; Re Madaloni, 79 Misc. 653, 141 N. Y. Supp. 323. The contrary has been held in a well-considered opinion by the supreme court of Minnesota. Austro-Hungarian Consul v. Westphal, 120 Minn. 122, 139, 141, 139 N. W. 300.

The language of the treaty which is said to have brought about this sweeping change must be kept before us. It is as follows (Convention between United States and Sweden, June 1, 1910, article 14):

"In case of the death of any citizen of Sweden in the United States or of any citizen of the United States in the Kingdom of Sweden without having in the country of his decease any known heirs or testamentary executors by him appointed, the competent local authorities shall at once inform the nearest consular officer of the nation to which the deceased belongs of the circumstances, in order that the necessary information may be immediately forwarded to parties interested.

"In the event of any citizen of either of the two contracting parties dying without will or testament, in the territory of the other contracting party, the consul general, consul, vice consul general, or vice consul of the nation to which the deceased may belong, or, in his absence, the representative of such consul general, consul, vice consul general, or vice consul, shall, so far as the laws of each country will permit, and pending the appointment of an administrator and until letters of administration have been granted, take charge of the property left by the deceased for the benefit of his lawful heirs and creditors, and, moreover, have the right to be appointed as administrator of such estate.

"It is understood that when, under the provisions of this article, any consul general, consul, vice consul general, or vice consul, or the representative of each or either, is acting as executor or administrator of the estate of one of his deceased nationals, said officer or his representative shall, in all matters connected with, relating to, or growing out of the settlement of such estates, be in such capacities as fully subject to the jurisdiction of the courts of the country wherein the estate is situated as if said officer or representative were a citizen of that country and possessed of no representative capacity whatsoever." [37 Stat. at L. 1487.]

The concluding words of the second paragraph of this article, "and, moreover, have the right to be appointed as administrator of such estate," are said to be adequate, not merely to make the foreign consul eligible for appointment, or to confer a right to administer where no one else has a better right, but to supersede the local law, and to confer a right of administration that is paramount and exclusive. To determine whether that is a sound interpretation of the convention, we must read its language in the light of those international usages which define the functions of consuls; in the light of the respective fields of state and of Federal jurisdiction as disclosed in our diplomatic history; and in the light of the consequences to follow if the local laws are to be thus supplanted. L.R.A.1915D.

Considering, first of all, the mere words of the treaty, aside from extrinsic tokens of the purpose of the contracting parties, we find no expression of an intent that the consul's right to be administrator shall be exclusive, or that it shall supersede prior rights conferred by local law. "So far as the laws of each country will permit," the consul shall have the right, until letters of administration are granted, to take charge of the property of the deceased for the benefit of lawful heirs and creditors. Plainly this right is subordinate to the authority of the states. But the words, "so far as the laws of each country will permit," may fairly be construed as qualifying the whole sentence. The consul is not merely to have the right of temporary intervention; he is to have "moreover" the right, in case of need, to be appointed administrator. But both rights—the right of temporary intervention and the right of permanent administration granted in addition—are to be exercised only "so far as the laws of each country will permit." It is incredible that our government intended that the right of temporary custody for the purpose of preservation should be conditioned by the local laws, and that the larger right of permanent administration should be unconditional and absolute. Full effect is given to the language of the treaty if we construe it as adding the foreign consuls to the list of those eligible as administrators, so as to enable them to administer upon the estates of their fellow citizens when no one having a prior right under the local law is competent or willing to act.

This construction is confirmed when we consider that it harmonizes the function of consuls under the treaty with the function of consuls under established international practice. What that practice is has been stated in decisions and confirmed in declaratory statutes and regulations. The function of consuls is to preserve derelict estates. When their countrymen die in foreign lands it is their duty to step in and guard the stranded property from waste. This right belongs to them, irrespective of express statute or treaty, by virtue of their office. Rocca v. Thompson, 223 U. S. 317, 331, 56 L. ed. 453, 458, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 207; *Carpigiani v. Law Dig. pp. 117, 118; and, particularly, Letter of Mr.

Clay, Secretary of State, to the British Minister, November 12, 1827, and Letter of Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, to Mr. Aspinwall, August 21, 1855, there cited. The custody thus acquired is, however, provisional. It yields to the superior right of legally constituted representatives. If there are such representatives, a consul's function is limited to one of co-operation and intervention. If there are no such representatives, it is his duty, so far as he is able, to administer the estate to the extent of gathering it in and transmitting it to the jurisdiction of the domicile. This much he should do, though the title of administrator be withheld from him. If the title were to be given him, its purpose presumably would be rather to authenticate his powers than to enlarge the occasion for their exercise.

The functions thus defined by usage have been confirmed by statute and regulations declaratory of the existing practice. By § 1709 of the United States Revised Statutes (Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3162), it is provided:

"It shall be the duty of consuls and vice consuls, where the laws of the country permit:

"First. To take possession of the personal estate left by any citizen of the United States, other than seamen belonging to any vessel, who shall die within their consulate, leaving there no legal representative, partner in trade, or trustee by him appointed to take care of his effects.

"Second. To inventory the same with the assistance of two merchants of the United States, or, for want of them, of any others at their choice.

"Third. To collect the debts due the deceased in the country where he died, and pay the debts due from his estate which he shall have there contracted.

"Fourth. To sell at auction, after reasonable public notice, such part of the estate as shall be of a perishable nature, and such further part, if any, as shall be necessary for the payment of his debts, and, at the expiration of one year from his decease, the residue.

"Fifth. To transmit the balance of the estate to the Treasury of the United States, to be holden in trust for the legal claimant; except that if at any time before such transmission the legal representative of the deceased shall appear and demand his effects in their hands, they shall deliver them up, being paid their fees, and shall cease their proceedings."

The Consular Regulations of 1896 (§ 409) provide as follows:

belonging to his countrymen deceased therein. He has no right, as a consular officer, apart from the provisions of treaty, local law, or usage, to administer on the estate, or in that character to aid any other person in so administering it, without judicial authorization. His duties are restricted to guarding and collecting the effects, and to transmitting them, to be disposed of pursuant to the law of the decedent's state. 7 Ops. Atty. Gen. 274. It is, however, generally conceded that a consular officer may intervene by way of observing the proceedings, and that he may be present on the making of the inventory."

The convention with Sweden was intended to confirm the powers thus established by international comity, and to facilitate their exercise. Consuls are to have the right, where the estate is in peril, to intervene at once, and, if other representatives are lacking, they are, moreover, to have the right to be appointed administrators themselves. They are to have this right, not to displace others competent under local law, but the better to fulfil their inherent function as provisional conservators. If there is no qualified relative within the jurisdiction and no one else to whom our law gives the right of administration, the consular representative under this treaty may come forward and demand the grant of letters. This view is in harmony with the English practice as established by Stat. 24 and 25 Viet. chap. 121, § 4. It is in accord with the decision of the supreme court of Minnesota. Austro-Hungarian Consul v. Westphal, 120 Minn. 122, 139, 141, 139 N. W. 300. It is not inconsistent with a decision of the United States district court for California, where the court, while holding the Swedish consul eligible as administrator, found it unnecessary to determine that all others were excluded. Re Holmberg (D. C.) 193 Fed. 260. It makes the phrase, "so far as the laws of each country will permit," equivalent to the phrase, "conformably with the laws of the country," construed in Rocca v. Thompson, supra. And, finally, it maintains the continuity of the purpose, revealed repeatedly in conventions and treaties throughout our history, to subject the rights of consuls to the requirements of local law.

If the convention means more than this, if it was intended to confer upon foreign consuls an exclusive and paramount right, strange consequences must follow. It is not restricted in its operation to the estates of aliens who have died in the United States while temporarily sojourning here, but who have retained a domicile in their native lands. It applies equally to the estates of aliens who have their domicile in the United States. If an alien, settling in New York, were to build up a business, and, marrying, rear a family among us, the respondent would have us hold that his children, citizens of the state, would have to yield the right of administration to a foreign consul. In that view the consul is not merely eligible as administrator, but eligible to the exclusion of everyone else, even the closest relatives of the dead man, and that, too, though the entire estate is located here, and is here to be distributed. We are unwilling to believe that such results were contemplated in concluding this convention. We hold it to be incredible that there has been attached to the consular office a right that exceeds so greatly the occasion and the needs of the consular function. Before adopting a construction that will bring these consequences to pass, we have a right to expect a far plainer manifestation of the will of the national government than any that has been afforded by the language now before us.

The construction which we thus hold to be the true one finds additional confirmation when we consider the respective fields of state and national legislation, and the refusal of the Federal government, as disclosed in our diplomatic history, to trench upon the right of the states to administer the estates of those dying within their territorial limits. We are not required, for the decision of this case, to determine that the treaty-making power may not be so exercised as to qualify that right (Lanfear v. Ritchie, 9 La. Ann. 96; Mager v. Grima, 8 How. 490, 12 L. ed. 1168; Frederickson v. Louisiana, 23 How. 445, 16 L. ed. 577; Re Ghio, 157 Cal. 552, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 549, 137 Am. St. Rep. 145, 108 Pac. 516; Austro-Hungarian Consul v. Westphal, supra); and we express no opinion upon that subject. We find, however, that distinguished Secretaries of State have disclaimed both the existence of such a power and the intent to exercise it. Thus, in 1874, Mr. Fish in a letter to the Turkish minister said: "The estates of decedents are administered upon and settled in the United States under the law of the state of which the decedent was a resident at the time of his death, and on this subject, in the absence of any treaty regulations on the subject, interference in the disposition of such measures as may be prescribed by the law of the particular state in such cases is not within the province of the Federal authorities."

Again, in 1889, Mr. Bayard, in a letter to the American minister in Brazil, considered a decree of the Brazilian government establishing the principle of reciprocity with reference to the administration of the estates of deceased aliens by their consular representatives; and, criticizing the principle of the decree, he said (5 Moore, Int. Law Dig. p. 120): "The government of the United States has no power to establish by treaty provisions such as the above, in relation to Brazilian subjects dying in any of the states of our Union. Each state, under our system, has exclusive jurisdiction over the administration of property of persons, whether foreigners or citizens, dying within its limits. . . . I conclude, therefore, that the United States cannot agree to accept the Brazilian decree, above quoted, as the basis of a reciprocal arrangement with that country: First, because the Federal government has no power to impose such regulations on the states; and, secondly, because the provisions in question, if correctly understood, conflict with provisions which are settled rules of succession as established in all states."

Again, in 1894, the Italian minister at Washington proposed that Italian consuls in the United States be authorized, as were the American consuls in Italy, to settle the estates of deceased countrymen. 5 Moore, Int. Law Dig. p. 122; Rocca v. Thompson, supra, at page 333 of 223 U. S. The Department of State replied that, in view of the fact that the administration of estates in the United States was under the control of the respective states, it was thought that the proposed international agreement should not be made. Other instances of the expression of a like policy are cited in the briefs of counsel. We call attention to these precedents, not as disproving the power of the Federal government, by virtue of its control over our international relations, to enlarge the functions of consuls in the administration of the estates of aliens, but rather as demonstrating the propriety of a construction of the treaty that will avoid the assumption of a power so frequently disclaimed. It is not to be lightly presumed that the government of the nation departed from the precedents of a century, and by an obscure clause in a long and involved article of this convention overturned its settled practice.

We think, therefore, that the convention with Sweden did not create an exclusive right, and that we ought not to treat the dictum in Rocca v. Thompson, supra, as ruling to the contrary. That the learned justice who spoke for the court in that case did not attempt to construe the convention with deliberation or finality may be gathered from the fact that he placed it on a par, for the purpose of his illustration, with a treaty then terminated between the United States and Peru. Treaty of August, 1887;

25 Stat. at L. 1444, art. 33. The latter treaty, however, was plainly not intended to give to consuls a right to administer to the exclusion of the rights of relatives. Its language is: "Until the conclusion of a consular convention, which the high contracting parties agree to form as soon as may be mutually convenient, it is stipulated, that in the absence of the legal heirs or representatives, the consuls or vice consuls of either party shall be ex officio the executors or administrators of the citizens of their nation who may die within their consular jurisdictions, and of their countrymen dying at sea whose property may be brought within their district."

The words which we have italicized demonstrate that even under that treaty there are times when the right of consuls to administer must give way to that of others. The description of the right as exclusive must be regarded as inadvertent.

There arose under the earlier treaty with Peru, similar to the one just quoted, a case which has been referred to in some opinions (see e. g., Re Lobrasciano, 38 Misc. Rep. 415, 421, 77 N. Y. Supp. 1040) as sustaining the exclusive rights of consuls under the treaty with Italy, but which, in our view, far from sustaining a position so extreme, is an apt illustration of the appropriate function of consuls in the administration of estates. The case is stated in Moore on International Arbitrations, vol. 4, p. 4390. One Vergil, a citizen of Peru, while returning from New York to his native land, after a brief sojourn in the United States, died at sea. The captain of the vessel brought his personal effects back to New York and gave them to the public administrator. The Peruvian minister complained that this was a violation of the treaty, which was applicable by its express terms where his countrymen died at sea and their property was afterwards brought within our jurisdiction. An arbitration, under a convention between the two governments, followed, and the commissioners sustained the position of Peru. There is little analogy between such a case and the one at bar. Vergil had never resided in New York, did not die in New York, and did not leave any property in New York. His personal effects were brought back here after his death, though they ought to have been delivered to his representatives in Peru; and the attempt of the public administrator to retain them was viewed as an unlawful assumption of jurisdiction. Hoes v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 173 N. Y. 435, 442, 66 N. E. 119; Re McCabe, 84 App. Div. 145, 82 N. Y. Supp. 180, id. 177 N. Y. 584, 69 N. E. 1126. In L.R.A.1915D.

such a situation the derelict property brought by chance within our own state, after the death of its owner on the high seas, should have been delivered to the Peruvian consul as the provisional conservator, to be by him transmitted to the jurisdiction of the domicile.

In some cases, as for example, Re Baglieri, 137 N. Y. Supp. 175, the right of the foreign consul has been based in part on a treaty between the United States and Paraguay, concluded February, 1859 (12 Stat. at L. 1096). Article 10 of this treaty provides: "In the event of any citizen of either of the two contracting parties dying without will or testament in the territory of the other contracting party, the consul general, consul, or vice consul of the nation to which the deceased may belong, or, in his absence, the representative of such consul general, consul, or vice consul, shall, so far as the laws of each country will permit, take charge of the property which the deceased may have left, for the benefit of his lawful heirs and creditors, until an executor or administrator be named by the said consul general, consul, or vice consul, or his representative."

It is perhaps a sufficient answer to say that this treaty was before the supreme court when it decided Rocca v. Thompson, supra, and, though not mentioned in the opinion, must have been held unavailing to establish an exclusive right in favor of the Italian consul. The words, "so far as the laws of each country will permit," as found in that treaty, must in our judgment, be deemed to qualify the right of the consul general to name an executor or administrator, as well as his right of temporary custody. That they were, apparently, so construed by the supreme court in Rocca v. Thompson, supra, gives confirmation to our view that they had a like range and significance in the convention with Sweden. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the right of Giovanni D'Adamo to letters of administration is prior to that of the Italian consul, and that letters should issue to him accordingly. Since the consul acted as the representative of a foreign government, and under the authority of decisions of the surrogates of this state, he ought not to be charged with the costs of the proceeding.

The order of the Surrogate's Court and that of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and the petition granted, without costs to either party.

J. P. EVANS.

Exemptions — duty to set aside.

1. Under the statutes in this state, it is no part of the duty, nor is it the right, of an officer holding an execution, to select and set apart the judgment debtor's exempt property. Neither is it his duty to advise him as to his right to certain exemptions. The right to claim and select exempt property rests wholly with and can be exercised only by the judgment debtor.

I. Scope of note.

This note deals only with the selection of the exempt property, and not with the right and duty to claim exemptions in general. Cases dealing with such questions as waiver of the right to exemptions, the time in general for making the claim that property is exempt, and the sufficiency of the claim, are excluded. There is, it is apparent, a distinction in many aspects of the question between a selection and a mere claim of exemptions, and this distinction has been constantly borne in mind in compiling the note. In general, cases have been included in which the court has referred to the question before it as one of selection, and those excluded in which the question has been discussed as a mere matter of claim of the exemptions. It is evident that in some instances these terms may have been inaptly used, and therefore cases in which the facts were somewhat similar to those in the note may be found to have been excluded. But, owing to the fact that a selection by the debtor, and not merely a claim of exemptions, is usually required, sometimes expressly by the statute, in case the debtor has more than the number or value of chattels allowed him as exempt, it is not generally possible to say that by the use of the term "selection" the court meant a mere claim. Therefore, the terminology used in discussing the question has some-

Same — duty to claim.

2. Where a judgment defendant, having more property of a certain class than is exempt by statute, desires to claim his exemptions out of the whole, it is his duty to promptly inform the officer holding process, of the particular property selected and claimed as exempt from levy.

Replevin — retention of exempt property — damages.

3. Where only a part of property levied upon is claimed as exempt, a demand by the execution defendant for the return of his exempt property, unaccompanied by any effort to make a selection of a part out of the entire lot, will not, in an action in replevin for possession of the exempt property subsequently selected and claimed, entitle such party to damages against the officer for the detention of such exempt property; the officer making no further de-times been important in determining whether a case should be included.

The note does not include cases dealing merely with the question of selection of a homestead, or of the selection of the exempt property in bankruptcy proceedings; or of the person who can make the selection.

As to right of debtor to assign exemptions or to delegate to another the right to select exempt property, see note to Re National Grocery Co. 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 982.

II. Selection in general.

a. By debtor.

It is well established that the debtor has the right, even where the statute does not expressly so provide, to select the property which he will retain as exempt from attachment or execution, where he has more property of the exempt class in number or value than he is entitled to claim as exempt. This right is also expressly granted by statute in many of the states. The officer, therefore, in levying on the property, must respect the selection by the debtor, if properly made, or he will render himself liable to an action by the debtor. The cases in the note generally recognize, at least inferentially, this right of the debtor to make a selection. The following cases, however, as well as others subsequently cited in this subdivision, expressly uphold the principle that the debtor has the right to make a selection (it being observed, as before stated, that the cases in the note generally recognize this right, and that it is expressly given by statute in many of the states). Noland v. Wickham, 9 Ala. 169, 44 Am. Dec. 435; Ross v. Hannah, 18 Ala. 125; Bray v. Laird, 44 Ala. 295; Brewer v. Granger, 45 Ala. 580; Williamson v. Harris, 57 Ala. 40, 29 Am. Rep. 707; *Behymer v. fense to the action than to resist plaintiff's right to recover damages.

Exemptions — who may claim.

4. The right of exemption is a personal privilege, which, in order to be availed of, must be claimed by the debtor. He is not compelled to take advantage of it. He may let his property go to sale, either by choice or neglect.

Civ. App. —, 173 S. W. 234, holding that in an action by a debtor against an officer for wrongful attachment, the debtor could recover as damages the value of any two horses or mules he might select of those attached; also Ramsey v. Barnabee, 88 Ill. 135, and McClelland v. Barnard, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 118, 81 S. W. 591, discussing the question as to what property can be selected by the debtor.

The fact that the debtor has other property than that claimed by him as exempt is immaterial on the question of his right to claim the exemption; no matter what other property he may have, he has the right to select and claim any particular property up to the limit fixed by law. State use of Codding v. Finn, 8 Mo. App. 261. To a similar effect, see Bray v. Laird, 44 Ala. 295; Williamson v. Harris, 57 Ala. 40, 29 Am. Rep. 707; and Austin v. Swank, 9 Ind. 109.

A debtor is not prevented from claiming as exempt, property in one county seized on execution, because he has property in another county which is not levied on, and which he would have the right to claim as exempt. Baldwin v. Talbot, 43 Mich. 11, 4 N. W. 547.

As to the right of the debtor to make a selection, it was said in Lockwood v. Younglove, 27 Barb. 505: "But where one or more animals or articles of a particular kind, or a particular quantity, in value, L.R.A.1915D.

Messrs. Titus & Carpenter for plaintiff in error.

Mr. A. C. Beeman, for defendant in error:

The evidence was sufficient to justify the finding that there was a demand made by the plaintiff upon the defendant prior to the filing of the suit, and that the defendant refused to release the property which he had levied upon.

out of several kinds, are exempt, and the debtor has a larger number, or quantity in value, as someone must determine which shall be taken and what left, it is but reasonable that the debtor should determine which he will claim as exempt. The statute giving this exemption is for the benefit of families, from motives of public policy, and it has repeatedly been held to confer a personal privilege upon the debtor, the benefit of which he may waive altogether, or insist upon, as he may elect. He may waive his privilege, as to every article but one, and insist upon it as to that article, if it belongs to the kind or class of exempt property. This shows, I think, that the right of choice necessarily belongs to the debtor."

And in Finnin v. Malloy, 1 Jones & S. 382, it was said that "a judgment debtor owning several articles of property, or animals, falling within the description in the statute of exempt property, but greater in number, or exceeding in value, those exempted by the statute, may claim as exempt any number or portion of them to the extent or value specified in the statute; and where there are several articles used together, that answer to the descriptive words in the statute, as 'working tools,' or 'working team,' 'necessary household furniture,' etc., and the same exceed in value the sum stated in the statute, the debtor has the right to separate and divide the articles, and break up the combination, and retain any number or portion of the same, whose total value does not exceed the statutory sum. As, for instance, if the debtor's working team consists of two horses, each valued at $250, and a wagon valued at $200, and harnesses valued at $50, he may claim as exempt any portion of the team not exceeding $250 in value. He may take either horse, or he may take the wagon and harness."

Although the general rule is now well established that the debtor has the right of selection, it seems that under an early statute in Pennsylvania, the debtor was held not to have the right to select which of several chattels he would retain as exempt. Lind-

If there was a mortgage upon the property, defendant had no right to levy thereon until the mortgage was paid off.

Moore v. Calvert, 8 Okla. 358, 58 Pac. 627; Seip v. Tilghman, 23 Kan. 289.

Sharp, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an action in replevin, filed February 8, 1910, by J. P. Evans against W. H. Parsons, a constable, to recover certain personal property, most of which had on February 5th, prior thereto, been taken from the possession of the plaintiff by defendant, by virtue of an execution issued out of a justice court, in the case of J. W. Howard v. J. P. Evans; judgment having been obtained against the defendant in that action, who is the plaintiff in the present action. After describing the property sought to be recovered, which consisted of ten hogs, two horses, two cows, one buggy, one set of harness, and about 50 bushels of corn, all of which was alleged to be exempt under the laws of the state, plaintiff in his petition asked for damages in the sum of $100 for the wrongful detention of said property. With the exception of four hogs taken under the execution, three of which belonged to the tenant of plaintiff, living on the farm from which the property was taken, the other one not being claimed an exempt, and two horses, the property replevined was identical with that taken under the execution. The hog and two horses not claimed as exempt in the present case were sold by defendant in satisfaction of the execution, sey v. Fuller, 10 Watts, 144; Trovillo v. Shingles, 10 Watts, 438; Hetrick v. Campbell, 14 Pa. 263, in the first case cited, the court said that if the debtor had two cows in his possession, he could only claim exemption for one of them; that the statute had not given him the right to elect which of the two it should be, and the officer therefore would seem to have the right of taking either. But from the Hetrick Case, it appears that in 1846 a statute was passed exempting one horse or yoke of oxen, etc., "at the option of the defendant."

Where the debtor had a pair of oxen and also a horse, and was entitled to claim as exempt the horse or the oxen, it was said that he might hold either of them exempt from attachment; that "the one may be more valuable or desirable to the debtor than the other, and it would be contrary to the policy of the law to allow the creditor to deprive him of the right of choice. The exemption is for the benefit of the debtor, and the right of election is in him." Colson v. Wilson, 58 Me. 416.

In regard to the debtor's right of selection under a statute exempting from attachment and execution "one yoke of oxen or steers, as the debtor may select," it was said in Haskins v. Bennett, 41 Vt. 698: "The debtor may own a yoke of oxen or steers, of little present value for a team, but valuable to keep on account of their yearly growth. He may at the same time own another yoke of oxen of great present value for a team, but they are full grown and continually depreciating in value. Either pair will answer his present purpose or use for a team. His creditors have the right to take from him one pair or the other. The reason of the rule giving him the right to select the pair he would keep is obvious. His superior knowledge of the cattle, and of the pair from which he could derive the greatest present and future advantage and profit in view of the purpose for which he might desire to keep such cattle would enable him to make the selection according to the spirit as well as the letter of the statute giving him that right,—a right which, in view of the apparent ob-

And under a statute exempting from execution all provisions and forage on hand for home consumption, it was said in Anderson v. Larremore, 1 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (White & W.) 532, that "the debtor, owning a farm and raising grain upon it, has the right to select from such grain what he will use, and to an amount reasonable in quantity. Neither creditor nor officer can determine for him what kind of bread of the grain he has raised, he and his family shall use; nor whether his stock shall be fed on oats or barley. It is no defense to the charge of seizing all the wheat that a debtor has, that he had left a growing crop of corn, or had oats in a stack. . . . The debtor's motives in regard to the exemption are not material, and cannot be inquired into. The question is whether the property is within the exemption. If it is, the claim set up to it by the debtor could not, as to the creditor, be fraudulent, no matter what might be the motives of the debtor."

The election of what animals the debtor will retain as exempt if he has more than the number exempted by the statute lies with him, and not with the creditor who procures the attachment. Nuzman v. Schooley, 36 Kan. 177, 12 Pac. 829.

And in Rice v. Nolan, 33 Kan. 31, 5 Pac. 437, the court said that where the debtor has a greater number of animals or articles than are enumerated as exempt, or where he has property which exceeds in value the limit of his exemption, the law does not prescribe when or by whom the selection shall be made; and that in view of the fact that the statute was enacted mainly for the benefit of the debtor and his family, it appeared that he should be afforded the privilege of making the selection at any time before the sale.

A debtor is not authorized to make two selections by a statute entitling him to select as exempt property of the value of $100, and in addition thereto $300 worth of property if he is the head of a family, residing with the same. Johnson v. Larcade, 110 Ill. App. 611. The statute, it was said, only to which plaintiff herein made no objection. On the same day that the action in replevin was filed, the writ issued to the sheriff, which the latter executed on February 9, 1910, by levying upon and taking said property into his possession. On March 10th following, defendant filed his answer to the petition of plaintiff, denying generally the allegations contained therein, and on December 7th thereafter filed an amended answer, which contained the following additional defenses:

"(1) This defendant admits that he was in possession of the property described in plaintiff's petition.

"(2) That said possession was by virtue of an execution issued out of the justice court of T. J. Hawley, a justice of the peace of Byron township, said county and state, and levied upon said property; that said levy was made subject to a certain mortgage of said plaintiff in favor of the Bank of Cherokee, Oklahoma; and that, at the time of said levy, the property described in plaintiff's petition was in the possession of said mortgagee.

"(3) That upon demand of said plaintiff for the possession of the property described in said petition, claiming said property by reasons that same were exempt under the laws of this state, this defendant immediately delivered the property to said plaintiff, and has not at any time made claim to said property since said date."

Trial was had December 9th and resulted in a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the contemplated the debtor's making one selection, and this must embrace all the property he was entitled to as exempt.

Under a statute exempting personal property, to be selected by the debtor, not to exceed in value $250, it was held in Bernheim Bros. v. Andrews, 65 Miss. 28, 3 So. 75, that an exemptionist residing in a city, town, or village, might select as exempt a barrel of whisky of less value than the sum allowed by the statute, the court saying that the range of selection within the limit prescribed as to value was unlimited, and it was for the exemptionist to select for himself, according to his judgment, taste, or fancy, and that no court could abridge this right which the law has given to him.

In Harley v. Procnier, 115 Mich. 53, 40 L.R.A. 150, 69 Am. St. Rep. 546, 72 N. W. 1099, it was held that a married man might, without his wife's consent, select the cows which he would claim as exempt, by giving a chattel mortgage on other cows, under a statute providing that two cows shall be exempt to each household from any final process, and that a chattel mortgage created on any part of such exempt property shall be void unless the mortgage is signed by the wife of the mortgagor. As to selection of exempt property by the giving of a chattel mortgage, see also Grover v. Younie, under IV. a.

And in Malvin v. Christoph, 54 Iowa, 562, 7 N. W. 6, it was held that the wife of an absconding debtor might select the horse which she desired to retain as exempt, if there was more than one horse left with her, under a statute exempting to the head of a family one horse, and providing that when a debtor absconds and leaves his family, such property shall be exempt in the hands of the wife and children.

The debtor cannot replevy property levied upon under execution on the ground that it is exempt, under a statute exempting $100 worth of property suited to the debtor's condition in life, to be selected by the debtor, where the property levied upon is of greater value than $100, unless he has made a selection before the levy or when he had notice thereof. Amend v. Smith, 87 Ill. 198. L.R.A.1915D.

And the rule was laid down in Lindley v. Miller, 67 Ill. 244, an action of replevin by a tenant for property distrained by the landlord for rent, that to entitle the plaintiff to recover a portion of the property on the ground that it was exempt from distress, selection of the portion claimed as exempt should be made in apt time, and the property demanded before replevin was brought.

So, in Madera v. Holdrege, 4 Colo. App. 126, 35 Pac. 52, it was held that the officer was not liable for levying on a horse, where the debtor had other property subject to levy, unless the debtor notified the officer that the horse was selected as a work horse and claimed as exempt under the statute. To a similar effect, see Howard v. Farr, 18 N. H. 457.

And in Frost v. Shaw, 3 Ohio St. 270, it was held that a debtor could not maintain an action for the seizure and sale on execution of an article which by statute he was authorized to select and hold as exempt, unless he showed that he made the selection, because without such selection the benefit of the exemption statute did not attach, and the officer might proceed to levy and sell the property.

Also in Seaman v. Luce, 23 Barb. 240, at least two of the four justices approved the rule that the debtor could recover damages from an officer for detention of a horse taken on execution, on the ground that it was exempt, only after the debtor had claimed and selected the horse as the exempt property, where he had other horses which might have been levied upon; and that such claim and selection must be made within a reasonable time after notice of the levy and before the bringing of the action. (See quotation from this case in PARSONS v. EVANS.)

"The true principle, sustained by reason, and, as we think, by the better and more numerous authorities, is, that whenever the exemption is not specific and certain, and a selection is necessary, that selection devolves upon the debtor. In such a case the law has favored him with the personal privilege of a choice and election what specific articles, to be taken out of the general stock, he will claim and withhold as his exempted sum of $5 and costs. Motion for a new trial, being filed, was sustained. July 26, 1911, defendant filed a second amended answer, in which the further defenses were set up that the ten hogs replevined were turned over to plaintiff as soon as selected from the fourteen taken under the execution, and that, as to the other property, it had never been in the possession of defendant under the execution issued in the case of Howard v. Evans, but instead was in the possession of one D. B. Harrison, for the Bank of Cherokee, which at the time held a mortgage on it. The second trial resulted in a verdict for $25, and judgment was rendered accordingly. Motion for new trial having been overruled, the case is brought here on appeal.

The defendant by his amended answer having disclaimed right of possession to the property, and conceded it to be in plaintiff, the court very properly instructed the jury that the only questions to be determined by them were whether the property was wrongfully detained by defendant before being released, and, if so, the amount of damages suffered, if any. The principal question for our determination is whether the defendant wrongfully detained the property, or any part of it, from the plaintiff. This involves other considerations, namely: (1) Is it a duty of an officer, when levying an execution, to inform the debtor or his agent of his statutory exemption rights; (2) is the statute self-executing, or must the debtor claim the exemptions allowed him; property, of the value of $200. That being so, he would certainly not be bound by the choice and election made by the officer, either in his absence or in his presence, unless assenting to it." Zielke v. Morgan, 50 Wis. 560, 7 N. W. 651, holding that where the debtor had made no selection from a larger stock of the $200 worth of stock in trade which he was entitled to claim as exempt, one whose purchase of the entire stock was fraudulent and void could not recover from the officer who attached the same, for conversion, on the ground that a part of the goods attached, of the value of $200, was the lawful exemption of the debtor, and therefore passed by the sale. To a similar effect is Berge v. Kittleson, 133 Wis. 664, 114 N. W. 125, holding that where the debtor had made no selection of the exemptions from among a larger number of chattels, the property was subject to execution in the hands of a fraudulent vendee.

Under the Illinois statute requiring the debtor to make a schedule of all his personal property, and deliver the same to the officer, and providing that after the appraiser shall have fixed a fair valuation upon each article in the schedule, the debtor shall then select the articles he may desire to retain as exempt up to a certain value, the debtor is bound to make the selection, and the officer cannot select for him, or change the selection he has made. Moffett v. Sheehy, 52 Ill. App. 376.

So, in Parketon v. Pugsley, 142 Mo. App. 537, 121 S. W. 789, the rule was laid down that the debtor might make the selection, and that the officer, in levying on the property, cannot do so for him, under a statute permitting the debtor to select as exempt, in lieu of certain personal property, any other real or personal property up to a stated value; and it was held that a demand by the debtor that the officer set aside his exemptions was not the equivalent of a selection, so as to render the plaintiff in the execution liable for directing the officer to levy on the property, although it was intimated that the officer would be liable for disregarding the request, and for failure to inform the debtor of his rights.

To a similar effect is Davis v. Williamson, 68 Mo. App. 307, where it was held that the execution plaintiff was not liable to the debtor for directing the garnishment of a debt owed to the defendant in the execution, where the debt could be claimed as exempt only by selection, and had not been selected by the debtor, even if the officer had failed to advise the latter of his exemption rights.

The defendant in an execution, under a statute giving him the right of designating the property to be levied upon, cannot defeat a levy by neglect or refusal to exercise his statutory right. Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 11 Pac. 820.

In O'Donnell v. Segar, 25 Mich. 367, the rule was laid down that it is incumbent on the debtor in a replevin action against an officer for attaching a yoke of oxen, to show, if he had another team which, with the one levied upon, exceeded in value $250, that he had taken the proper course to select the oxen seized, or that he had been wrongfully prevented from making such selection.

It is the duty of the referee in a judgment creditor's suit, and not of the receiver or of the debtor, where they cannot agree as to what articles shall be retained by the debtor as exempt from execution, to make the selection, under the New York Revised Statutes designating certain articles as exempt, and the act of 1842, exempting necessary household furniture up to a certain value. Dickerson v. Van Tine, 1 Sandf. 724.

Whether or not the debtor had other horses, so that the statutory method of selection should be followed in order to determine which was exempt, was held material in Gass v. Van Wagner, 63 Mich. 610, 30 N. W. 198, where the debtor replevined the horse seized by the defendant under an execution, and the defendant testified on the trial that the horse was replevined before he had time to complete his inventory.

A selection by a merchant of certain goods as exempt is not binding, as to the amount and value of the selected goods, on creditors who are not parties to the selection, but the property so selected in the hands of an assignee who paid no consideration, may be levied upon, subject to the and (3) how, if necessary, should he make his claim?

We find nothing in the statutes making it the duty of an officer, when levying an execution, to inform the debtor of his right to exemptions. Section 6405, Comp. Laws 1909 (Rev. Laws 1910, § 5484), provides that the execution for the enforcement of a judgment before a justice of the peace must be directed to a constable of the county, who shall collect the amount of the judgment from the personal property of the debtor, etc. Section 6451, Comp. Laws (Rev. Laws 1910, § 2075), gives a constable, in serving process and doing his duties, generally, the same authority and power over goods and chattels as is granted by law to a sheriff under like process issued from courts of record. Section 5972, Comp. Laws 1909 (Rev. Laws 1910, § 5156), names the property upon which execution shall be levied, etc. Unless, then, the duty of the constable, or other officer, to inform the debtor of his right to exemptions, can be inferred from the statute granting such exemptions (Comp. Laws 1909, § 3346; Rev. Laws 1910, § 3342), we must conclude that it is not imposed upon him. This statute reads in part: "The following property shall be reserved to the head of every family residing in the state exempt from attachment or execution and every other species of forced sale for the payment of debts, except as hereinafter provided: [Naming different classes of personalty exempt.]" right of the debtor to have his exemptions set off to him. McCauley v. Hoek, 159 Mich. 570, 124 N. W. 570, 18 Ann. Cas. 945.

The debtor may waive the right of selection, as he may waive the right to all exemptions, where he is entitled to select his exemptions in lieu of certain other property. Hombs v. Corbin, 20 Mo. App. 497.

And in Sullivan v. Winslow, 22 Ind. 153, it was said that by failing to select the property claimed as exempt, as required by the statute in that state, the debtor might waive the right of exemption, which was a personal privilege.

Under a statute exempting stock in trade to the value of $200, the duty of the debtor to make a selection was thus stated in Wicker v. Comstock, 52 Wis. 315, 9 N. W. 25: "The general rule is settled, therefore, that if an officer seize, on attachment or execution, the whole stock in trade of the debtor, exceeding in value $200, the debtor must claim his exemption and select the specific articles which he would retain, or he will be held to have waived his right thereto. The rule must be reasonably applied, however, and hence, if, upon claim of exemption, the officer refuses to give the debtor an opportunity to make such selection, or denies his right to any exemption whatever, the actual selection is waived or excused, and the want of it will not be a waiver of the debtor's right."

The right of selection, if any, by the debtor, as to which of two cows owned by him he will retain as exempt, is waived by his failure to make a selection at the time of the attachment, and his assertion at that time and up to the time of the trial, that he owned only the cow attached, and that another cow in his possession belonged to his wife's estate. Sumner v. Brown, 34 Vt. 194.

And the right of selection under a statute authorizing the debtor to hold exempt from execution personal property not exceeding $500 in value, to be selected by the debtor at any time before sale, was held waived in Butt v. Green, 29 Ohio St. 667, by the failure of the debtor to be present and make the selection at the time agreed upon between him and the officer, the debtor, at the time of the levy of the execution, having demanded the "exemptions allowed him by law," but having made no selection, and the officer having set off the exemptions upon the debtor's purposely absenting himself from the place and at the time agreed upon for making the appraisal and selection.

So, in Wright v. Deyoe, 86 Ill. 490, it was held that a debtor who was notified by the officer of the execution, and that at a certain time and place the levy would be made, but who at that time purposely absented himself, could not subsequently make a selection of the property levied upon, under a statute exempting $60 worth of property suitable to the debtor's condition; but that in such a case the officer was entitled to levy upon any of the property of the debtor not specifically exempt, and sell the same regardless of any subsequent claim of the debtor to the property.

If the debtor who is entitled to claim oxen or a horse as exempt from an attachment refuses, on the officer's request at the time of the attachment, to elect which he will retain, he cannot afterwards object and hold the officer liable for taking the oxen, and not the horse. Davis v. Webster, 59 N. H. 471.

And in Buzzell v. Hardy, 58 N. H. 331, it was held that a debtor waived his right of election, if he had any, by not claiming the property attached as exempt at the time of the attachment.

But where a debtor who was entitled to an exemption of ten sheep owned a larger number, and the officer attached the entire flock, it was held that the mere silence of the debtor at the time of the attachment, when the officer did not request him to designate the exempt property or make any designation himself, was not a waiver of the exemption, and did not prevent the debtor from subsequently claiming ten of the sheep as exempt, and recovering their value. Frost v. Mott, 34 N. Y. 253.

"Under the law exempting certain property from sale under execution a debtor has the right to elect which of several pieces of property, each sufficient to satisfy the debt,

Does this statute of itself sufficiently set apart, from all personal property that a resident of the state may own, so much thereof as is specifically exempted thereby, so that, before it could be taken under execution, the officer of the law must inform the debtor of his right to retain it? Or, continuing, can it be said that specific amounts of the property exempted are placed beyond the reach of an execution in any case? Both of these questions, we think, should be answered in the negative. The statute plainly states the duties of an officer, such as a sheriff or constable, and how such duties shall be performed, but nowhere includes that he shall legally advise a debtor whose property he may be about to subject to an execution. Discussing this question, it is said in Wells, Replevin, 2d ed. § 269: "An officer with execution is not bound to consult with the execution debtor as to what property is exempt, but he may seize and proceed to sell any or all the debtor's property upon which he can lay his hands; and, if the debtor desires the protection of the statute, he must invoke its aid. It does not operate unless its shelter is sought. When exempt property is levied on, the debtor ought, at the time, or seasonably thereafter, to specially claim the benefit of the exemption; he cannot sustain replevin for property he has not selected and claimed as exempt. So, when a certain amount of a particular kind of property is exempt, the debtor must select and claim or in some lawful manner shall be sold; but if he be present at the sale and makes no objection, his right of election is waived, and the sheriff may sell whichever piece he may deem proper." Westerland v. Moreland, 3 Ky. L. Rep. 324 (abstract).

And under a statute exempting to a resident householder with a family, two work beasts, or one work beast and a yoke of oxen, the debtor has the right of selection as to which he will retain; but if there are more than two work beasts, he cannot refuse to make an election of those he will retain; and if he fails or refuses to elect, and the officer makes an election for him, leaving in his possession the number of beasts exempted under the statute, the debtor cannot, after the sale, for the first time, claim those levied upon as exempt. Woolfolk v. Lyons, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 918, 59 S. W. 21.

Where the debtor was not present at the time of the levy, and was not consulted as to the property that he wished to retain as exempt, but the sheriff set apart two mules as exempt, and shortly after the levy the debtor was informed that the mules had been left to him as exempt, and made no objection, but acquiesced in the action of the sheriff, it was held that he could not thereafter claim the animal levied on as exempt instead of one of the mules. Cleveland Nat. Bank v. Bryant, — Tenn. —, 54 S. W. 73.

An insolvent cannot maintain replevin against his assignee for a wagon which he claims as exempt, where he was the owner of two wagons, and upon being requested by the assignee to make a selection, refused to do so, on the ground that he was entitled to both; since, if the insolvent would avail himself of the right of election under the exemption statute, it is his duty to signify his election when requested by the assignee to do so, or he will be deemed to have waived his right, and the selection may be made by the assignee. McKenzie v. Redman, 87 Me. 322, 32 Atl. 902.

citing Baldwin v. Talbot, 43 Mich. 11, 4 N. W. 547.

In Baldwin v. Talbot, supra, it was held that a debtor was not precluded from claiming as exempt a horse which had been seized on execution, by reason of having given a fraudulent chattel mortgage on other property.

The selection by the officer of property of the debtor as exempt which was covered by a mortgage amounting to more than its appraised value was said, in Bayne v. Patterson, 40 Mich. 658, to be a fraud on the debtor, who was entitled to the full statutory amount of exempt property, if he owned it.

Under a statute exempting to the head of a family stock in trade not exceeding $400 in value, where a mortgage was given on such stock for over $400, and subsequently the property was attached by a creditor who obtained judgment, sold the property, and out of the proceeds paid the mortgage, without the objection of the debtor, who, however, claimed the right of selection in proper time before the sale, it was contended in Rice v. Nolan, 33 Kan. 28, 5 Pac. 437, that as the mortgage given by the debtor upon the stock amounted to more than the exemption to which he was entitled, and that as he had made no objection to its payment out of the proceeds of sale, he must be held to have had the benefit of the exemption. This claim was held untenable, the court saying that where one gives a chattel mortgage upon exempt property, he only waives the right of exemption to the extent of the mortgage given, and that it does not affect his rights against anyone except the mortgagee; that the debtor is entitled to an exemption on his stock in trade, of his own selection, free and clear of all encumbrance or liability for debt, up to the full value of $400.

assert his rights. If the sheriff levy execution on the whole of that class of property, the debtor cannot sustain replevin until he select and demand the exempted portion."

In Williams v. Brown, 137 Mich. 569, 100 N. W. 786, the same question was considered. It is there said: "Where no duty of selection is imposed upon the officer, the debtor waives his right to the exemption if he fails to demand it."

Judgment debtors should be given an opportunity to claim their exemptions, but this does not mean that they may not waive such right. We have no doubt but that in some instances a debtor may be willing to have a judgment against him satisfied out of exempt property which he may own, rather than have such judgment outstanding question of the sufficiency of the claim of exemptions, that no attempt to cover the question generally has been made. In a few cases, however, the question as to what amounts to a selection has been treated so distinctly from that of the sufficiency of a mere claim of exemptions that they have been included in the note; not, however, with the object of exhausting the cases on this point.

"It is undoubtedly the law that the debtor's selection of exemptions must be so specific and certain that the officer will be appraised of the exact claim made;" but it is sufficient if the selection is made to the levying officer in such a way that he cannot or ought not to misunderstand it. Northrup v. Cross, 2 N. D. 433, 51 N. W. 718, holding that a selection by the debtor of the "free property" was sufficient, where, upon the appraisal list, which was held by the officer, certain property was designated as mortgaged and certain other property as assigned as collateral, and the balance was listed without comment, the term "free property" meaning, it was said, the property that appeared on the appraisal as unencumbered.

Under the Missouri statute giving to attorneys at law the privilege, at their option, of selecting such books as may be necessary to their profession, in the place of other property exempted from execution to the heads of families, an attorney owning law books worth $3,000 and other personal property worth $700 does not make a selection, so as to entitle him to maintain an action against an officer for levying upon and selling part of the books, by giving a list of the books to the officer, and claiming exemption of all of them, as well as of his other property. Brown v. Hoffmeister, 71 Mo. 411. Law books not exceeding in value the other property in lieu of which the books might be selected were regarded as exempt.

If the debtor appropriates to his own use, after the attachment is levied, part of the attached property of greater value than the exemption claimed, the appropriation may be regarded as a selection of the exempt. L.R.A.1915D.

unpaid. It has been very generally held that the right of exemption is a personal privilege, which, in order to be availed of, must be claimed by the debtor. Scanlan v. Guiling, 63 Ark. 540, 39 S. W. 713; Kahn v. Hayes, 22 Ind. App. 182, 53 N. E. 430; Wilson v. Montague, 57 Mich. 638, 24 N. W. 851; York v. Carlisle, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 269, 46 S. W. 257; Taylor v. Belville, 70 W. Va. 484, 74 S. E. 517; Wicker v. Comstock, 52 Wis. 315, 9 N. W. 25; Stanton v. French, 83 Cal. 194, 23 Pac. 355.

In the present case demand was made over the phone, for the return of the exempt property, before the beginning of the action; but there being more stock than was claimed as exempt, and no selection of the exempt from the nonexempt having been tion, and he will not be entitled to an additional exemption out of the attached property. Strange v. Gess, 111 Ky. 640, 64 S. W. 458.

In Tombow v. Haskins, 15 Ohio C. C. 656, 8 Ohio C. D. 281, it was held that the debtor made a sufficient selection within the meaning of a statute providing for the exemption from levy and sale of real and personal property to be selected by the debtor, not exceeding $500 in value, by the filing of a motion to discharge the attachment and garnishee process on the ground that the money garnished was exempt from execution.

If at the time the debtor claims as exempt $500 belonging to him, in the custody of the court, under a statute entitling him to select property as exempt to this amount in lieu of a homestead, he has $500 additional which he conceals, such concealment or withholding of the other property will be deemed a selection thereof as the debtor's exempt property, and his claim to the fund in court will be denied. Haslage v. Hoover, 16 Ohio C. C. 570, 9 Ohio C. D. 404.

And in other cases (Rogers v. Ayers, 119 Tenn. 340, 123 Am. St. Rep. 725, 104 S. W. 521; Florida Loan & T. Co. v. Crabb, 45 Fla. 306, 33 So. 523) the removal or transfer of property by the debtor out of the reach of creditors has been held to be a selection of his exemptions pro tanto. See also Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333, and statement in Ross v. Hannah, 18 Ala. 125, to a similar effect. But upon the question generally as to whether the fact that the debtor has fraudulently concealed or disposed of other property will preclude him from claiming that levied upon as exempt, there is a conflict of authority, and the point is beyond the scope of the note.

As to the sufficiency of the selection of a horse as exempt where the debtor claimed at the time of the levy that he owned only that horse, but it turned out at the trial that he owned two others also, see Plimpton v. Sprague, 47 Vt. 467.

b. Right and duty of officer.

See cases under II. a, supra, and PARSONS v. EVANS.

made, the mere demand for so much exempt property was not sufficient. It is true that in this case plaintiff demanded ten of eleven hogs belonging to him as exempt, but there were also three other hogs in the same herd held by the defendant belonging to plaintiff's tenant, and it is reasonable to suppose that defendant would, if he had made the selection for plaintiff, have chosen a part of the hogs belonging to said tenant, for he did not know which belonged to the tenant. When plaintiff did make his selection after this action was commenced, he refused to accept the ten at the time driven out of the herd by the defendant, but made his own selection. This confirms our statement that in all probability he would not have been satisfied had defendant made the selection for him at the time demand was made upon him over the telephone.

In Schwartz v. Birnbaum, 21 Colo. 21, 39 Pac. 416, it is said in the syllabus: "Where only part of property levied on is claimed to be exempt, the mere demand by the execution defendant of his right to select is not equivalent to making the selection, so as to perfect the right of exemption."

In Smith v. Chadwick, 51 Me. 515, the opinion quotes from the case of Clapp v. Thomas, 5 Allen, 158, as follows: "If the debtor, who has a larger quantity of any kinds of provisions than the law exempts from attachment, sets apart no portion thereof for the use of his family before it is about to be attached, and makes no

It is the debtor's duty to make the selection, and not the duty of the officer to make the selection for him, if he fails to do so. Johnson v. Larcade, 110 Ill. App. 611.

But if the debtor refuses or neglects to select the exempt property, the officer, in levying an execution, may do so for him. Cloutier v. Georgeson, 13 Manitoba, L. Rep. 1.-

In Johnson v. Larcade, supra, the debtor made a selection of personal property worth over $800, when the exemptions to which he would have been entitled as the head of a family, residing with the same, were $300 worth of property, to be selected by him. An instruction was held error, in an action against the officer for a wrongful levy, that it was the officer's duty to set off to the debtor "$300 worth of items of personal property . . . beginning with the first item, and setting off the articles consecutively" as they appeared in the selection until the amount of $300 had been set off, the court saying that the officer could not know and was not obliged to inquire whether the debtor wanted to claim the $300 from the items first mentioned in the selection, or from items elsewhere mentioned therein; and that the attempt to select more than double the amount of property the debtor was entitled to was no selection at all.

And it was said in Schwartz v. Birnbaum, 21 Colo. 21, 39 Pac. 416, that it was not the duty of the officer to set aside the exempt property unless the claimant pointed out the property, when the seizure embraced other property rightfully taken, and the exempt property was not specifically exempt by statute, but merely comprised a portion of the stock in trade, even though it was less in value than the amount exempted by statute. And it was held that there had been no sufficient selection of the exempt property where the debtor only demanded the right of selection, the court saying that the mere demand of the debtor of his right to select was not equivalent to making the selection.

exemptions is not the equivalent of a selection thereof, so as to entitle him to recover damages against the officer for taking the property, but that it was incumbent on the debtor to make a demand, and to select and point out the property which he claimed was not liable to seizure. The demand in this case was for $200 worth of stock in trade, and the court said that such a demand would not put upon the officer the duty of determining what was worth $200, nor what part of the stock should be set apart.

Under a statute exempting certain property to the debtor at his election, if the debtor does not make a choice at the time of the seizure, the sheriff is not bound to make the choice for him, but may seize all of the property, leaving to the debtor the right to make a selection before the sale. Noel v. Laverdiere, 7 Quebec L. R. 367; Ross v. Lemieux, Montreal L. R. 2 S. C. 272; Filion v. Chabot, Rap. Jud. Quebec 9 C. S. 327.

In Figueira v. Pyatt, 88 Ill. 402, it was alleged, in an action of trespass against the officer for a wrongful levy, that goods of the value of $100 taken were exempt, and, that the officer was liable because he failed to set off to the plaintiff that amount of goods. But the court held that the declaration was fatally defective for not alleging that the plaintiff selected and claimed $100 worth of goods as exempt, saying that the law required him, if he would avail himself of the provisions of the statute, to select the articles and claim them as exempt.

To a somewhat similar effect is Behymer v. Cook, 5 Colo. 395, where it was contended that the property not attached was worth but $35, and that the plaintiff was entitled to retain a sufficient number of the articles taken to amount to the sum of $200. But it was held that as the property attached was not specifically exempt, the debtor must make a selection, and that in this case no sufficient selection was shown.

In Smith v. Chadwick, 51 Me. 515, the rule was laid down that if exempt property (in this instance furniture) is mingled with other property of the same kind, not exempt, the officer is not liable for attaching the whole, unless the debtor claims and selects claim to any portion of it when the officer is about to attach the whole, he cannot maintain an action against the officer, who takes the whole."

And adds: "We recognize that decision as sound law."

In Seaman v. Luce, 23 Barb. 240, there is the following discussion of the duties of an officer in a case similar to the present one: "It will hardly do to hold that the officer is invested with the absolute authority to determine, before he makes the levy, which of the three horses belonging to a defendant in an execution shall be taken, and which two shall be exempt as a team for the defendant. He might leave the defendant one of the three horses which would not work in a team with another horse at all, and thereby literally deprive the defendant of the benefit of a team. If we allow the officer the absolute right of determining which two of the three horses shall be exempt, he may in very many ways use the authority so oppressively as to render this statute, which was intended to secure a team to a judgment debtor as exempt property, of very little value to the debtor. On the contrary, if we allow the defendant in the execution the unqualified right of selecting from the class of exempt property to the extent of holding the officer liable as a trespasser in case he does not, before he makes his levy, call upon the execution debtor and request him to elect from the class of exempt property which he will claim as exempt, such a requirement that which he desires to retain as exempt, the court saying that the law would not under such circumstances require him at his peril to discriminate between the attachable and the unattachable property.

Under the Illinois statute exempting from levy and sale on execution $60 worth of property suitable to the condition or occupation in life of the debtor, to be selected by him, the court in Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333, declared the law to be that as a general rule the debtor must make a selection before the levy on the property, and that "in order that the exercise of such right by the debtor may not in any case be defeated, it is the duty of the officer having an execution in his hands, before he proceeds to take or seize any of the personal property of the defendant in such execution, by a levy thereon, to notify such defendant of his having such execution in his hands, if practicable, and thereupon it is the right of such defendant to select such property as he desires to retain, according to the statute, surrendering to the officer all of his other property not thus selected, or specifically exempt, in order that, by the sale thereof, or of so much of it as may for that purpose be necessary, the money due on the execution may be made. If the defendant, being thus notified, or otherwise being apprised of the execution against him in the hands of the constable, and of the intended levy, neglect or refuse to make such selection, the officer may at once proceed to levy upon any of the property of such defendant, not specifically exempt from execution, that he may choose to take, and afterwards proceed to sell the same, regardless of any subsequent claim or demand by such defendant of such property, as having been selected by him under this statute."

If the debtor is absent from the county, so that notice of the execution cannot be given him, the officer may levy on all his property not specifically exempt, and thereafter the debtor may make his selection as he might have done before the levy. People ex rel. Gregg v. Palmer, 46 Ill. 398, 95 Am. Dec. 418.

said that as the debtor was entitled to his election, it was the duty of the officer in making the levy to require him to make his election at the time of the levy, and thus all difficulty could be avoided in cases where the debtor subsequently claimed the right to elect the property levied upon as exempt.

And in Rice v. Nolan, 33 Kan. 28, 5 Pac. 437, the rule was laid down that it is the duty of the officer when about to make a levy upon property, some of which is exempt, to notify the debtor, so that he may make a selection; and that where, by reason of absence or other circumstances, the debtor is precluded from selecting, it becomes the duty of the officer to set apart the exemptions to which the debtor is entitled.

Under the Michigan statute exempting tools, implements, team, etc., or other things to enable a person to carry on his profession, trade, or occupation, not exceeding $250 in value, and providing that when a levy is made on any property of the exempt class, the officer shall cause an inventory and appraisal to be made, and that the debtor may then select his exemptions, the officer was held liable in Town v. Elmore, 38 Mich. 305, for selling stock in a foundry and machine shop conducted by the debtor without making an inventory or taking any steps to enable the debtor to select his exemptions. It was contended that if the officer left in possession of the debtor stock to the amount of $250, he was not liable for a failure to cause that levied upon to be inventoried and appraised, and a distinction was sought to be made between a levy on tools, implements, team, etc., in respect to which it might be assumed that the debtor might have a choice, and a levy on part of a stock in trade, one part of which might be assumed to be as desirable for the debtor's purposes as another. The court, however, said that the statute afforded no ground for such a distinction, but gave the same right of choice in all the enumerated cases, and that this was perhaps as likely to be valuable in the case of stock as in that of tools, teams, etc.

So. in Parker v. Canfield, 116 Mich. 94, 74 N. W. 296, it was held that when an officer levies under execution on exempt would render the execution of the process extremely onerous upon public officers, and in many cases would seriously prejudice the rights of judgment and execution creditors."

Other authorities to the same effect are Tullis v. Orthwein, 5 Minn. 377, Gil. 305; Berge v. Kittleson, 133 Wis. 664, 114 N. W. 125; Williams v. Brown, 137 Mich. 569, 100 N. W. 786; Haskins v. Bennett, 41 Vt. 698; Wells, Replevin, § 269. No selection of the ten hogs from the fourteen taken under the execution having been made prior to the bringing of plaintiff's action, as to them there could have been no wrongful detention by the defendant, and the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for injuries which may have been suffered by said hogs while in defendant's possession. As to the property other than the hogs, the undisputed evidence shows it to have been taken, not by defendant under the execution, but by one Harrison, for the Bank of Cherokee, the mortgagee of such property, and placed in the possession of one Christensen for said bank, and that said Christensen continued in the possession of said property for the bank until after the commencement of the present action. It is true that defendant levied on the mortgaged property "subject to the mortgage," as well as on the hogs, and which levy as to said property was invalid. Moore v. Calvert, 8 Okla. 358, 58 Pac. 627. But this does not contradict the testimony of Christensen and the other witnesses that it was held and taken care property it is his duty to make an inventory, and allow the execution debtor to select his exemptions; and that otherwise he will be liable for conversion.

And in McCoy v. Brennan, 61 Mich. 362, 1 Am. St. Rep. 589, 28 N. W. 129, the law was declared to be that under the statutes of that state, if a portion of the property levied on is exempt, it is the duty of the debtor, upon being notified of the levy, to select the exemption, and if he fails to do so it is the duty of the sheriff to make the selection; and that it is a violation of the officer's duty to proceed to a sale without setting out the exempt property.

To a similar effect are the following cases which support the proposition that it is the duty of the officer under the Michigan statute to give the debtor an opportunity for selection, and to make the selection of the exempt property for him, if he neglects or refuses to do so: Elliott v. Whitmore, 5 Mich. 532; Wyckoff v. Wyllis, 8 Mich. 48; Hutchinson v. Whitmore, 90 Mich. 255, 30 Am. St. Rep. 431, 51 N. W. 451; Hogan v. Neumeister, 117 Mich. 498, 76 N. W. 65. In the Wyckoff Case the court said: "If the debtor was notified of the levy, as required by law, his default to select the exempt property 'does not destroy the exemption, but merely leaves the selection of property to be made by the sheriff.'"

But in Williams v. Brown, 137 Mich. 569, 100 N. W. 786, it was held that no duty of selection was imposed upon the officer in behalf of a fraudulent vendee, even if the latter was entitled to claim the exemption of his fraudulent vendor, for whose debt the property was attached, and that if no selection was made or claimed by the vendee the exemption was waived.

If the execution debtor is absent at the time of the levy, the officer may make the selection under the Michigan statute. Murphy v. Mulvena, 108 Mich. 347, 66 N. W. 224.

It was held in Jones v. Peek, 101 Mich. 389, 59 N. W. 659, that where an officer, in making an attachment, served an inventory on the debtor, and tendered her the use of an appraisal, and she declined to make the selection, the officer could select the exempt property, the statute not requiring the service of an appraisal.

An officer has no right, in levying an execution on personal property, to turn the debtor out of possession, and then, in his absence, cause an inventory and appraisal to be made and certain property set apart as exempt. Bayne v. Patterson, 40 Mich. 658.

If several members of a firm each of whom is entitled to claim part of a stock of goods of the copartnership as exempt, select the same piece of property, and cannot agree as to their selection, the officer may select for them. Skinner v. Shannon, 44 Mich. 86, 38 Am. Rep. 232, 6 N. W. 108.

In Massachusetts a distinction has been made as to the duty of the officer in levying upon such property as household furniture or animals, the individual articles of which have a separate identity and can be easily distinguished from others of the same kind with which they are mingled, and such property as corn and household provisions generally, which cannot be so distinguished. Copp v. Williams, 135 Mass. 401. In this case it was held that an officer, in attaching household furniture belonging to the debtor, of the value of $1,300, was bound to leave with the debtor whatever furniture was necessary, not exceeding $300 in value; that it was not necessary for the debtor to point out what household furniture was exempt, or to demand that what was exempt should be left; and that the officer was liable to the debtor for failure to leave necessary household furniture up to the exempted value. An instruction was held properly refused that "if some of the goods in the plaintiff's [debtor's] house were of such a nature as to be exempt from attachment, but there was a greater number or amount thereof than the debtor was entitled to hold under the exemption act, the defendant might lawfully attach the whole; and a neglect by the debtor to claim and set apart a portion thereof as exempt, knowing the same to be attached, will constitute a waiver of her right to hold any of said property as exempt from attachment."

of for the Bank of Cherokee, which had taken the property under its mortgage. We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff was not entitled to damages for the wrongful detention of any of the property levied on, under the execution.

The judgment of the trial court awarding damages should therefore be reversed, but without prejudice to the rights of the defendant in error to retain possession of his exempt property. The costs should be taxed to the defendant in error.

Petition for rehearing denied January 30, 1915.

In several cases, the court said in Copp v. Williams, supra, it had been held that where goods which are exempt from attachment are intermingled with other similar goods which are not exempt, it is the duty of the owner who sees the officer about to attach the whole to give notice of his intention to rely upon the exemption authorized by law, citing Nash v. Farrington, 4 Allen, 157, where it was held that an officer was not liable for conversion for seizing and selling on execution provisions belonging to the debtor, and kept by him for sale and for the use of his family, under a statute exempting from execution provisions necessary and intended for the use of a family, where no part of the property was set apart for the latter purpose or claimed as exempt; and Clapp v. Thomas, 5 Allen, 158, where a similar result was reached in an action against an officer for attaching a quantity of corn (see quotation from this case in PARSONS v. EVANS). But the court said that this doctrine was not applicable to articles of personal property, each of which is of such a kind as to have a separate identity, and to be easily distinguishable from all others; and that in the case of animals, for example, it was always understood that it is the duty of the officer to leave in the owner's possession as many of each kind as are exempt from seizure, citing Savage v. Davis, 134 Mass. 401.

So, in Mannan v. Merritt, 11 Allen, 582, it was held that an officer, in attaching household furniture of the exempt class, was bound to leave at least $100 worth with the debtor, and was liable to the latter for conversion, where, without requesting a selection, he seized and removed all the furniture, although he subsequently returned such articles as he thought proper.

And in Gay v. Southworth, 113 Mass. 333, it appears to be assumed that the officer, in attaching furniture of the debtor, must leave furniture of the kind and to the value exempt from attachment, the court holding that it was for the debtor to satisfy the jury, in an action against the officer for taking the property, that, in making the attachment, the latter had not left such amount and kind.

However, in Smith v. Chadwick, 51 Me. 515, where it was claimed that the officer had wrongfully attached a quantity of furniture some of which was exempt, the court quoted with approval the rule laid down in Clapp v. Thomas, supra, as to the debtor's duty to select the exemptions, and stated that it was unable to perceive any valid distinction between a large quantity of any kind of provisions and a large quantity of any kind of household furniture.

Under a statute declaring that the debtor in all cases shall have the right to designate the property levied on, if the property is in the county where the judgment is rendered, and that if he or his agent shall fail or refuse so to do the levy shall be made first on personal property and then on real estate, it is not necessary for a sheriff in whose hands an execution is placed for the purposes of a levy on property of a defendant whose residence is in another county, to go out of the county to seek the defendant to afford him the opportunity of pointing out property, or to ascertain whether he has an agent or personal property in the county subject to execution, in order to authorize a levy on the lands of the defendant in the county. Cook v. De la Garza, 13 Tex. 431.

And an instruction was approved in Atcheson v. Hutchinson, 51 Tex. 223, that "a party against whom execution is issued has the right to point out the property for levy, and if he fails to exercise this right, it is the duty of the officer to levy first on personal property, if any, and then on lands. If the party or authorized agent is not found in the county after reasonable inquiry and search, or if he fails to point out property when notified, and he has no personal property liable to execution, then the sheriff has the right to levy on the lands of the party."

c. Where debtor does not own more than amount or number of chattels exempted.

The statutes frequently provide that specified chattels or property up to certain value, to be selected by the debtor, shall be exempt from attachment and execution, and the question has sometimes arisen as to the necessity of a selection where the debtor does not own more than the stated number of chattels or property exceeding the designated value. It should be observed that this question cannot, strictly speaking, be regarded as one of selection, but rather as one relating to the necessity of a claim under such circumstances that the property is exempt.

However, it has frequently been referred to by the courts as one of selection, and the point has been made in some instances that the statute requires a formal selection as well as a claim, even under these circumstances. It is well established, however, that no selection, as distinguished from a claim of exemption, by the debtor, is necessary to render the officer liable for levying on part or all of the property, where the debtor does not own property in excess of the number of chattels or the amount in value allowed him by law as exempt. Alley v. Daniel, 75 Ala. 403 (exemption of personal property to the value of $1,000); Harrington v. Smith, 14 Colo. 376, 20 Am. St. Rep. 272, 23 Pac. 331; Sandberg v. Borstadt, 48 Colo. 97, 109 Pac. 419 (where all the property of the debtor was claimed as exempt at the time of the levy, the court saying that the debtor was not required to select any particular articles as exempt, but that a claim of exemption was all that was necessary); Autrey v. Wright, 4 Colo. App. 179, 35 Pac. 186; Bridgton v. Lakin, 53 Me. 106 (exemption of $1,000 worth of personal property to be designated by the debtor); Lynd v. Pickett, 7 Minn. 194, Gil. 128, 82 Am. Dec. 79 (exemption of team); Bank of Gulfport v. O'Neal, 86 Miss. 45, 38 So. 630 (exemption of personal property not exceeding $250 in value); Grieb v. Northrup, 66 App. Div. 86, 72 N. Y. Supp. 481. See also Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 329, 76 Am. Dec. 219; which, however, was regarded in Bong v. Parmentier, 87 Wis. 129, 58 N. W. 243, as overruled on this point.

Under a statute exempting from execution the necessary food for certain live stock for one year's support, "as the debtor may choose," and also provisions for the debtor and his family necessary for one year's support, to be chosen by the debtor, no choice or selection by the debtor is required in case all the food and provisions which the debtor has do not exceed the amount necessary for the purposes for which the statute allows the exemption. In such a case the statute operates to choose and select the exemption for the debtor, and a levy and sale upon the property, although no selection is made, is illegal. Howard v. Rugland, 35 Minn. 388, 29 N. W. 63.

Howard v. Rugland, supra, was followed in Thompson v. Peterson, 122 Minn. 228, 142 N. W. 307, where it was held that to entitle the debtor to recover from the officer the value of a piano taken under an execution against the owner, it was not necessary that a selection be made under the statute exempting musical instruments, and providing that all articles exempted "shall be selected by the debtor."

The Illinois statute exempting $60 worth of property suited to the debtor's condition or occupation in life, to be selected by the debtor, was construed in Cole v. Green, 21 Ill. 104, as not requiring a formal or express selection by the debtor where all of his property did not exceed $60 in value, the court saying that in such a case the statute by its own force sets apart the whole property to the use of the debtor, and absolutely exempts it from levy and sale on execution. But see McCluskey v. McNeely, 8 Ill. 578.

So, if the debtor has only one horse, the officer may be held liable for levying thereon and selling it under an execution, without a selection or setting apart thereof by L.R.A.1915D.

the debtor, although the statute provides that it shall be lawful for each individual against whom an execution may issue "to elect and set apart" one horse, etc. State v. Haggard, 1 Humph. 389.

And that a hog which is the debtor's only property is exempt without selection, under a statute exempting a certain number of hogs, sheep, etc., and permitting the debtor to select in lieu thereof any other property up to a certain value, see Wabash R. Co. v. Bowring, 103 Mo. App. 158, 77 S. W. 106.

Under a statute exempting to a debtor two swine, one of which shall not exceed in weight 100 pounds, and providing that when any debtor shall own two swine, each exceeding the weight of 100 pounds, the debtor may elect either as exempt, it was held in Wentworth v. Young, 17 Me. 70, that a swine weighing over 100 pounds was exempt to the debtor without selection, although he owned also two other swine, each weighing less than 100 pounds, the election being necessary as to a swine weighing over 100 pounds only in case the debtor owned two or more of that kind.

And under a statute exempting from execution two cows and calves, and providing that if the debtor selects a cow and calf worth more than $60, the officer levying thereon should have the same appraised, and if appraised at more than $60, he should sell the same, and pay the debtor that amount out of the proceeds, it was held in Stirman v. Smith, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 665, 10 S. W. 131, that a debtor who owned a cow and calf worth $100, and also two heifers, need not make a selection of the cow and calf, to entitle him, on the ground that they were exempt, to recover in an action against an officer who levied upon and sold them, since the cow and calf were primarily exempt without a selection, and the officer was bound to take notice thereof; although, if the debtor had not owned a cow and calf, the heifers would have been exempt. The provision of the statute relating to sale in case of selection of a cow and calf worth more than $60 was held to apply only where the debtor had more than two of the kind named.

Under the above circumstances it was held that the debtor need not offer to deliver either of the heifers or other property to the officer in lieu of the cow and calf, to entitle him to recover the value of the latter from the officer. Ibid.

Also in Everett v. Herrin, 46 Me. 357, 74 Am. Dec. 455, under a statute exempting from attachment and execution "one or two horses not exceeding in value $100," and allowing the debtor to elect which of the horses shall be exempt if the two exceed that sum in value, it was held that there was no right or duty of election where the debtor had two horses, one of the value of $80 and the other of the value of more than $100, the former being exempt by law, without election by the debtor. The right of election was said to exist only where the two horses are of greater aggregate value than $100, but neither of them of that value.

If the aggregate value of the debtor's property, exclusive of the property specifically exempt from execution, does not exceed the amount in value to which he is entitled as exempt, the debtor will be considered as having selected such property, as against an officer who levies upon it without first notifying the debtor of the execution, unless by the act of the debtor the giving of such notice is rendered impracticable. Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333.

III. Necessity of tendering other property.

The decisions are in conflict as to whether it is necessary for the debtor, if he has property subject to levy other than that levied upon, to make a tender of the other property to the officer as a condition of selecting that levied upon as exempt. On the one hand are the following cases holding that such tender is not necessary, if the debtor has not concealed or disposed of the other property, so as to prevent a levy thereon: Ross v. Hannah, 18 Ala. 125; Bray v. Laird, 44 Ala. 295; Madera v. Holdrege, 4 Colo. App. 126, 35 Pac. 52; Thibault v. Lennon, 39 Or. 280, 87 Am. St. Rep. 657, 64 Pac. 449; Nelson v. Oium, 21 S. D. 541, 114 N. W. 691. See also Atkinson v. Gatcher, 23 Ark. 101, and Filion v. Chabot, Rap. Jud. Quebec, 9 C. S. 327.

In Madera v. Holdrege, 4 Colo. App. 132, 35 Pac. 52, the court said: "There is no known principle of law under which an officer can force a person against whom he holds a process to aid him in discovering property, nor can he use his process as a club for the purposes of extracting the information. If it happens that at the time he attempts to make his levy, the property which he is about to seize is exempt under the statute, the defendant may insist on his rights, and his negligence or his refusal even to point out other property will not clothe the officer with the power to take that around which the statute has thrown its protecting arm." It was, however, conceded that a different rule might apply if the debtor fraudulently concealed the other property.

On the other hand, in some of the states the debtor is required to surrender or tender other property subject to levy and sale in lieu of that levied upon, if he selects the latter as exempt, and such selection is necessary to render it exempt: Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 395, 7 Pac. 838 (at least where the other property is of the same kind); Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333; People use of Gregg v. Palmer, 46 Ill. 398, 95 Am. Dec. 418; Smothers v. Holly, 47 Ill. 331 (holding also that the fact that the other property was subject to a chattel mortgage did not excuse the debtor's failure to tender it to the officer in lieu of that levied upon); Bonnell v. Bowman, 53 Ill. 460; McMasters v. Alsop, 85 Ill. 157; Udell v. Howard, 28 Ill. App. 124; People v. Zingraf, 43 Ill. App. 339; Johnson v. Larcade, 110 Ill. App. 611 (express statutory provision requiring the debtor, after making a selection, to "deliver the remainder to the officer having the writ"); McGee v. Anderson, 1 B. Mon. 187, 36 Am. Dec. 570. See also Yates v. Gransbury, 9 Colo. 323, 12 Pac. 206, where, however, there was an attempt to conceal the other property.

It is the duty of the debtor, in case he claims the property levied upon as exempt, to give the officer having the execution a description of his other property upon which the levy may be made. MacVeagh v. Bailey, 29 Ill. App. 606; Bingham v. Maxcy, 15 Ill. 290.

The grounds for requiring the debtor, in case he is not present at the time of the levy, and afterwards selects the property levied upon as exempt, to tender other property of the same kind in lieu of that levied upon, were thus stated in Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 395, 7 Pac. 838: "It is quite proper to give the debtor a reasonable time within which to make his selection of that which he will claim; but if he does not do so at the time a levy is made, the opportunities and temptations to dispose of property not levied upon, or place it beyond the pale of the law, and then claim as exempt that which has been taken in execution, becomes great, and if yielded to may result in a fraud upon creditors. If the exemption is claimed at the time of levy, there being other property of the same kind not claimed, it is reasonable to suppose the officer holding on execution will levy upon that not claimed, and his opportunity to do so should not be abridged by reason of the claims of exemption being asserted at a later date." The court, however, limited the rule to the particular facts before it; namely, where the other property was of the same kind as that taken, the debtor in this instance claiming the two horses taken on execution as exempt, but not tendering in lieu thereof other horses which he owned.

In Pyett v. Rhea, 6 Heisk. 136, the court said that the debtor might make his election at any time before the day of sale upon tendering to the officer the other property of like kind in his possession at the time of the levy.

And in Ross v. Lister, 14 Tex. 469, it was said that the officer was not at liberty to release a levy upon a slave unless a sufficiency of other property was tendered.

Under a statute exempting from execution one work beast or yoke of oxen, where a debtor owned two horses and a yoke of oxen, and execution was levied upon one of the horses, and before the sale the debtor tendered the other horse to the officer, to be sold in lieu of that levied upon, which he elected to keep, the court, in McGee v. Anderson, 1 B. Mon. 187, 36 Am. Dec. 570, held that, assuming that the debtor had the right to elect on the day of the sale, and before the sale, the officer was not liable for refusing to surrender the horse levied upon because it did not appear that the horse tendered was of equal value with that taken by the officer, or was of sufficient value to discharge the debt; the rule being laid down that the officer's proceeding to sell the property levied on would not be wrongful so as to make him a trespasser ab initio, unless the debtor tendered to him for sale, in lieu of that levied on, such other articles as he might in the first instance have seized for the satisfaction of the debt, or so much thereof as was certainly and palpably sufficient to discharge the debt, or was at least equal in value to the article claimed to be exempt.

To entitle a debtor to claim as exempt a horse levied on under an execution, it is not necessary that he bring from another county and surrender to the officer other horses owned by him, so that they might be subjected to the levy. Anderson v. Ege, 44 Minn. 216, 46 N. W. 362.

But in Robinson v. Myers, 3 Dana, 441, under a statute exempting from execution one work beast, it was held that a debtor who owned and had under his control two work beasts, one within and one without the state, was not entitled to claim as exempt the one within the state without offering to substitute the other under the execution.

The debtor may be excused from definitely designating and delivering to the officer the other property upon which he desires the levy to be made in lieu of that levied upon, if the officer refuses to levy upon the other property. Fatheree v. Williams, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 430, 35 S. W. 324.

And where the officer, in levying an execution, did not make a general demand on the debtor to turn out property, but went to the debtor's house especially to get a team, which was specifically exempt, for the purpose of levying thereon, and so stated to the debtor, and, in spite of the debtor's claim that the team was exempt, levied on and sold the same, it was held in Shear v. Reynolds, 90 Ill. 238, that the officer was liable for the statutory penalty without regard to what other property the debtor might have owned, as the action of the officer was a virtual denial to the debtor of any opportunity either to make a selection or to produce other property.

So, if the debtor is unable to deliver to the sheriff other property demanded by the officer as a condition of the debtor's selecting that as exempt which has been levied upon, by reason of the fact that the other property is held by another sheriff in another county, the judgment creditor having caused two executions to different counties to be issued, and property of the debtor levied upon in each county, the officer will not be justified in selling the selected property. Keefer v. Guffin, 38 Ill. App. 622.

A debtor is not required to tender other property as a condition of asserting a claim of exemption to that levied upon if he has no more property than the law allows him as exempt (Vaughan v. Thompson, 17 Ill. 78), or if the property taken is specifically exempt, and the officer, before seizing it, is notified of the claim of exemption (Amend v. Murphy, 69 Ill. 337).

And the law was declared to be, in Vaughan v. Thompson, supra, that the debtor under such circumstances did not forfeit his right to the property levied upon by mere prevarication, pretending that he had when he did not have other property; but that if the officer sold the property levied upon under the belief and pretense that the debtor had other property which he neglected or refused to surrender in lieu of that taken, he must sell at his own peril of the truth as it might be shown to be.

IV. Time for selection.

a. In general; reasonable time.

Where, at the time of the levy, the debtor claimed his exemptions, but refused to select the articles which he desired to retain, alleging that he desired to consult counsel as to the legal effect of a former appraisal of the same goods, it was held in Elliot v. Flanigan, 37 Pa. 425, that the officer should have permitted him, upon his request so to do, to make the selection the following morning.

The selection by the debtor under a statute exempting $100 worth of property suited to his position in life, to be selected by him, should be made before the levy, or when he has notice thereof. Amend v. Smith, 87 Ill. 198.

The selection of the exempt property should be made by the debtor at the time of the levy, if he is present, or, if not present, he should make the selection and notify the officer thereof within a reasonable time after the levy. Frost v. Shaw, 3 Ohio St. 270. See also to a similar effect, Borland v. O'Neal, 22 Cal. 504; Gavitt v. Doub, 23 Cal. 78; Zielke v. Morgan, 50 Wis. 560, 7 N. W. 651; and Brooks v. Hathaway, 8 Hun, 290.

So, in White v. Thompson, 3 Or. 115 the rule was laid down that, under the statute of that state, property could not be claimed by the debtor as exempt from execution unless selected and reserved by him at the time of the levy, or before sale and within a reasonable time after the levy is made known to him, it being too late for one knowing of the levy from the first to set up the claim after sale.

And in Smith v. Slade, 57 Barb. 637, it was said that if the articles enumerated by the statute as exempt within the value of $250 exceeded that limit, the debtor might elect the property he would have exempted if the election was made within a reasonable time.

In Borland v. O'Neal, 22 Cal. 504, and Gavitt v. Doub, 23 Cal. 78, delays of four and five months respectively on the part of the debtor in claiming the exemption were regarded as warranting the conclusion that the debtor had waived his right of selection. In the former case, however, there was the additional circumstance that the debtor had, after the levy and before the commencement of the suit, disposed of other personal property. The court said that what would constitute a reasonable time would depend upon the particular circumstances of each case; but that the delay in this instance greatly exceeded a reasonable time, especially as the debtor showed no excuse for the delay, or good reason why the selection was not previously made; but that there might be cases where notice of the selection, given at any time before the sale, would be sufficient, as where it appeared that no injury had been caused by the delay.

So, in Brooks v. Hathaway, 8 Hun, 290, the debtor, who, at the time of the levy, had three or four other wagons besides that levied on and sold by the defendant, did not claim the property levied on as exempt until more than a month after he had knowledge of the levy, in the meantime disposing of his other wagons; and it was held error to instruct as matter of law that the debtor was entitled to recover, and to refuse to submit to the jury the question whether he was not prevented from recovering from the officer damages for the sale of the wagon by reason of the length of time which elapsed before he claimed it as exempt.

A delay of ten weeks before attempting to make a selection of the exemptions, after an assignment for the benefit of creditors of all the debtor's property except that which was exempt, was held in Bong v. Parmentier, 87 Wis. 129, 58 N. W. 243, to be an unreasonable delay and a waiver of the right to the exemptions.

In Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 395, 7 Pac. 838, it was held that a notice to the officer that the debtor claimed the two horses levied upon as exempt from execution, given six days after the levy, the debtor not being present at the time of the levy, would be deemed to have been made in time, in the absence of a showing to the contrary. The court said it was not incumbent upon the debtor to make the election at the date of the levy, for, so far as appeared, he was not present thereat; but it devolved upon him to do so within a reasonable time after notice of the levy.

Where a debtor had two cows, one of which was exempt from execution, it was held in Savage v. Davis, 134 Mass. 401, that if the debtor had the right to elect, after the levy and removal of the animals, which he would claim as exempt, his election must be made within a reasonable time; and that whether he had exercised his right of election within a reasonable time was a question for the jury. It was said that the election must be made so promptly as not to mislead the officer into the belief that the debtor acquiesces in the selection which has been made; and that if the election is not made by the debtor within a reasonable time, and the officer, in good faith, makes an election for the debtor, the latter is bound by the officer's election. The contention was rejected that the debtor could make an election at any time before the sale.

In Savage v. Davis, supra, it was found that the debtor had not made an election within a reasonable time, where the election was made on the day of sale, six days after L.R.A.1915D.

the property had been removed from the debtor's premises, and seven days after it had been seized.

Where the debtor had a pair of oxen and also a horse, and was entitled to retain the oxen or horse as exempt, it was said in Colson v. Wilson, 58 Me. 416, that the debtor "must signify his wishes to the officer, when the attachment is made, if he has the opportunity to do so; otherwise he will be deemed to have waived his right thereafterwards to hold the property as exempt from attachment and execution."

But if the officer fails to give notice to the debtor of the execution and of the intended levy, it was said, in Cook v. Scott, 6 Ill. 333, that the debtor has the right, after the levy, to make a selection of the property taken on execution if it is such as, before the levy, he might have selected, the same as he could have done before the levy.

And the fact that the debtor at the time of the levy does not select the property which he claims as exempt does not deprive him of the right subsequently to claim the property levied on as exempt, where the statute provides that when an officer is about to levy an execution upon property any part of which is claimed as exempt, he shall demand of the debtor that he make a selection of the property claimed by him as exempt, if the officer, although the debtor claims the property levied on as exempt, makes no request of the debtor to select the property, and gives him no notice that it is his duty or privilege to do so. Bank of Gulfport v. O'Neal, 86 Miss. 45, 38 So. 630.

A debtor need not wait until an attachment is attempted to make a selection, where he owns two horses, only one of which he is entitled to claim as exempt. George v. Bassett, 54 Vt. 217, where it was held that the debtor had made a selection by giving a bill of sale to secure a note previous to the attachment, the horse for which the bill of sale was given being described as exempt.

And a debtor is not precluded from making a selection of exempt property, as against an existing debt, before an execution is issued or a judgment rendered, by a statute providing that a person entitled to exemption does not waive his right thereto by failing to select exempt property or to object to a levy thereon unless he fails or neglects to do so when required in writing by the officer about to levy thereon. Grover v. Younie, 110 Iowa, 446, 81 N. W. 684. In this instance the debtor was held to have selected his exemptions by giving a chattel mortgage, in which his wife did not join, on other property, a statute providing that a mortgage of personal property which might be held exempt from execution should not be valid unless signed by both the husband and wife.

Where, in levying an attachment upon four head of horses, two of which the debtor might claim as exempt, the officer did not request the debtor to select his exemption and point out the animals to be levied upon, as provided by the statute, it was held, in Hall v. Miller, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 336, 51 S. W. 26, that the debtor had the right to make the selection of the exemptions at the time of the trial of the action in which the attachment was issued.

If the debtor is absent at the time of the levy of the attachment, he may make the selection after his return and notice of the attachment; at least, if he is not purposely absent to avoid notice to make the selection. Haskins v. Bennett, 41 Vt. 698.

Under the Minnesota statute providing that when a levy is made on property of any class or species which is exempt from execution to a specified amount or value, the officer levying the execution may make an inventory of the property, and cause the same to be appraised, and that, "such inventory being completed," the debtor may select property not exceeding the amount or value exempt, but that, if the debtor does not make the selection, the officer shall make the same, the debtor has no right to make the selection until the inventory and appraisal are made, for which a reasonable time should be allowed. Tullis v. Orthwein, 5 Minn. 377, Gil. 305.

The debtor is not required to make a selection until after an appraisal of the property has been made. Kelley v. McFadden, 80 Ind. 536.

The time for the debtor to elect whether he would retain real or personal property, was said in Bowman v. Smiley, 31 Pa. 225, 72 Am. Dec. 738, to be after the appraisers had been summoned.

See also Seaman v. Luce, under II. a. supra.

b. Before sale.

The rule has been laid down that the debtor may select his exemptions at any time before the sale of the property levied upon, if he has not, by refusal to select or by other acts or declarations, waived his rights. Ross v. Hannah, 18 Ala. 125; Rice v. Nolan, 33 Kan. 28, 5 Pac. 437; State ex rel. Fulkerson v. Emmerson, 74 Mo. 607; Pyett v. Rhea, 6 Heisk. 136 (an instruction being approved that whether the debtor selected the horse in controversy before the levy made no difference, as he had the right to claim it at any time before the sale). See also Madera v. Holdrege, 4 Colo. App. 126, 35 Pac. 52, the court saying that the authorities generally hold that the selection may be made at any time prior to the sale.

The debtor has the right to make the selection before the property is sold, although after the sale has commenced. State ex rel. Fulkerson v. Emmerson, 74 Mo. 607. But see State v. Boulden, 57 Md. 314, and Miles v. State, 73 Md. 398, 21 Atl. 51, where the rule was laid down that the selection must be made before the sale has commenced, or the debtor will be deemed to have waived his rights.

time before sale, the right to select property attached as exempt is not cut off by the order of sale in the attachment proceedings. Close v. Sinclair, 38 Ohio St. 530.

If the officer deprives the debtor of the opportunity to make a selection of the exemptions before a sale of the property, the debtor may elect to take the property sold and sue for its value. Stilson v. Gibbs, 53 Mich. 280, 18 N. W. 815.

In McCluskey v. McNeely, 8 Ill. 578, it was said that if the officer, as it is his duty to do, notifies the debtor before the levy is made, that he has the execution and is about to levy, the selection should be made before the levy; but if the officer does not notify the debtor before the levy, the selection may be made and notice given at any reasonable time before the sale.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE, & ST. PAUL RAILWAY COMPANY, Respnt.

Eminent domain — liability of successor of wrongdoer.

The lien for compensation provided by

Note.— Liability of successor of railroad company for damages to abutting property from construction of road in street.

E. 87, which holds that where a railroad company builds its road in a street, and thereby injures access to, and damages, a lot abutting on the street, such damage is original and permanent, and the company building the road is liable, but a company subsequently leasing and operating the road is not liable, therefor.

The cases used by the court in APPEL v. CHICAGO, M. & ST. P. R. Co. in arriving at its decision are sufficiently set out in the opinion of that case.

the Constitution for injury to abutting property by the location of a railroad in a street may be enforced against the property in the hands of a successor in title of the corporation which located the road, if it undertakes to operate the same, without making the predecessor a party to the proceeding.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Pennington County, overruling a motion for new trial in an action brought to recover damages for alleged interference with the use and enjoyment of plaintiff's property which resulted in a judgment in favor of defendant. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Schrader & Lewis, for appellant:

Where a railroad corporation has taken or damaged property without paying therefor, and then conveyed its railroad to a second corporation, which continues to operate the road, the person damaged may sue the latter corporation without joining the first.

Messrs. Robert Burton and Porter & Grantham for respondent.

Polley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, who is also appellant, is the owner of a number of town lots, with a dwelling house thereon, facing upon one of the streets in Rapid City. The building is occupied by plaintiff and her family as a residence. In her complaint she alleges that, while she was the owner of, and so occupying, said premises, and about the year 1907, the defendant, together with its predecessor in interest, the White River Valley Railway Company, located and constructed a railroad along and upon said street in front of plaintiff's said lots and dwelling house, and ever since said time has operated said railroad along said street throughout its entire length, thereby rendering said street wholly impassable for vehicles and traffic, and destroying all means of egress and ingress to and from said lots, and diminishing the amount of light and air to which she would be otherwise entitled as an appurtenance to said premises; that, although defendant is vested with the right of eminent domain, no steps have ever been taken by defendant to ascertain the amount of damage caused plaintiff by the construction and operation of said railway; and that such construction and operation of said railway are without right or payment therefor. Plaintiff asks judgment that she recover damage in the sum of $1,000, and that such judgment be declared a first lien upon said railway and its appurtenances, and that, if said judgment be not paid within a time to be fixed by the court, said railway and appurtenances be sold to satisfy the same. The defendant, by its answer, denied that the property had been damaged $1,000, or any sum in excess of $75, and alleged that defendant had acquired said railway and right of way after the railway had been constructed and was in use, for value and without any notice or knowledge of plaintiff's claim; that said right of way had been acquired from, and full compensation made therefor to, the rightful owner thereof; and that plaintiff acquired her interest in said lots subject to defendant's right of way and right to use the same, and after full compensation had been made therefor.

It appeared as a fact that, prior to the construction of the said railroad, the city council had, by ordinance, granted the said White River Valley Company the right to construct and operate said railroad along and over the said street.

At the trial, and while plaintiff was putting in her evidence, it appeared as a fact that the said White River Valley Railway Company owned said railroad and operated the same from the time of its construction—some time about the year 1907—to about April, 1910, when it was sold and transferred to defendant, who had operated it since that time. Upon this state of the case, defendant moved the court to dismiss the action, upon the ground: "That it appears by the testimony now in evidence before the court that the injury to the property, if any, was suffered at a time prior to the ownership or any interest of the defendant company in the property; that the injury was done by another than the defendant in court, and presumably by the grantor of the defendant, the White River Valley Railroad Company; the damage having been done by the White River Valley Railroad Company, and cause of action having matured at the time of the injury, therefore, the defendant now in court is not liable to the plaintiff on account thereof, and for the foreclosure of any lien for damages by reason of such injury, the White River Valley Railway Company is a necessary party under the record in this case, and the action cannot be maintained as against the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Company alone."

This motion was granted, and judgment entered dismissing the case at plaintiff's cost. A motion for new trial was overruled, and plaintiff appeals.

Defendant does not question plaintiff's title to the lots involved; neither does plaintiff claim to be the owner of the fee to the street, and is not trying to recover for the increased burden placed thereon by the construction and operation of the railroad. Her claim to damage is based solely upon the interference with the use and enjoyment of her said dwelling house and the lots upon which it stands. The damage claimed therefor is consequential, rather than for a taking of any of her property; but that she has been damaged in the use and enjoyment of her property, to some extent, by the construction and operation of the railroad, is admitted. It must also be conceded that the damage is what is known as original and permanent damage, and not a case of a continuing nuisance, giving rise to a new cause of action from day to day during the continuance of the nuisance. This leaves for consideration but the single question: May the plaintiff recover her damage from the defendant (the present owner of the railroad), or must such damage, if recovered at all, be from the White River Valley Railway Company, the company that owned the same at the time of, and for some time following, its construction?

The measure of plaintiff's damage is the difference between the value of the property immediately before and immediately after the construction of the railroad. This having been done by the White River Valley Railway Company, it was this company, of course, that caused the damage; and, under respondent's theory, it is from this company alone that recovery can be had; respondent contending that it is not liable for damages caused by its predecessor. In this position respondent claims to be supported by the weight of authority, and cites and relies upon the following authorities: Guinn v. Ohio River R. Co. 46 W. Va. 151, 76 Am. St. Rep. 806, 33 S. E. 87; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Anderson, 65 Kan. 202, 69 Pac. 158; Denver & S. F. R. Co. v. Hannegan, 43 Colo. 122, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) L.R.A.1915D.

874, 127 Am. St. Rep. 100, 95 Pac. 343; and Frankle v. Jackson (C. C.) 30 Fed. 398.

While it is true that these cases appear to support respondent's contention, it is also true that none of them present the same situation as the case at bar. In Guinn v. Ohio River R. Co. the railroad causing the damage was constructed by one company under a license from the city, and, after it had been operated for some time, was leased to another company. The action was against the lessee. The court held that "a lessee railroad company is not liable for a completed tort of its lessor railroad company," and that the lessor was liable if either was. In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Anderson the railroad causing the damage was constructed and put into operation by one company under a license from the city, and thereafter leased to another company. The action was brought against the lessee alone. The court reversed the judgment against the lessee, but the reversal seems to be based upon the ground that there had been no change of ownership of the road, the court saying: "In this case there was never any change of ownership, but, on the contrary, the company which laid down the track in 1889 owned it at the time this action was commenced in the court below, and when the defendant in error obtained judgment against the Santa Fé Company"—clearly implying that, had the defendant taken by purchase instead of by lease, plaintiff might have recovered.

In Denver & S. F. R. Co. v. Hannegan, 43 Colo. 129, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 877, 127 Am. St. Rep. 100, 95 Pac. 343, the railroad was constructed under a permit of the city council, and, after being operated for a period of five years by the company that constructed it, was sold to the defendant, who immediately leased it to a third company, who was operating it at the time the action was commenced. It also appeared that, some time after the commencement of the action, but prior to the trial, the rails and ties used in the construction of the road were torn up and removed, and the street was entirely abandoned for railway purposes. Plaintiff had judgment, which, on appeal, was reversed, the court saying: "Where, as in the case at bar, nothing appears in the record either by pleadings or proofs tending to show that the sale was made upon inadequate consideration, or that it was characterized by bad faith in any manner, the purchaser takes the property without liability for the payment of the vendor's unsecured debts. 'Where a corporation transfers all of its assets to another corporation, which does not agree to assume the liabilities of the selling corporation, and both corporations maintain a separate existence, then, in the absence of fraud, the purchasing corporation will not be answerable for any debts of the selling corporation,"—citing 10 Cyc. 1268; Goldmark v. Magnolia Metal Co. 44 App. Div. 35, 60 N. Y. Supp. 425; Brundred v. Rice, 49 Ohio St. 650, 34 Am. St. Rep. 589, 32 N. E. 169; Montgomery Web Co. v. Dienelt, 133 Pa. 585, 19 Am. St. Rep. 663, 19 Atl. 429.

The court was not satisfied to rest its conclusion upon this ground alone, however, and emphasized the fact that the action was not commenced for more than six years after the construction of the road; that, at the time of the purchase by the Denver & Santa Fé Company, it had no notice or knowledge that plaintiff claimed compensation from the company that constructed the road; nor that either of the defendants had any intimation of such claim until the commencement of the action. In Frankle v. Jackson a railroad was so constructed and operated on one of the streets of the city as to damage the abutting property of the plaintiff. Thereafter, but prior to the commencement of the action, the road was placed in the hands of a receiver, and plaintiff named the receiver as defendant. The court went no further, so far as the case at bar is concerned, than to hold that the receiver was a proper party defendant, although the question of proper parties defendant was not at issue in the case. In none of these cases is any reference made to the constitutional rights involved; nor, in fact, can it be inferred from anything said in any of these decisions, that the states where such decisions were rendered have constitutional provisions similar to § 13, art. 6, of our Constitution. This section reads as follows: "Private property shall not be taken for public use, or damaged, without just compensation as determined by a jury, which shall be paid as soon as it can be ascertained, and before possession is taken."

Under this provision, plaintiff was entitled to compensation for the injury caused by the construction and operation of the railroad. She was entitled to such compensation from the White River Valley Railway Company; and, because such compensation was not paid, that company, so far as the rights of this plaintiff are concerned, was a trespasser, and was invading her rights so long as it continued to operate the road. It acquired no rights as against her, and, as against her, it could convey no rights to its grantee and successor in interest. When the defendant took over and assumed the operation of the railroad, it became an independent trespasser. It was L.R.A.1915D.

as much a wrongdoer as its predecessor had been while it was operating the road, and under the same obligation to compensate plaintiff that its predecessor had been. Any other rule would enable a person or company to appropriate another's property, either by actual taking or damaging, and then, by sale or other disposition, leave the damaged party wholly remediless. It is conceded by respondent that the railroad property, when conveyed to it, was subject to a lien for the amount of plaintiff's damage, and no reason is suggested why such damage cannot be assessed and such lien foreclosed without the presence, as a party defendant, of the respondent's predecessor in interest. It is not claimed that the road was sold to respondent under any warranties against claims for damages such as plaintiff's, and, if it were, such warranties could in no wise affect the rights of the plaintiff. If the presence of such predecessor became necessary in order to adjust the rights between it and the defendant, then it would be incumbent upon the respondent, and not upon the plaintiff, to bring such predecessor into the case. This not only seems consonant with right and justice, but in harmony with the trend of modern judicial opinion. Penn Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Heiss, decided by the Supreme Court of Illinois, 141 Ill. 35, 33 Am. St. Rep. 273, 31 N. E. 138, is a leading case in support of this doctrine. After the injury complained of had been caused, the railroad causing the same was sold to plaintiff in error. After the sale, suit was brought and judgment recovered against plaintiff in error alone for the recovery of damages to abutting property. The contention was made, just as it is made here, that the action could not be maintained against plaintiff in error without joining with it the company that had owned the railroad when the damage was caused. The judgment was sustained, the court, in the course of the opinion, saying: "Private property is by the constitutional guaranty secured against being thus damaged for such public use without compensation. Therefore, to hold that a railroad may occupy the streets of a city, and thereby damage the private property of abutting or adjacent lot owners, and, by reason of alienation or its insolvency, may continue the occupancy and infliction of the injury without indemnifying such owner, is to render the constitutional provision nugatory, and the safeguard specifically intended by the people to be thrown around the citizen in the protection of the right of private property is rendered of no avail. It may be, as we have before seen it has been held, that the citizen is remediless until the damage has actually occurred, and by appropriate remedy he has determined the extent and amount thereof; but when the damages are ascertained in the mode provided by law, the right of the lot owner to the payment of the same as compensation is guaranteed to him by the Constitution as a condition to the continued appropriation of the street to the public use whereby the injury to his private property is inflicted. As we have seen, it is not in the power of the railroad, by alienation or otherwise, to defeat this constitutional guaranty; and the alienee, purchaser, or successor will be required to take notice of the provisions restricting the power to take or damage private property for public use, and be held to take subject to the burden cast upon the railroad by, through, or under which the interest is acquired. It by no means follows, as seems to have been supposed in some of the cases, that a right of action would exist against the new company, who might, as successor to the original railroad company, become possessed of the franchise and property; but when a mortgagee or a successor company insists upon a continuation of the use, or where there is an appropriation of that part of the railroad whereby the damage has been occasioned, the right of the lot owner to compensation out of the res is absolute."

Ft. Scott, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fox, 42 Kan. 490, 22 Pac. 583, is a case where one company was sought to be held liable for damages caused by the construction and operation of a railway that had been constructed by a preceding company in a public street. In the course of the opinion, the court said: "The principal contention of the plaintiff in error is that it cannot be held liable in any way for these damages, for the reason that the road was built, and the nuisance created, by the St. Louis, Ft. Scott & Wichita Railroad Company. It is true that a sale made as alleged would convey a title to the purchasing company free from all claims for the general debts of the old company, but the liability for either the creation or continuance of the nuisance does not fall within that class. The old company was a wrongdoer, and had acquired no right to deprive Fox of the use of the street as a means of access to his lots. The company had made no compensation for this appurtenant to his property, nor had he in any way released or waived his claim for damages. The old company, having no right in this appurtenant, could convey none, nor could the claim for the continuing wrong and injury be devested by a sale under the mortgage foreclosure. If the owner had consented to the appropriation in any way, or had stood silent for a long time, with knowledge of the occupancy, a different question would arise; but in this case he promptly pressed his claim for damages against the old company, and, when the transfer of the property and franchises was made, he as promptly adapted his pleadings to the change of ownership, and proceeded against the new company. There has been neither waiver nor payment of the claim for damages. The obstruction and nuisance has been continued by the purchasing company, and, while it cannot be held liable for the wrongdoing of the old company, it cannot escape liability for the injury inflicted after it purchased and took possession of the road. The blocking of the street and continuance of the nuisance by the new company is as great an injury to the lot owner as though that company had originally built the road and created the nuisance. It might have limited its liability if, after taking possession of the road, it had restored the street to its former condition, or to such a condition as not materially to impair its usefulness as a means of access to and from the property. Assuming the facts to be as stated, the company has chosen to block and appropriate the entire street for its own purpose, and both the company and the owner have treated the appropriation as a permanent one. For this permanent appropriation the plaintiff in error must respond in damages if the proof sustains the averments of the petition."

And in Stickley v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 93 Ky. 323, 20 S. W. 261, the court of appeals of Kentucky said: "It seems to us there can be no good reason assigned for relieving a vendee from all liability for an injury that amounts to an invasion of another's property, where his possession is based upon no other title than a tortious entry by his vendor. The act of the vendor in appropriating the property being wrongful, that of his lessee is equally so; and, while the lessee may not be liable for the mode of the original entry, he is nevertheless liable for appropriating this property to his own use. There is no question of limitation involved in this case. A railroad company which enters upon and appropriates the land of another to its own use, without right, cannot transfer its corporate privileges to another, so as to justify a continuance of the wrong in its vendee, as if the latter were an innocent purchaser. It is a taking, in both instances, without compensation being previously made to the owner. . . . But where the proximity of the road to the dwelling is such as to prevent the reasonable ingress and egress to and from the premises, or to cause necessarily soot and cinders to enter the dwelling, then it becomes a taking of private property for public use, and for which compensation must be made. Fulton v. Short Route R. & Transfer Co. 85 Ky. 640, 7 Am. St. Rep. 619, 4 S. W. 332; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Finley, 86 Ky. 294, 5 S. W. 753. Lewis, Eminent Domain, says: 'No right can be acquired in private property under the power of eminent domain, except subject to the duty of making just compensation therefor; consequently the party originally taking or occupying the property cannot transfer to another, by lease or otherwise, any right in the property, except subject to the same duty.'

And in line with these decisions is the decision of this court, Faulk v. Missouri River & N. W. R. Co. 28 S. D. 13, 132 N. W. 233, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1130, an action to recover for a right of way across plaintiff's land that had been appropriated by defendant's predecessor in interest more than sixteen years before the commencement of the action. In the majority opinion written by Corson, J., the court say: "It seems also to be well settled that the present railway company, defendant, is legally and equitably liable as the successor of the former company for the value of the premises used by it belonging to the plaintiff, and that before it can legally occupy and possess the same for its railroad purposes, it must satisfy the claim of the plaintiff for its value. This rule seems to be established upon the principle that the present railway company is no more entitled to occupy and use the premises without paying for the same than was its predecessor. Its use of the premises is therefore without right as against the plaintiff, and the present railway company and the trust company, as trustee in the mortgage for the bonds issued, clearly hold their interest therein subject to the superior right and claim of the plaintiff to be paid for the premises owned by him."

While that was an action to recover for the physical taking of the property, and this is an action based upon the interference with the owner's occupancy and enjoyment of his property, the principle governing in both cases is the same. In each case the present owner of the road is attempting to profit by the tortious acts of its predecessor. Respondent undertakes to distinguish that case from the case at bar, arguing that "defendant company was in possession of the plaintiff's property without title. The plaintiff had not lost his right to injunction or his remedy by ejectment, and could have had either except for the public interest involved."

But this argument refutes itself, for, because of the "public interest involved," neither remedy was available to the plain-L.R.A.1915D.

tiff. The same is true of the case at bar. In fact, the two cases are quite analogous, and the principle applicable to one is applicable to the other. On the whole, it seems to us that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant for the depreciation in the value of her property caused by the construction and operation of the railroad in question, and that the trial court was in error in not submitting the case to the jury.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

KNOXVILLE BANKING & TRUST COMPANY.

RAND POWDER COMPANY, Intervener,
Appt.

(130 Tenn. 336, 170 S. W. 476.)

Bank — deposit of checks in insolvent bank — stopping payment.

1. One who has deposited checks on account in an insolvent bank is not prevented from having payment on them stopped and reclaiming them from the bank's receiver, by the fact that they have been forwarded to a correspondent bank and credited to the account of the insolvent one, if the correspondent makes no claim to them.

Same — set-off by indorser of note of insolvent maker.

2. A depositor in an insolvent bank who has indorsed a note discounted by it cannot, after he has been indemnified by the maker, set off his liability against the deposit account, although the maker is insolvent.

Note. — Rights, against receiver, as to paper deposited before, but not collected at the time, the bank closed its doors.

I. In general, 402.

II. Where title to paper passed to bank by the terms of the deposit contract, 404.

III. Where officers of bank knew of its insolvency at time of deposit, 404.

IV. Where unauthorized act of bank had given it apparent title, 406.

I. In general.

This note has reference to the closing of the bank where the deposit was made, and

A PPEAL by intervener from a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County denying its claim filed in a proceeding to wind up the affairs of the defendant bank as an insolvent corporation, to an equitable set-off of its deposit account in the bank against its liability on a note held by the bank. Affirmed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Bowen & Anderson, for appellant:

Petitioner is entitled to reclaim the checks deposited by it so long as they can be found, or to reclaim the proceeds of said checks so long as it is able to identify them and separate them from the general funds of the bank.

does not include the questions that arise where a correspondent bank closes its doors and the bank of deposit does not.

The question of trusts in proceeds of collections made by a bank when insolvent was considered in notes to Sayles v. Cox, 32 L.R.A. 715, and American Nat. Bank v. Pedley, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 146. The principles underlying the cases cited in these notes are the principles upon which the cases cited in the present note are based. The present note is, however, more limited in its scope than the earlier notes, in that it includes no cases in which it appears that the collection of the paper was complete before the bank ceased to transact business. This limitation is important for the reason that in most cases the collection is regarded as complete when the bank has parted with the paper and received value, even though the value consists in the payment of its own debt to another bank. The courts sometimes state this point in another way. They say that if a correspondent bank has, in good faith, and without notice of the owner's equity, entered credit to the deposit bank for the paper, and the account between the banks is such that the receiver cannot and does not receive the proceeds of the paper, the owner has no preference over other creditors of the insolvent bank, for the reason that he cannot trace the fund into the receiver's hands. See Willoughby v. Weinberger, 15 Okla. 226, 79 Pac. 777, as cited under III. infra, as illustrating this point. This is but another way of saying that the paper was collected, so far as the fund for distribution is concerned, before the bank closed its doors. The question whether or not the correspondent bank is liable under such circumstances is not here considered. See cases cited in the earlier notes. Another limitation upon the scope of the present note is that it covers only the rights of depositors, thus excluding cases that involve paper which the bank held for collection.

The theory upon which the decisions are based is that one in possession of personal property belonging to another holds it in trust for the owner, unless the holder is an innocent purchaser for value. Obviously, title to the paper or to the proceeds in the claimant, against the receiver who represents the creditors of the insolvent bank, is a necessary condition to a recovery or to the establishment of a preferred claim on the theory of a trust. The claimant may prove title in two ways: (1) By proving that under the terms of his agreement with the bank title remained in him when the bank received the paper. (The question as to what facts will be considered sufficient to show that title to a check drawn upon another bank, and credited to the owner's deposit account, does not pass to the deposit bank, was considered in notes to Fayette Nat. Bank v. Summers, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 694, and to Plumas County Bank v. Bank of Rideout, S. & Co. 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 552. The question as to what will constitute a transfer of title is not considered in the present note.) (2) By proving that, notwithstanding the fact that the terms of the contract of deposit may have been such as to pass title to the bank, the contract was induced by the fraud of the bank officers, hence the contract was void or at least voidable. See cases cited under III. infra.

Messrs. Wright & Jones, Hugh M. Tate, and D. C. Webb for appellee.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions for decision in this case arise on the petition of intervention filed by the Rand Powder Company in this (a

Having established his title, the claimant must then show that the fund for distribution among the creditors of the insolvent bank has, after it closed its doors, been increased, or that it will be increased, by the addition of the proceeds of his paper thereto. As stated supra, this is equivalent to showing that the paper had not been collected by the bank when it closed, although the payor may or may not have paid it at that time.

Where paper is deposited in a bank and is uncollected at the time the bank closes its doors, the right of the depositor, in the absence of proof of fraud, to preference over the other depositors of the bank, depends upon the question as to whether or not title to the paper is in the claimant. Beal v. Somerville, 17 L.R.A. 291, 5 U. S. App. 14, 1 C. C. A. 598, 50 Fed. 647; Re State Bank, 56 Minn. 119, 45 Am. St. Rep. 454, 57 N. W. 336, Brusegaard v. Ueland, general creditors') proceeding, to wind up the affairs of the Knoxville Banking & Trust Company as an insolvent corporation.

The powder company deposited as cash items in the bank on December 12, 1912, three checks of its customers aggregating $1,505.24. The company had the right to check against its deposit account. On the same day the bank forwarded the three checks to its correspondent bank at Cincinnati, where they were credited in like manner in favor of the sending bank on December 13th. On the next day the Knoxville bank closed its doors. At and before the receipt by it of the three checks, it was hopelessly insolvent, and so known to be by its managing officers; and on December 16th its assets were placed in the hands of a receiver in the general creditors' cause referred to. After the receiver was appointed, the powder company telegraphed the several drawers of the checks in its favor, as payee, requests to stop payment, with the evident purpose of causing the checks to return from the banks of the drawers through the channel of transmission to the receiver of the bank of original deposit. They were charged against the Knoxville bank by its Cincinnati correspondent and returned to the receiver.

By agreement, saving the right of the par-

72 Minn. 283, 75 N. W. 228. This list of cases is not exhaustive. An exhaustive list would necessarily include cases involving paper left for collection and many other cases not within the scope of this note. But this proposition is supported by all the cases cited, infra, at least inferentially. Also see cases cited in the note to American Nat. Bank v. Pedley, as cited, supra, in support of the general proposition upon which this one is based.

II. Where title to paper passed to bank by the terms of the deposit contract.

If title to the paper passed to the bank when the amount thereof was entered as a credit to the depositor, he has no claim, in the absence of fraud or other ground for rescinding the contract, superior to that of other depositors, even though the paper had not been collected when the bank closed its doors. Gonyer v. Williams, — Cal. —, 143 Pac. 736; Terhune v. Bank of Bergen County, 34 N. J. Eq. 367; Perth Amboy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704; Williams v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 555, 37 S. W. 282; Re Bank of Madison, 5 Biss. 515, 9 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 184, Fed. Cas. No. 890; First Nat. Bank v. Armstrong, 39 Fed. 231; Franklin County Nat. Bank v. Beal, 49 Fed. 606.

And the fact that the bank was insolvent at the time the deposit was made does not change this rule, if the officers of the bank did not know of its insolvency and committed no fraud in receiving the deposit (see infra, III. for cases where the officers did know of the insolvency). Gonyer v. Williams, — Cal. —, 143 Pac. 736; Terhune v. Bank of Bergen County, 34 N. J. Eq. 367; Perth Amboy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704; Williams v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 555, 37 S. W. 282; Balback v. Frelinghuysen, 15 Fed. 675 (knowledge of cashier where defalcation caused the insolvency is not imputed to the bank).

III. Where officers of bank knew of its insolvency at time of deposit.

The question as to what will be sufficient to charge a bank with knowledge of its own insolvency is not within the scope of this note. See note to Pennington v. Third Nat. L.R.A.1915D.

Bank, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 781, on "Bank officer's knowledge of insolvency of bank resulting from his own misconduct as chargeable to the bank."

Where the deposit of paper was made at a time when the bank was insolvent to the knowledge of its officers, and the paper was not collected at the time the bank closed its doors, the depositor has the right to the paper or the proceeds thereof as against the insolvent bank and its other depositors. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 133 U. S. 566, 33 L. ed. 683, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 390; Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. 233; City Bank v. Blackmore, 21 C. C. A. 514, 43 U. S. App. 617, 75 Fed. 771 (merely a recognition of principle; see same case infra, for holding); American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227, affirming 51 Ill. App. 349; Brusegaard v. Ueland, 72 Minn. 283, 75 N. W. 228 (rule not applied for lack of proof as to officer's knowledge); Higgins v. Hayden, 53 Neb. 61, 73 N. W. 280; Perth Amboy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704; Craigie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9, 1 N. E. 537; National Citizens' Bank v. Howard, 3 How. Pr. N. S. 511; Grant v. Walsh, 145 N. Y. 502, 45 Am. St. Rep. 626, 40 N. E. 209 (see statement of holding, infra); Re Commercial Bank, 2 Ohio N. P. 170; KNAFFL v. KNOXVILLE BKG. & T. Co.

This general rule is based upon the theory that, by receiving the deposit when the officers of the bank knew it to be insolvent, a fraud was committed upon the depositor, which fact enabled the depositor to follow the paper or its proceeds as a trust fund and recover, and the fact that it had not been collected when the bank closed its doors is proof that the paper or its proceeds could be identified. American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227; Brusegaard v. Ueland, 72 Minn. 283, 75 N. W. 228 (theory not applied, but approved); Perth Amboy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704; Craigie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9, 1 N. E. 537; Importers' & T. Nat. Bank v. Peters, 123 N. Y. 272, 25 N. E. 319; *Grant v. ties in interest, the checks were collected, and their proceeds held to await the result of this litigation.

That the reception of the checks on deposit by the Knoxville bank, when it was in a condition of hopeless insolvency, known to its managing officers, was a transaction rescindable for fraud, and that the depositor may recover the checks, or their proceeds, if not dissipated or so mixed with other funds that they cannot be identified or traced, is so well settled by our cases as not to require citation.

In the pending case there is no difficulty in respect to the tracing of the deposited items; the identical checks came into the hands of the receiver after insolvency; and, nothing else appearing, the receiver took them to hold in trust for the defrauded depositor.

We are not concerned with a consideration of any claims that may have been urged had the Cincinnati bank held the checks and sought to establish right thereto. That bank evidently had no cause to withhold the checks from the Knoxville bank, and released and returned them, as has been stated.

It is insisted in behalf of the receiver that, when the checks were received and N. P. 170; KNAFFL v. KNOXVILLE BKG. & T. Co.

If this theory is adopted, it is obvious, that, as a practical matter, the question as to whether title passed to the bank or not, by the terms of the deposit, is immaterial, for if it has passed the depositor can rescind the contract on the ground of fraud. So, in KNAFFL v. KNOXVILLE BKG. & T. Co., the court does not discuss that question. And it has been directly held that in case the contract of deposit was such as to pass title to the paper, the depositor could rescind and recover the paper or its proceeds from the receiver. Wasson v. Hawkins, 59 Fed. 233; American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227, affirming 51 Ill. App. 349; Brusegaard v. Ueland, 72 Minn. 283, 75 N. W. 228 (rule not applied for lack of proof of officer's knowledge); Higgins v. Hayden, 53 Neb. 61, 73 N. W. 280; Perth Amboy Gaslight Co. v. Middlesex County Bank, 60 N. J. Eq. 84, 45 Atl. 704; Cragie v. Hadley, 99 N. Y. 131, 52 Am. Rep. 9, 1 N. E. 537; Orme v. Baker, 74 Ohio St. 337, 113 Am. St. Rep. 968, 78 N. E. 439.

And the fact that the payment of the paper was stopped at the instance of the depositor cannot affect his right to recover on this theory. American Trust & Sav. Bank v. Gueder & P. Mfg. Co. 150 Ill. 336, 37 N. E. 227, affirming 51 Ill. App. 349; National Citizens' Bank v. Howard, 3 How. Pr. N. S. 511; Grant v. Walsh, 145 N. Y. 502, 45 Am. St. Rep. 620, 40 N. E. 209 (see comment on this case, infra); KNAFFL v. KNOXVILLE BKG. & T. Co.

In Grant v. Walsh, 145 N. Y. 502, 45 Am. St. Rep. 626, 40 N. E. 209, the depositor of a check drawn and indorsed by himself stopped payment on the check upon learning of the bank's insolvency, and a bank to which the check had been sent sued him after the bank upon which the check was drawn had refused payment, and it was held that if the defendant could prove that the officers of the bank where it was deposited knew of the bank's insolvency at the time, he could rescind the contract and escape liability on the check so far as the bank had any rights. It was further held that if the correspondent bank knew of the other bank's fraud when it received the check, it was not a bona fide purchaser, and that it could not recover. This latter point is not within the scope of this note, but it shows the effect of fraud in receiving the deposit.

It should be observed here that cases like Willoughby v. Weinberger, 15 Okla. 226, 79 Pac. 777, where the bank had used the paper in settlement at the clearing house before it closed its doors, are not included herein. Neither have other cases been cited where the facts involve the same principles that are involved in the Willoughby Case, for the reason that the rights of third persons who were not parties to the fraud are involved in such manner that the equities lie between the third parties and the depositor, even though the suit is against the insolvent bank or in the form of a claim for preferment. In such cases the proceeds of the check cannot be traced into the hands of the receiver, and so far as the receiver and the general creditors are concerned, the paper had been collected and the proceeds mingled with the bank's general fund, losing its identity, before the bank closed its doors, even though the holder of the paper has not collected it from the drawee. For the purposes of this note this class of cases is regarded as if the paper had been collected before the bank was closed.

City Bank v. Blackmore, 21 C. C. A. 514, 43 U. S. App. 617, 75 Fed. 771, is another case where the suit was by the depositor against the receiver, but the equities were clearly between the depositor and the correspondent bank. The plaintiff stopped payment upon the check through the payor after the collecting bank had credited the amount thereof to the deposit bank on a balance due to the former; but after the collecting bank had attached the debt owed by the payor to the depositor, the latter ordered the payor to pay the check, which instruction was obeyed. It was held that this act was a recognition by the depositor of the legality of the collecting bank's claim to the check and its proceeds. Since neither the check nor the proceeds went to increase the fund for distribution, the depositor could not have a preferred claim against that fund.

In KNAFFL v. KNOXVILLE BKG. & T. Co. the court appears to have silently overruled Friberg v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 550, 37 S. W. 283; credited by the Cincinnati bank, the right to follow the same as trust funds was lost to the depositor company, which could not by its own volition and act stop payment of the checks, and thereby render them traceable and recoverable.

We cannot hold with this insistence. The depositor did nothing beyond its legal right. By a well-known rule of law it is required that, in order to obtain, one who has been defrauded shall act promptly in disaffirmance and self-protection, and it was within the privilege of the depositor to save itself harmless by procuring the drawers of the checks to stop payment.

The checks did not operate as assignments of any parts of their drawers' funds in their banks to the credit of the drawers. Negotiable instruments act 1899 (Laws 1899, chap. 94); Akin v. Jones, 93 Tenn. 353, 25 L.R.A. 523, 42 Am. St. Rep. 921, 27 S. W. 669.

Before payment or certification by their

Klepper v. Cox, 97 Tenn. 534, 34 L.R.A. 536, 56 Am. St. Rep. 823, 37 S. W. 284, and Bruner v. First Nat. Bank, 97 Tenn. 540, 34 L.R.A. 532, 37 S. W. 286, on one very important point. In these cases the general rule that the depositor may rescind his deposit contract because of the fraud of the bank, and recover the amount of his uncollected paper as a preferred claim, is admitted, but it is held that the mere fact that a correspondent bank had, prior to the time the bank closed, credited the amount of the paper to the deposit bank, defeats the right of the depositor to recover a preferred claim, even though the receiver collects from the correspondent bank a large balance which includes the proceeds of the paper; while the court in KNARFF v. KNOXVILLE BKG. & T. Co. holds that the right to follow the fund was not lost to the depositor by the mere fact that the correspondent bank had credited the deposit bank with the amount before the latter bank had closed its doors. A distinction could be pointed out, i. e., in the latter case payment had been stopped, the paper returned to the receiver, and the credit balanced by a charge against the insolvent bank, while in the earlier cases the actual cash passed through the correspondent bank to the receiver. But all these transactions, be it remembered, took place after the insolvent bank closed its doors, so the distinction is only apparent. In the earlier cases, especially in the Bruner Case, it is certain that the drawee had not paid the checks to the correspondent bank when the latter had notice of the other bank's closing. It seems more reasonable to infer that the court in the later case intended rather to place itself in line with the weight of authority than to make a distinction based upon transactions that took place after the rights of the parties had become fixed by the closing of the insolvent bank. The cases cited by the court fully support its new position.

banks, the drawers of the checks had a right to countermand payment. Pease v. State Nat. Bank, 114 Tenn. 693, 88 S. W. 172.

In the case of First Nat. Bank v. Strauss, 66 Miss. 479, 14 Am. St. Rep. 579, 6 So. 232, it was, without argumentation, held that such a depositor in an insolvent bank might stop payment and recover.

In Grant v. Walsh, 145 N. Y. 502, 45 Am. St. Rep. 626, 40 N. E. 209, it appeared that there was a stopping of payment of a check deposited in an insolvent bank, by the act of the depositor after it had been passed to a correspondent bank, and it was held that the receiver had no enforceable right to the check as against such depositor.

The chancellor, in decreeing in favor of the receiver on this phase of the case, erred.

Another and distinct claim is advanced in its intervening petition by the Rand Powder Company, based upon the following facts: That company had in the bank a

In Beal v. Somerville, 17 L.R.A. 291, 1 C. C. A. 598, 5 U. S. App. 14, 50 Fed. 647, it appeared that the bank was irretrievably insolvent at the time the bank received the paper, but the decision went in favor of the owner of the paper on the ground that title to the paper, under the terms of the deposit, never passed to the bank, so that it was not necessary for the court to consider the doctrine here discussed. This and similar cases are not within the scope of this note. See same case discussed, supra.

In Standard Oil Co. v. Hawkins, 33 L.R.A. 739, 20 C. C. A. 468, 46 U. S. App. 115, 74 Fed. 395, it was assumed that a depositor of paper uncollected at the time the bank closed its doors could sustain a preferred claim against other depositors where the officers of the bank knew of its insolvency at the time the deposit was received; and the case turned upon the question of estoppel by making an unpreferred claim.

IV. Where unauthorized act of bank had given it apparent title.

The cases here cited are not strictly within the scope of the note, since the relation between the banks and the claimant proved to be that of agent and principal, and not that of debtor and creditor. So, the paper was not really deposited. But the bank in each case had attempted to change the relation and had performed some act which, if it had been authorized, would have had that effect.

The cases are cited as illustrative of the general proposition that where title to the paper does not pass to the bank, there is, generally speaking, a trust in the proceeds.

Where a bank had in its possession paper the amount of which it entered as a general deposit to the credit of the owner, but considerable deposit on the date its affairs were placed in the hands of the receiver. The company was at that time indorser on a note executed to it as payee by the King Mountain Coal Company, which note had been discounted in the bank. It is now contended that the King Mountain Coal Company, the primary obligor, is insolvent, and that this fact entitled the powder company to have set off against the note an equivalent amount of its deposit. However, it appears that, since the closing of the doors of the insolvent bank, the powder company has been furnished coal by the maker company in satisfaction of the note obligation, as between themselves; and it therefore cannot stand to be loser, by reason of the coal company's insolvency, in event the receiver compels the indorser to pay. When it pays, equity, looking at substance, will see that it was the maker who paid through the indorser. The claim to equitable set-off fails where the primary obligor, although insolvent, has indemnified the indorser, secondarily liable (Knafl v. Knoxville Bkg. & T. Co. 128 Tenn. 181, 188, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 167, 159 S. W. 838; Re Middle Dist. Bank, 9 Cow. 414, note); a fortiori where the indorser has been satisfied.

To sustain the claim to set-off would be to allow a preference to the powder company over other creditors of the failed bank without any basis therefor on equity.

It falls, most obviously, under the rule denying preference to one occupying the status of secondary obligor announced in the recent decision of this court cited above.

The Chancellor properly denied that claim. The decree below is affirmed as to that feature, but reversed as to the ruling on the checks. Remand for execution of a decree to be entered here in accord with this opinion.

had no authority (either by the general banking custom or otherwise) to so enter the deposit, and the paper was collected after it closed its doors, the owner is entitled to the proceeds of the paper in preference to the general creditors of the bank; Covey v. Cannon, 104 Ark. 550, 149 S. W. 514; Henderson v. O'Connor, 106 Cal. 385, 39 Pac. 786; Armstrong v. National Bank, 90 Ky. 431, 9 L.R.A. 553, 14 S. W. 411; Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L.R.A. 699, 12 Am. St. Rep. 598, 20 N. E. 193; Jones v. Kilbreth, 49 Ohio St. 401, 31 N. E. 346.

Where a bank holds a paper for collection with the right to enter credit to the owner as a depositor when it has collected it, the collection is not regarded as complete until the bank gets the money into its possession, so if it closes its doors before it has possession of the money, the owner of the paper has a claim superior to its general creditors for the amount of the paper, even though it had, prior to closing, entered the amount to his credit as a depositor, and at the time of closing the paper or the proceeds were in the possession of a correspondent bank which had, either before or after collection, notified the forwarding bank that it had given the latter credit for the amount, if the correspondent bank makes no claim to the fund. Henderson v. O'Connor, 106 Cal. 385, 39 Pac. 786; Armstrong v. National Bank, 90 Ky. 431, 9 L. R. A. 553; 14 S. W. 411, Guignon v. First Nat. Bank, 22 Mont. 140, 55 Pac. 1051.

It has been held that the depositor has a preferred claim over the general creditors of the insolvent bank, in respect of——the proceeds of notes secured by mortgage, payable to the bank, and sold by the receiver, the bank having taken the notes from a purchaser of land and entered the amount upon its deposit books as a credit to the vendor, and delivered to vendee the contract of sale, which it held in escrow, and which called for cash, without the knowledge of the vendor, Convey v. Cannon, 104 Ark. 550, 149 S. W. 514;

—a check which the bank had for collection, with the right to enter the amount thereof as a general deposit for the owner when collected, where the check was collected through a correspondent bank after the deposit bank had closed its doors, the entry of the amount upon the books of the deposit bank being made after it was notified of the collection (this action was against the bank that collected the check, but it defended wholly in the right of the receiver of the insolvent bank), Manufacturers' Nat. Bank v. Continental Bank, 148 Mass. 553, 2 L.R.A. 699, 12 Am. St. Rep. 598, 20 N. E. 193;

—a draft which was deposited for collection with instructions to notify the depositor when collected, the draft having been paid to a correspondent bank that had credited the proceeds to the deposit bank and notified it of the fact, the deposit bank having charged the same to the correspondent bank and credited it to the depositor before closing its doors, and the proceeds having been paid by the correspondent bank direct to the receiver after the closing of the deposit bank, Guignon v. First Nat. Bank, 22 Mont. 140, 55 Pac. 1051;

—paper which was received by the bank for collection, where, before the paper matured, the bank closed its doors, and on the same day but before it closed, it entered the amount of the paper to the credit of the owner as a general deposit, the trustee for the benefit of the creditors afterward receiving for the bank the benefit of the proceeds of the paper by making a compromise with one of the bank's preferred creditors who had attached the proceeds of the paper, Jones v. Kilbreth, 49 Ohio St. 410, 31 N. E. 346.

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(— C. C. A. —, 218 Fed. 302.)

Evidence — burden of proof — hours of service act.

1. To avoid the penalty provided by the hours of service act, a carrier which is shown to have kept an employee on duty more than sixteen consecutive hours has the burden of showing facts which bring it within the conditions under which the proviso makes the act inapplicable.

Master and servant — hours of service — fireman watching engine.

2. The time during which a fireman is required to watch his engine after the train is tied up because it cannot complete its run within the sixteen hours provided, before he is relieved from duty, must be considered in determining whether or not he has been kept on duty longer than the statute permits.

Pleading — exception to hours of service act.

3. To justify evidence of conditions within the exception to the Federal hours of service act relating to employees on interstate railroads, the facts concerning them must be pleaded.

Master and servant — hours of service act — operation troubles as exceptions.

4. Hot journals, unusual traffic, head winds, or the imperfect working of an engine because recently overhauled, are not within the proviso to the Federal hours of service act, that it should not apply in case of casualty, unavoidable accident, or act of God, nor where the cause of delay was

I. Introduction.

And as to validity of limitations of hours of labor on public works, see the notes to Keefe v. People, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 131; People ex rel. Williams Engineering & Contracting Co. v. Metz, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 201; and Com. v. Casey, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 767.

For the right of a state to regulate the relations between railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce and their employees, see the note to Erie R. Co. v. People, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 266, and the earlier notes referred to therein.

As to the circumstances under which a servant will be entitled to recover remuneration for extra work, see note to McGregor v. Harm, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 652.

II. Nature of statutes and general rules for their construction.

Actions under the Federal hours of service statute are civil. United States v. Great Northern R. Co. 250 Fed. 630.

The Federal hours of service statute relating to railroads is not strictly a penal statute, and does not require the strict construction applicable in criminal proceedings. United States v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 189 Fed. 954, affirmed without opinion in 117 C. C. A. 666, 199 Fed. 990, writ of certiorari denied in 229 U. S. 622, 57 L. ed. 1355, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1050.

It was passed to meet the condition of danger incidental to the working of railroad employees so excessively as to impair their strength and alertness, and as such it is highly remedial, and the public, no less than the employees themselves, is vitally interested in its enforcement, for which reason, although penal in the aspect of a penalty being provided for its violation, the law should be liberally construed in order that its purposes may be effected. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828; United States v. Kansas not known to the carrier at the time the employee left the terminal, and could not have been foreseen.

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota (Charles A. Willard, District Judge) to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover penalties for alleged violations of the "hours of service act." Affirmed.

Statement by Reed, District Judge:

The United States sued the defendant railway company, a common carrier by railroad of property in interstate commerce, to recover penalties for three separate alleged violations of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1907 (34 Stat. at L. 1415, chap.

City Southern R. Co. 189 Fed. 471; United States v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 128 C. C. A. 275, 211 Fed. 897; San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 28, 213 Fed. 326; United States v. Great Northern R. Co. 220 Fed. 630.

The fact that a mill was operated only about five months in each year, during which time it was kept in perfect sanitary condition, and that work therein tended to build up the health of employees, is immaterial in a prosecution for violation of a statute prohibiting the working of employees for more than ten hours in one day. Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. State, 103 Miss. 767, 60 So. 775.

The apparent purpose of an act limiting the hours of service of a street railway employee is not to create a right in favor of the employees which they might waive, so much as to guard the public safety from service too prolonged for alertness in the exercise of reasonable care, and as such it cannot be made a defense dependent upon private contract. For that reason voluntary service for excessive hours is forbidden by a statute which expressly states that its purpose is to limit the usual hours of labor of street car employees, although it merely forbids officers of the corporation to exact more than a certain number of hours per day. Re Ten-Hour Law, 24 R. I. 603, 61 L.R.A. 612, 54 Atl. 602.

Purely statutory offenses cannot be established by implication. So sections of a statute providing that ten hours' labor performed within twelve consecutive hours shall constitute a day's labor in the operation of all steam, surface, and elevated railroads within the state, and providing for extra compensation for service over those hours, but containing no prohibition aimed at the railroad company against permitting or requiring more hours of labor during a calendar day, will not be linked with another provision of the same statute making it a misdemeanor for any railroad company or corporation or its agent to violate, or permit the violation of, any of the provisions of the act, such penal provision apparently being intended to apply to another section of the statute requiring that trainmen who have been employed continuously for twenty-four hours be given at least eight hours' rest before going again on duty. People v. Phylfe, 136 N. Y. 554, 19 L.R.A. 141, 32 N. E. 978.

Argued before Hook and Carland, Circuit Judges, and Reed, District Judge.

Messrs. E. C. Lindley and John F. Finerty, Jr., for plaintiff in error:

Firemen Boese and Keeling were not "on duty" within the meaning of said term, nor were they "actually engaged in or connected with the movement of any train" when and while serving as engine watchmen after the arrival at their respective terminals.

United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828; United States v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 197 Fed. 624; United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 189 Fed. 471; Schweig v.

olate, or permit the violation of, any of the provisions of the act, such penal provision apparently being intended to apply to another section of the statute requiring that trainmen who have been employed continuously for twenty-four hours be given at least eight hours' rest before going again on duty. People v. Phylfe, 136 N. Y. 554, 19 L.R.A. 141, 32 N. E. 978.

A statute providing that, in contracting for any work required to be done by a city, a clause shall be inserted that the contractor binds himself not to accept any more than eight hours as a day's work, to be performed within nine consecutive hours, is not penal in character, and cannot be the basis for the criminal indictment of any person for a misdemeanor. People ex rel. Warren v. Beck, 144 N. Y. 225, 39 N. E. 80.

III. Intent to violate statute.

In a prosecution of a railroad company for working an employee over sixteen hours continuously, in violation of a state statute, the state must establish the guilt of defendant by evidence showing such fact beyond a reasonable doubt, and must show that, in working beyond the period limited, the employee did so, not voluntarily, but by order or direction of the railroad company; and where the order or direction of the company to the employee did not show on its face that it contemplated that he was to work beyond the period limited, and it did not appear that there was not ample time for him to have carried out the order before the expiration of the period, it was held that the guilt of defendant was not proven. State v. Northern P. R. Co. 41 Mont. 557, 111 Pac. 141.

In a prosecution under a statute limiting the hours of labor upon public works to eight hours in one calendar day, intent to violate the act must be alleged in the information or indictment in order to sufficiently charge the defendant with the commission of an offense under the act, and, an allega-

Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 205 Fed. 96; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 55 L. ed. 878, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621; United States v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 128 C. C. A. 275, 211 Fed. 897.

Fireman Kohn's train failed to reach the Willmar terminal on account of an act of God, a cause or causes which were unknown to, and could not have been foreseen by, the carrier or its officers at the time the train left the Garretson terminal, and this brings the defendant clearly within the first proviso of § 3 of the hours of service act.

Petri v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 142 U. S. 644, 35 L. ed. 1144, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 325; 2 Lewis's Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 380; United States v. Kansas City Southern R.

Co. 189 Fed. 471; Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co. 140 U. S. 435, 439, 35 L. ed. 458, 461, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 859; United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 212 Fed. 1000; United States v. Northern P. R. Co. 131 C. C. A. 372, 215 Fed. 64.

Messrs. Charles C. Houpt and Monroe C. List, for the United States:

A locomotive fireman is on duty, within the meaning of the hours of service act, if, after the expiration of approximately sixteen consecutive hours in road service, he is not relieved from all service, but is required and permitted to continue in service for the purpose of watching his engine while it is tied up and standing on a side track.

San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United

tion that defendant did require and permit his laborers to work more than eight hours on the day stated is sufficient. United States v. San Francisco Bridge Co. 88 Fed. 891.

And the effect of a statute limiting the hours of labor on municipal work is not to make a contractor for such work responsible for every accidental violation of the statute as to hours, such as where a workman, by accident or oversight, labors beyond the prescribed number of hours. People ex rel. Hausauer-Jones Printing Co. v. Zimmerman, 58 Misc. 264, 109 N. Y. Supp. 396.

But the provision of the Federal hours of service act relating to telegraph operators imposes upon the railroad company an absolute duty, and the penalty prescribed cannot be escaped by the exercise of reasonable diligence, and want of knowledge on the part of the officers and agents of the carriers that such an employee is being worked overtime constitutes no defense to a charge of requiring or permitting an employee to be or remain on duty overtime. United States v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. 218 Fed. 925.

So, in United States v. Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. 213 Fed. 688, it is held that the voluntary working by a railroad employee beyond the period limited by the Federal hours of service statute constitutes a violation on the part of the railroad company, and that the instructions given by his superior officer not to work excessive hours, or want of knowledge on part of his superior officers that he did in fact work excessive hours, is no defense.

And where, because a telegraph operator failed to report for duty, another operator was actually on duty for a period longer than that prescribed by the statute, the carrier was held to have permitted such employee to work overtime, although no other officer or agent of the carrier was present, under a further provision of the statute that the common carrier shall be deemed to have had knowledge of all such acts of all its officers and agents. United States v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. Southern Dist. of Ohio, Western Division, Aug. 13, 1914. L.R.A.1915D.

Under the Federal statute limiting to eight hours a day the services of laborers or mechanics upon public works, and providing that those who shall intentionally violate any provision of the act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, the only intention required is an intention to do the prohibited act, that is to say, the crime is complete when the prohibited act has been intentionally done, and a corporation may be charged with an offense which involves that kind of an intention, and may be properly convicted, when, in its corporate capacity and by direction of those controlling its corporate action, it does the prohibited act. United States v. John Kelso Co. 86 Fed. 304.

Under a statute providing that "a child, young person, or woman shall not, during any part of the times allowed for meals in the factory or workshop, be employed in the factory or workshop," the fact that a young person coming within the statute, during the mealtime allowed him, oiled part of the machinery of the mill, constituted a violation of the act on the part of the employers, although the young person stated that he did so contrary to orders and for his own amusement, and he was paid nothing for his work during such time. Prior v. Slaithwaite Spinning Co. [1898] 1 Q. B. 881, 62 J. P. 358, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 615, 78 L. T. N. S. 532, 14 Times L. R. 379, 46 Week. Rep. 488, 19 Cox, C. C. 54.

IV. What employees come within the statutes.

a. In general.

As to what employers are within the statute limiting hours of labor, see note to United States v. Ramsey, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1031.

Where a jetty as being built in a harbor by means of stones which were towed in barges to the place and dumped into the water, engineers whose sole duty it was to run the engines while they were discharging the cargoes, boatmen handling fawls and gasoline boats and assisting in discharging the cargo, and hook men who handled lines in discharging the cargo and aided in

A carrier will be excused for requiring excess service of its employees, and for its failure to relieve them after they have been on duty sixteen hours, only in those cases where a casualty or the like actually prevents a compliance with the mandatory provisions of § 2.

United States v. Farenholt, 206 U. S. 226, 51 L. ed. 1036, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 629; Williams v. Gaylord, 186 U. S. 157, 46 L. ed. 1102, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 798; United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828; United States v. Dickson, 15 Pet. 141, 165, 16 L. ed. 689, 698; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. United States, 231

U. S. 112, 58 L. ed. 144, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26; Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. United States, 9 C. C. A. 579, 22 U. S. App. 145, 61 Fed. 488.

Mr. Roscoe F. Walter also for the United States.

Reed, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition or complaint is in three counts, was filed February 28, 1913, and each count alleges that on certain dates named in October, 1912, the defendant required and permitted a person named therein, employed by it as fireman on one of its engines moving interstate traffic on the lines of its road, to be and remain on duty as such fireman longer than sixteen conwarping the barges along to the place required, they having been selected for their seafaring experience, and hired by the month and living ashore, did not come within the classification of laborers or mechanics within a statute prohibiting the employment of such laborers or mechanics for more than eight hours in twenty-four upon public works, but were seamen within the provisions of another statute. Breakwater Co. v. United States, 105 C. C. A. 404, 183 Fed. 112.

Likewise as to masters, mates, engineers, firemen, cranimen, deck hands, and scow men employed on tugs, dredges, and scows used in dredging a harbor channel. Ellis v. United States, 206 U. S. 246, 51 L. ed. 1047, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600, 11 Ann. Cas. 589.

But while men employed as seamen upon a government vessel do not come within the provision, if the same men were set to work upon public works in removing snags and obstructions from the rivers and harbors, they would come within the provisions of the statute while engaged in such service. United States v. Jefferson, 60 Fed. 736.

A local freight train carrying a caboose and required to carry passengers is nevertheless a freight train so that it comes within the provision of a state statute which applies to freight trains, but not to passenger trains, and provides that where an employee has worked for more than sixteen hours, he shall not be allowed to return to his employment without having had eight hours' rest, and which abolishes the defense of contributory negligence to a suit for personal injuries to such a servant received while employed in violation of the statute. Kansas City & M. R. Co. v. Huff, — Ark. —, 173 S. W. 419.

Under a statute prohibiting persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing from working their employees for more than ten hours a day, in a prosecution against a cottonseed oil mill it was held that all employees who compose the organized force and work with machinery, whose work supplements that of the machinery and must be performed while it is in operation, and in order that it may be kept in operation, are within the protection of the statute; and specifically it was held to apply to a meal cook whose duties consisted of supervising the employees in cooking the meals, seeing that they were properly cooked, that all machines were kept in running order, and, in the event of a breakdown, reporting the same to the superintendent; to a seed feeder whose duty it was to feed the cotton seed from the bin into the tunnel conveyor, by which it was automatically conveyed, by means of a screw, into a sand and boll screen room; and to a fireman whose duty it was to keep steam at a sufficient pressure by feeding fuel into the furnace. Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. State, 103 Miss. 767, 60 So. 775.

A statute limiting the hours of labor in manufacturing establishments to ten hours in one day operates on all employees of a designated class, without reference to whether in a particular case the overwork will or will not result in detriment to the physical and mental welfare of the workman. Ibid.

A statute providing that eight hours shall constitute a legal day's work for all classes of mechanics, workmen, and laborers, excepting those engaged in agricultural and domestic labor, does not apply to those employed by the week. Helphenstine v. Hartig, 5 Ind. App. 172, 31 N. E. 845.

A boy employed by a proprietor of a news shop, whose work was done partly inside the shop and partly away from it in carrying newspapers and delivering them to customers, was employed in or about the shop during the whole period of such employment, under a statute providing that "no young person shall be employed in or about a shop for a longer period than seventy-four hours, including mealtimes, in any one week." Collman v. Roberts [1896] 1 Q. B. 457, 65 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 63, 74 L. T. N. S. 198, 44 Week Rep. 445, 18 Cox, C. C. 273, 60 J. P. 184.

A statute entitled "An Act to Regulate the Manufacture of Clothing, Wearing Apparel, and Other Articles, etc." and providing in its body that no female shall be employed in any factory or workshop more secutive hours, in violation of said act of Congress.

The original answer of the defendant was filed March 18, 1913, and admitted that defendant was engaged as a common carrier by railroad of interstate traffic at the times alleged in the petition, and for answer to count 1 thereof alleged: That its fireman named in said count (Joseph Boese) went on duty at 4 o'clock P. M., October 10, 1912, at Devil's Lake, North Dakota, upon engine No. 1168, and upon arrival at Redland, Minnesota, a division terminal, said engine was "tied up" at 7:30 A. M., October 11th, and that the total number of hours of continuous service rendered by said fireman was less than sixteen. The answer to count 2 alleged that the fireman named in said count than eight hours a day, will embrace employment only in the manufacture of articles of the same kind as those expressly enumerated. Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 29 L.R.A. 79, 46 Am. St. Rep. 315, 40 N. E. 454.

(S. Keeling) went on duty at 10:15 A. M., October 13, 1912, at Redland, Minnesota, as fireman on engine No. 1179, ran to Larimore, North Dakota, and return, arriving at Redland at 1:45 A. M. the next day, October 14th, and that said fireman was on duty less than sixteen consecutive hours. The answer to count 3 alleged that its fireman (William Kohn) went on duty at 2 o'clock A. M., October 29, 1912, on engine No. 604 extra, at Garretson, South Dakota, for a run to Willmar, Minnesota; that said engine was "tied up" at 5:15 P. M. of that day; and that said fireman was on duty as such for fifteen hours and fifteen minutes, and no more. The answer denies the other allegations of each count of the petition.

A statute providing that in all factories, workshops, sawmills, logging or lumber camps, booms or drives, mines, or other places used for mechanical, manufacturing, or other purposes where men or women are employed, ten hours per day shall constitute a legal day's work, does not apply to one who is an expert in taking, finishing, and retouching photographs, nor to employment by the week, month, or year, but applies only to factories, etc., and such places where the mechanical and manufacturing industries of the kind mentioned are carried on. Schurr v. Savigny, 85 Mich. 144, 48 N. W. 547.

Where a statute limiting the hours of labor for females excepts females who are employed in canning fish, the exception does not cover females employed in a fish cannery who are not engaged in the actual process of canning fish, so that a woman who was engaged in lacquering cans after the fish had been canned, which process was found by the jury not to be a part of the canning, is protected by the statute. State v. Pacific American Fisheries, 73 Wash. 37, 131 Pac. 452.

A provision of a statute which limited the hours within which women or children might be employed, and provided that "every employer shall post, in a conspicuous place in every room in which such persons are employed, a printed notice stating the number of hours' work required of them in each day of the week, the hours of commencing and stopping work, and the hours when the time allowed for meals begins and ends," applies where such persons are employed regularly for any substantial number of hours daily, and is not fairly open to the construction that it applies only to establishments where such persons are regularly employed more than the hours provided for in the statute. Com. v. Riley, 210 Mass. 387, 97 N. E. 367, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 388. L.R.A.1915D.

But the object of the statute quoted in the preceding paragraph is to protect the rights and regulate the hours of labor of those permanently employed in manufacturing plants as workmen, and does not include merely temporary or occasional service. Com. v. Osborn Mill, 130 Mass. 33.

The employees of a plant for the generation and distribution of electricity come within a statute requiring that employees of factories be given twenty-four consecutive hours of rest in every seven consecutive days, and do not come within the exception of employees in power houses used in connection with railroad purposes, who come under a different statute, although the plant in which they work furnishes electricity to some railroads. People v. Niagara Falls Power Co. 86 Misc. 61, 149 N. Y. Supp. 45.

Public employees; persons engaged upon public work.

A statutory prohibition of the employment of women for more than a specified number of hours per day in any public institution applies to a municipal hospital, and a municipal corporation may be prosecuted criminally for violating the provisions of the statute. People v. Chicago, 256 Ill. 558, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 954, 100 N. E. 194, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 305.

The engineer of a heating plant at a state hospital is a laborer within the meaning of a statute limiting the hours of labor where labor is employed by the state or any county, school district, or municipality, either directly or through the agency of a contractor. Ex parte Steiner, 68 Or. 218, 137 Pac. 204.

The firemen of a city who are paid monthly salaries are not laborers within a statute limiting the hours of labor upon public works or work done by contract or day labor, although their salaries are based upon the actual number of days they are on duty, and they receive pay only for their actual days of service. Neely v. Tacoma, 78 Wash. 92, 138 Pac. 557; Stetson v. Seattle, 74 Wash. 606, 134 Pac. 494.

The jury was impaneled and the cause tried on June 4, 1913, resulting in a directed verdict and judgment for the plaintiff on that day upon each count of the petition.

The government's evidence on count 1 shows without dispute that engine No. 1168, on which Boese was fireman, left Devil's Lake, North Dakota, at 4 o'clock P. M., October 10th, and arrived at Redland, a division terminal, the next morning at 7:30 A. M., when the engine was "tied up" and the crew, except fireman Boese, relieved of duty; that he was required to remain as watcher of the engine until 11 o'clock A. M. of that day (October 11th), when he was relieved from duty after some nineteen consecutive hours of service on and about the engine. The train despatcher testified that the distance between Devil's Lake and Redland was 168 miles; that the ordinary running time between those stations was twelve to thirteen hours; that he always figured whether a train would get into its terminal within the sixteen-hour period; that until this train got to Fisher, 12 miles from Redland, he had anticipated that it would get to Redland in sufficient time to allow the crew to be relieved within the sixteen hours; that he held a passenger train at some point to enable the train to reach Redland within the sixteen-hour limit, and after the train left Fisher he sent a wire to Redland advising that the train was on short time. The defendant then offered to prove by its despatcher that there was an unanticipated delay by reason of

An eight-hour statute which defines the term "employee" as used in the act to be a mechanic, workman, or laborer who works for another for hire does not apply to members of the city fire department, who take an oath of office, are exempt from jury duty and from arrest on civil process while on duty, are graded in rank, receive salaries according to such rank, and become entitled to pensions under certain conditions. People ex rel. Sweeney v. Sturgis, 78 App. Div. 460, 79 N. Y. Supp. 969, affirmed without opinion in 175 N. Y. 470, 67 N. E. 1088.

A fireman or policeman employed by a city, who is required to take an oath of office, and when once selected is not subject to dismissal at the will of the appointing power, is not a "laborer" within the meaning of a statute limiting the hours of labor for persons employed by municipalities. Albee v. Weinberger, 69 Or. 331, 138 Pac. 859.

A person working on the streets of a city under an ordinance requiring the performance of two days' labor of ten hours per day or the payment of a poll tax is a laborer for the city within the statute providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, mechanics, or other persons employed by or on behalf of the state or of any municipality. Re Ashby, 60 Kan. 101, 55 Pac. 336.

In State ex rel. Ives v. Martindale, 47 Kan. 147, 27 Pac. 852, it is held that a statute limiting the hours of labor for laborers, workmen, mechanics, or other persons employed by or on behalf of the state, to eight hours, except in certain emergencies, does not apply to officers or employees of the state penitentiary who are provided for by statute and given annual salaries, the amount for each officer and employee being specifically stated, and the amounts having been appropriated by the legislature.

A statute providing that eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, mechanics, or other persons employed on behalf of any city of the state applies to the engineers and firemen employed to operate the water and electric light plant. State ex rel. Pleasant v. Ottawa, 84 Kan. 100, 113 Pac. 391. L.R.A.1915D.

In Downey v. Bender, 57 App. Div. 310, 68 N. Y. Supp. 96, it is held that a statute providing that no employee of a contractor shall be permitted or required to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day, upon work done for the state or a municipal corporation, does not apply to the furnishing of gas and electricity for lighting the state capitol and executive mansion, such contract being one of purchase rather than for the doing of public work.

Likewise, a contractor engaged in erecting a public building did not violate the statute in purchasing doors and windows for the building from one who worked his employees more than eight hours, such employees not being employed "on, about, or upon such public work," within the meaning of the statute. Bohnen v. Metz, 126 App. Div. 807, 111 N. Y. Supp. 196, affirmed without opinion in 193 N. Y. 676, 87 N. E. 1115.

b. Under Federal hours of service act.

In connection with the question as to when an employee is deemed to be engaged in interstate commerce so as to come within the operation of the Federal hours of service act, the reader may profitably consult the notes in 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 52, as to Federal employers' liability act, and 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478, and 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 51, as to Federal safety appliance act.

Intrastate railroads and employees wholly engaged in local business are not affected by the provisions of the Federal hours of service act. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 55 L. ed. 878, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621.

So, where a railway engineer had been engaged in the interstate traffic of a carrier, but was then assigned to duty on a work train operating on local work, and remained thereon for a period of fifty-nine days continuously, after which he was again reassigned to the interstate work, the fact that he was potentially subject to recall from the work train service to regular interstate service at any time did not bring him within the statute while employed on the work train. United States v. Chicago, M.

a hot box; also that there was at this time an unusually heavy grain movement on this division of the road, and even under these circumstances the despatcher expected the train to reach the terminal in time to be relieved within the sixteen-hour limit. This offered testimony, upon objection, was ruled out as being immaterial under the issues, and the ruling is assigned as error.

Upon the second count the government's proof shows without dispute that the fireman (Keeling) went on duty at 10:15 A. M., October 13th, at Redland, the starting point of the train for a run to Larimore, North Dakota, and return, and returned to Redland at 1:45 A. M. the next day; that the others of the crew were then relieved within the sixteen-hour period, and Fireman Keeling required to remain about one hour and twenty minutes longer as watchman of the engine before he was relieved,—making a total of some seventeen hours of consecutive service by him. The defendant offered to show by its train despatcher that the time consumed at Larimore before starting on the return trip was only sufficient to make up the train to be brought back, and that he expected that the train would get to Redland upon its return trip within the sixteen-hour period (as it in fact did); also that the train sheet showed unusual delay in the way of hot boxes; that delays on account of hot boxes could not be anticipated or taken into account by the train despatcher; and that there was no way of telling when they would occur. This of-

& P. S. R. Co. 219 Fed. 632. See also report on demurrer, 218 Fed. 701.

This case, however, is directly opposed to United States v. St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. D. C. Kan. 1st Div. Dec. 19, 1914, which held that a locomotive fireman on a work train engaged in moving company materials only, and solely within the state so that such movement was not interstate commerce, was nevertheless within the provisions of the statute.

And a train crew which is engaged in picking up logs along the right of way and loading them on the cars and hauling the loaded cars to a station where they are taken up by one of the carrier's regular trains and then transported into another state are engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the statute. United States v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 197 Fed. 624.

In order to come within the statute as a person "actually engaged in or connected with the movement of any train," an employee must be engaged in work which has some connection, though it may be remote, with the safety of the train or with the safety of persons who might be injured by the movement of the train, and an employee in a stock yard who is merely engaged in preparing cars for loading does not come within the statute. Schweig v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 205 Fed. 96, affirmed in 216 Fed. 750, 7 N. C. C. A. 135.

Under a provision of the statute that "no operator, train despatcher or other employee who, by the use of the telegraph or telephone, despatches, reports, transmits, receives, or delivers orders pertaining to or affecting train movements shall be required or permitted to be or remain on duty for a longer period than nine hours in any twenty-four hour period in all towers, offices, places, and stations continuously operated night and day," the term "other employee" was intended to mean an employee engaged primarily in the same class of service as would be performed by an operator or train despatcher, and does not include switch tenders who operate hand switches whenever necessary, as to which they are informed L.R.A.1915D.

from time to time by telephone. Missouri P. R. Co. v. United States, 128 C. C. A. 271, 211 Fed. 893.

Where a carrier had a rule that, should a train be held over thirty minutes at a siding where there was no open telegraph office, the conductor should report to the despatcher for orders, calling the day operator if there was one available, and if not using the telephone, and, to make obedience to the order possible, installed at various points where no telegraph operators were employed and no regular station maintained, telephones for the use of its conductors, a conductor of a train so using the telephone did not come within the provision of the statute quoted in the preceding case. United States v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 219 Fed. 1011.

A conductor of an interstate railway train, who is required or permitted during his run to stop at stations to report, transmit, receive, or deliver orders pertaining to or affecting his train, is not embraced within the provisions as to "other employees who, by the use of the telegraph or telephone, transmit, report, etc.," the statute applying only to such employees as have a fixed place for work where they use the telegraph or telephone in transmitting, reporting, or giving orders pertaining to or affecting movements of trains. United States v. Florida East Coast R. Co. 222 Fed. 33.

But an employee of an interstate railroad whose duty was to space trains by the use of the telegraph under what is known as the "block system," and to report trains to another office or officers and to train despatchers, whose duties pertain to the movement of cars, engines, and trains on the company's railroad, by the use of the telegraph, came within the provision. Erie R. Co. v. New York, 233 U. S. 671, 58 L. ed. 1149, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 266, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756.

And switchmen whose place of duty was at a shanty near the tracks and switches, and whose duties were to receive orders by telephone, and, acting thereon, to permit trains to pass or to hold them as the case might be, were employees who, by the use of the telegraph or telephone, despatch, referred testimony was rejected, upon motion of the government, as immaterial under the issues, and this ruling is assigned as error.

Upon the third count the government's proof shows without dispute that the engine crew of No. 604 extra was called to report for duty at 2 o'clock A. M., October 29, 1912, at Garretson, South Dakota, to take a train to Willmar, Minnesota, a division terminal; that the train left Garretson at 4:50 A. M. and arrived at Clara City at 4:55 P. M., within the sixteen-hour limit, when it was "tied up" and the crew, other than the fireman, relieved at 5:15 P. M.; that he (Kohn) was required to remain in charge of the engine as watchman, and did so remain at Clara City, until at least 8 o'clock P. M. of that day, when the engine, with him in charge, was, after 8 o'clock P. M., towed in from Clara City to Willmar by another train and crew, and arrived at Willmar some time later that evening. The defendant offered to show that the train did not make its usual time by reason of unavoidable delays; that the engine was on its second trip after having been overhauled generally, and because of that condition, and an extraordinary head wind, did not make the time expected of her; in fact, that when it made the trip the day before, it made it without difficulty, and that was its initial trip after the overhauling. The offered testimony was, upon objection, rejected as being immaterial under the issues, and because the train had reached Clara City within the sixteen-hour period, and in port, transmit, receive, or deliver orders pertaining to or affecting train movements, within the provision of the statute applying to train dispatchers, and limiting their hours of service to nine in any twenty-four-hour period. United States v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. Dist. Ct. for the Southern Dist. of Ohio, Dec. 12, 1911.

And under this provision the term "orders" is not limited to such orders as emanate from the train dispatcher's office and are reduced to writing and handed to the conductor and engineer of a train, but includes any order affecting train movements which can be given by any subordinate having to do with trains and switches, such as the towermen, who use the telephone to receive signals from the trainmen which indicate the routing of the train as originally made by the train master, and give information over it as to what trains have started, on receipt of which information the other towermen must throw switches, line up tracks, and hold other trains as a matter of duty without discretion on their part. To say that these towermen use the telephone only for the giving of information not covered by the statute would be the merest sophistry. United States v. Houston Belt & Terminal R. Co. 125 C. C. A. 481, 205 Fed. 344.

V. Separate offense as to each employee.

Under the Federal hours of service act, making a carrier which permits any employee to remain on duty in violation of its terms liable to a penalty for each and every violation, a separate penalty is incurred for each railway employee kept on duty for more than sixteen consecutive hours, contrary to the act, by reason of the same delay of a train. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. United States, 231 U. S. 112, 58 L. ed. 144, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

Under the Federal statute which restricts the services and employment of all laborers and mechanics by any contractor or subcontractor upon any of the public works of the United States to eight hours in one calendar day, and makes it unlawful for a person in L.R.A.1915D.

control of such laborers or mechanics to require or permit any laborer or mechanic to work more than eight hours in any day, a separate offense is committed by the employment of each laborer on the same day for more than the statutory period, and a defendant has the right to have the persons he is charged with employing for a greater number of hours identified, that he may intelligently defend the charge, and, if subsequently called upon to defend for the same cause, plead former jeopardy, and an indictment which fails to do that is insufficient. United States v. Breakwater Co. 174 Fed. 78.

But under a statute prohibiting persons, firms, or corporations engaged in manufacturing or repairing, from working their employees more than ten hours per day, it was held that the statute did not make the working of each employee a separate offense, but simply grouped them and made the working of all or any of them for more than ten hours in one day an offense. Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. State, 103 Miss. 767, 60 So. 775.

VI. What is included as overtime.

a. In general.

Under a statute providing that all contracts for work on municipal buildings should stipulate that the employees of a contractor should not be worked for more than eight hours in one day, and giving a citizen a right to sue to cancel a contract under which work was being done in violation of the provision, it was held that the statute did not apply to a case where the overtime work was performed after the bid was accepted, but before a written contract was made. McFarlane v. Mosier, 157 App. Div. 844, 143 N. Y. Supp. 221.

A statute providing that all works by contract or days' labor done for the state or any of its political subdivisions shall be performed in workdays of not more than eight hours each, except in cases of extraordinary emergency, is violated by requiring teamsters to go to the barn each morning time to relieve the other members of the crew. Counsel for defendant then stated: "That it had two defenses to this cause of action: First, that the reason of the delay in this case was because of a condition not known at the time the train left the terminal, and was one which the officials in charge had no reason to foresee; that it was proper under the statute to have run the entire trip into the terminal at Willmar, because of the proviso which says that the statute shall not apply in cases where the delay is caused by something not known at the time the train left the terminal, and which could not have been foreseen by the officials. Second, that Kohn was not on duty, within the meaning of the statute, after he was relieved as fireman at Clara City."

The defendant also offered to prove that this is the only instance in which this train was required to "tie up" by reason of not being able to make the run within sixteen hours; that the train master first learned that the train would be unable to make its terminal at Willmar within sixteen hours when it arrived at a station called Maynard, some 25 miles from Willmar, when he received a message from the conductor in charge thereof that he would be unable to reach Willmar within sixteen hours. This offered testimony was rejected, upon objection, as being immaterial under the issues.

where their teams are kept, grease their wagons when necessary, harness and feed their teams, collect their tools, and be at the place of work at a certain time, and, after working eight hours there, to return the teams to the barn and unhitch and unharness them. Davies v. Seattle, 67 Wash. 532, 121 Pac. 987.

A statute which provides that the period of employment of persons employed or engaged in work in underground mines shall not exceed eight hours in any twenty-four hours does not include the time required to traverse the shaft, underground drifts, and tunnels between the surface of the mine and the face of the drift where the person is employed, and an employee may be required to work the full eight hours after reaching the place where he is employed. Re Martin, 157 Cal. 59, 106 Pac. 238.

While members of a fire department must at all times be ready to respond to alarms whenever given, they are not subjected to active toil eight hours in any twenty-four except in cases of emergency, within a statute limiting the hours of labor for persons employed by a municipality to not more than eight hours in any one day, or forty-eight hours in any one week, except in cases of necessity, emergency, or where public policy absolutely requires it. Albee v. Weinberger, 69 Or. 331, 138 Pac. 859.

Likewise, members of a police force which is divided into three shifts of eight hours each do not perform more than the prescribed number of hours of service except in cases of emergency. Ibid.

In Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. v. State, 103 Miss. 767, 60 So. 775, the court said it was impossible for them to determine definitely from the agreed statement of facts whether a certain employee was worked overtime or not, but that if he was on duty for one hour only at a time and then off for an hour, during which he was not confined to the precincts of the establishment or charged with any responsibility for the operation of the machinery, he was at work less than ten hours, but that if in fact he was on duty all the time, charged with keeping the machinery with which he worked in the continuous performance of its functions, he was, of course, at work all the time, and in that event it is immaterial that he may have had at times practically nothing to do.

A statute forbidding railroad employees from working more than a certain number of hours during a day becomes effective from the first moment of the day of its enactment, so that it is violated by one who works the forbidden number of hours after that time during such day. Lloyd v. North Carolina R. Co. 151 N. C. 536, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 378, 66 S. E. 604.

The time within which the hours of labor may be exceeded because of an extraordinary emergency, such as a flood, does not extend to the time employed in repairing the injuries and in removing the obstacles caused by the flood. United States v. Sheridan-Kirk Contr. Co. 149 Fed. 809.

Under a statute providing that "no employee shall be required, permitted or suffered to work in a biscuit, bread or cake bakery, confectionery establishment more than six (6) days in any one week; said week to commence on Sunday not before 6 o'clock post meridian, and to terminate at the corresponding time on Saturday of the same week," the week may commence at any time on Sunday after 6 o'clock in the evening, and will terminate at the corresponding hour on Saturday evening of the same week. Re Bakers' Employment Act, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 480.

b. Under Federal hours of service act.

The word "week" as used in the Federal hours of service statute concerning railroads means a period of seven days, and not necessarily a calendar week. The statute is not violated if no employee works overtime more than three days out of seven in case of emergency. United States v. Southern P. Co. 209 Fed. 562.

The time during which a train was delayed should be included within the time the crew was on duty, in considering whether the statute has been violated. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 189 Fed. 471.

The applicable provisions of the hours of service act are:

Section 1: "That the provisions of this act shall apply to any common carrier or carriers, their officers, agents, and employees, engaged in the transportation of passengers or property by railroad" in interstate commerce; "and the term 'employees' . . . shall be held to mean persons actually engaged in or connected with the movement of any train."

Section 2: "That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, its officers or agents, subject to this act to require or permit any employee subject to this act to be or remain on duty for a longer period than sixteen consecutive hours, and whenever any such employee . . . shall have been continuously on duty for sixteen hours he shall be relieved and not required or permitted again to go on duty until he has had at least ten consecutive hours off duty. . . ."

Section 3: ". . . Provided, that the provisions of this act shall not apply in any case of casualty or unavoidable accident or the act of God; nor where the delay was the result of a cause not known to the carrier or its officer or agent in charge of such employee at the time said employee left a terminal, and which could not have been foreseen. . . ." [34 Stat. at L. 1416, 1416, chap. 2939, Comp. Stat. 1913, §§ 8677-8679.]

The testimony on behalf of the government shows without dispute that the fire-

So, the release of a train crew from duty for one hour and thirty minutes while the train was held up does not break the continuity of the period of service of such employees. Northern P. R. Co. v. United States, 220 Fed. 108, affirming 213 Fed. 539.

Likewise, where a train is held up at a siding at a station for fifty-five minutes to allow another train to pass, the exact time of the arrival of the latter train being uncertain, and it being the duty of the crew of the former train to resume the journey immediately upon its arrival, such crew is on duty during the period of waiting, although during that period the switch was locked, the headlight of the waiting train was extinguished, and its conductor was reading and the brakemen were asleep. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 197 Fed. 629.

Under the statute there may be periods of duty with intermissions between, provided the aggregate of such periods does not exceed sixteen hours, and there is at least eight consecutive hours off duty within the twenty-four hour period, but whether the intermissions are such as the law will recognize depends upon their character as periods of substantial rest; and to break the continuity of the hours of service, the relief of the employee must be definite and certain as to the period of time, and substantial and opportune as to the period of rest, the question whether a particular interval is such a definite and substantial period of rest being one of fact for the jury. Southern P. Co. v. United States, 222 Fed. 46.

Brief periods allowed for meals do not break the continuity of service of trainmen, and should not be deducted in determining whether they have been kept continuously on duty for sixteen consecutive hours. United States v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 197 Fed. 624.

An employee is on duty within the statute when he is at his post in obedience to rules or the requirement by his superior, and ready and willing to work, whether actually at work or waiting for orders, or for the removal of hindrances from any cause. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. United States, L.R.A.1915D.

231 U. S. 112, 58 L. ed. 144, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26; United States v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. 195 Fed. 783.

So, the half hour before the schedule time for leaving the initial station, during which, by the rules of the carrier, a fireman is required to report and be ready for service, should be counted in determining whether or not the statute has been violated, as should also any delay in the departure of the train. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 28, 213 Fed. 326.

Nor does it detract from this view that the men were paid nothing for this preliminary time. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. supra.

A railway engineer is on duty within the act during the time in which he must look over his engine, see that it is oiled up, and that the air brakes are in proper condition, and move the engine down over the tracks and across the switches to connect it with the train; and if he goes there a half an hour before the time to start the train to do those things, he is then on duty. United States v. Illinois C. R. Co. 180 Fed. 630.

But the hours of service of an employee do not include the time required for him to reach the place where his services are required after he has been directed to report for duty, so the time during which a train employee is "dead heading" to reach the place where he is to report for duty, during which time he does not have any duties to perform in connection with the movement of the train on which he is riding, although he is paid for that time, should not be computed in determining whether or not there has been a violation of the provision of the statute that no employee who has been on duty sixteen hours in the aggregate in any twenty-four hours shall be required or permitted to continue, or again go on duty without having had at least eight consecutive hours off duty. Osborne v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 158 Ky. 176, 164 S. W. 818.

Under the provision of the act limiting the hours of labor for persons "actually engaged in or connected with the movement man named in each count was required to remain on duty on and about his respective engine more than sixteen consecutive hours without being relieved from such duty. This cast upon the defendant the burden of alleging and proving, by the greater weight of the testimony, facts which bring it within the proviso in § 3 of the act. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828.

It was the contention of the defendant upon the trial in the district court, and is its contention here, that when the engine upon which each of the firemen was employed was "tied up" (that is, its run temporarily suspended) within the sixteen-hour period, and the rest of the crew relieved from duty within such time, and the fireman required to watch and care for the engine, keep up its steam, the proper amount of water in the boiler, and otherwise care for the same thereafter, that while so engaged he was not employed "as fireman," and was not then within the provisions of this act. This court in San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 28, 213 Fed. 328, and the court of appeals in the ninth circuit in Great Northern R. Co. v. United States, 127 C. C. A. 595, 211 Fed. 309, and in Northern P. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 157, 213 Fed. 577, have held against this contention. A certiorari was denied by the Supreme Court in Great Northern R. Co. v. United States, May 11th of this year (234 U. S. 760, 58 L. ed. 1580, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776). The deof any train," the word "movement" is not restricted to the actual revolution of wheels of a train or locomotive engaged in interstate commerce, but includes the services of a fireman during the time his train is laid up on a siding, when he is required to act as an engine watchman, to keep the proper amount of water in the boiler, and keep up steam. Great Northern R. Co. v. United States, 127 C. C. A. 595, 211 Fed. 309, affirming 206 Fed. 838, writ of certiorari denied in 234 U. S. 760, 58 L. ed. 1580, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 776; San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 28, 213 Fed. 326; Northern P. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 157, 213 Fed. 577; GREAT NORTHERN R. Co. v. UNITED STATES.

Likewise, the statute includes the time spent by a fireman as watchman in charge of his engine while it is being drawn by another engine to the terminal station, during which his duties consist in keeping a certain amount of fire in the furnace, seeing that the water does not run too low in the boiler, and that a certain amount of steam pressure is preserved. United States v. Missouri P. R. Co. 206 Fed. 847; San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 28, 213 Fed. 326.

But when a train is delayed by any of the causes which are made exceptions to the Federal hours of service act, the crew may lawfully continue on duty to the terminal or end of that run, although the entire time is more than sixteen hours, there being nothing in the act which requires a carrier to proceed to the next suitable stopping place and there tie up and relieve the crew, or which prevents the crew from continuing on duty and proceeding on their trip to the terminal or end of that run. United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 212 Fed. 1000.

To the contrary, however, are San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 220 Fed. 737, and Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 220 Fed. 748, which hold that it was not the intention of Congress to permit a crew starting from a terminal to remain with the train which is delayed until the end of the run, but that the crew of L.R.A.1915D.

such a train must be relieved as soon as is possible by the exercise of proper diligence.

So, the occurrence of an unavoidable accident does not suspend the entire act as to that train, but extends the hours of service in such cases only so far as may be necessary to permit the train to be operated to a point at which, due regard being had to all the circumstances of the particular case and the character of the train, the train crew can be relieved or be allowed to take the rest required by the statute. United States v. Southern R. Co. Dist Ct. Western Dist. of S. C. Oct. 30, 1913.

Where a hot box on an engine was a sufficient excuse for working employees more than sixteen hours, other time lost because of the hot box, due to the fact that other trains got in the block while the hot box was being cooled, making it necessary for the train to wait until they were out of the way, should be included in the period coming within the exception. United States v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 218 Fed. 611.

Requiring a railway telegraph operator to work five and one-half hours and then, after an interval of three hours, three and one-half hours more in the same twenty-four, is not unlawful within the provision of the statute forbidding common carriers to permit such employee to be on duty for a longer period than nine hours in any twenty-four-hour period, in a place continuously operated day and night. United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 220 U. S. 37, 55 L. ed. 361, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 362.

But where a telegraph operator was subject to call during the time allowed for meals, that time should be included in determining whether his continuous hours of service exceeded those limited by that provision. United States v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 219 Fed. 342.

The provision is also violated by keeping operators on duty during two different periods within twenty-four hours, the aggregate of which exceeds nine hours. United States v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 189 Fed. 954; United States v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 208 Fed. 957.

And the fact that an employee was re-fendant's contention in this respect needs, therefore, no further consideration, and must be and is overruled.

The defendant offered to prove upon the trial of count 1, that upon the run from Devil's Lake to Redland, which are division terminals, that there was an unanticipated delay of the train because of a hot box; also that there was then an unusually heavy grain movement, and that even under these circumstances, the dispatcher expected that when the train reached Fisher, 12 miles from Redland, it would be able to reach Redland within the sixteen-hour period (as it in fact did). The court rejected this offered testimony as immaterial under the issues. A similar offer was made by the defendant upon the trial of count 2, which was rejected by the court for the same reason. Upon the trial of count 3 the defendant offered to prove by its train master that the train did not make its usual time for reasons not known to defendant or its agents when the train left Garretson, one of which was that the engine was not working well, because it had recently been overhauled, and it did not make the time expected of it.

It was upon the trial of this count that the defendant first suggested a defense under the proviso in § 3 of the act. It is proper, however, to say that the evidence upon count 3 was offered before the evidence upon counts 1 and 2 was offered. It is quite doubtful if this defense is properly before us for consideration. At the close quired to work only six hours as a train dispatcher, and then was required to work five hours and a half as a ticket seller, did not relieve the carrier from liability under that provision. Delano v. United States, 220 Fed. 635.

See also Re Georgia, S. & F. R. Co. 13 Inters. Com. Rep. 134, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission refused to grant relief from the operation of the statute at stations where the number of messages was small and the work might be performed by two men without unusual exertion of body or mind, by permitting dispatchers to do other work, the total time to exceed the hours fixed by the statute for dispatchers.

VII. What is an emergency, etc., within the statutes.

a. In general.

Generally, as to what constitutes an act of God, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Act of God."

Under a statute providing for punishment of employers who require or permit laborers or mechanics to work upon public works more than eight hours during a day, the question whether the evidence shows that such an emergency existed as would excuse the extra employment is a question of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury. Penn. Bridge Co. v. United States, 29 App. D. C. 452, 10 Ann. Cas. 719.

The fact that the specifications for a public bridge were changed after the date of the contract, requiring the bridge company to put in a certain amount of concrete masonry within a time limited, and that it was not possible to do the work specified and required within a period of eight hours' daily work, because, if the work was stopped at the end of eight hours, the concrete would harden and might be cleft, causing cracks and disintegration, did not show an extraordinary emergency within the Federal eight-hour statute, the term "extraordinary emergency" used in the statute importing a sudden and unexpected happening, an L.R.A.1915D.

unforeseen occurrence or condition calling for immediate action to avert imminent danger to health or life or property, an unusual peril, actual, and not imaginary, suddenly creating a situation so different from the usual or ordinary course in the prosecution of public works that the court may and must conclude that Congress contemplated excepting such an occurrence from the operation of the law. Ibid.

The building of a public levee on the Mississippi river in the eastern district of Louisiana cannot be said to present at all times an extraordinary emergency within a statute regulating the hours of laborers and mechanics on public works, and making it lawful to require or permit such employees to work a longer time except in cases of extraordinary emergency. United States v. Garbish, 222 U. S. 257, 56 L. ed. 190, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77, reversing 180 Fed. 502.

Nor is the building of a dam across the Ohio river a work of continuing extraordinary emergency, so as to justify the working of employees for more than the time limited by the statute for public works, during the whole period of performing the contract. United States v. Sheridan-Kirk Contr. Co. 149 Fed. 809.

A delay not entirely unexpected in obtaining the timber required for the construction of a pier at the navy yards does not create an extraordinary emergency within the meaning of the exception to an act forbidding a contractor upon any public work of the United States, under penalty of fine or imprisonment, to permit or require employees thereon to work more than eight hours each day. Ellis v. United States, 206 U. S. 246, 51 L. ed. 1047, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 600, 11 Ann. Cas. 589.

A state statute prohibiting the employment of persons in mills or manufacturing establishments for more than ten hours in any one day, except watchmen and other employees when engaged in making necessary repairs, the term "necessary repairs" is not limited to extreme cases in which failure to repair machinery would tie up the plant or imperil life, but includes such ordinary repairs as are made in maintaining of the evidence upon all the counts, the defendant moved for a directed verdict in its favor, which motion was denied, and defendant excepted. The government then moved for a directed verdict in its favor upon each count of the petition. Upon intimation of the court that it would have to be sustained, counsel for defendant said: "I understand that the government is willing that the record shall show that we made no defense under the answer, and that we may make up a special plea in defense required under the proviso."

The court said: "I will allow you to file an amended answer. It may be that you can settle upon the amendment."

No amendment was then filed, nor was leave granted to file it later. The motion of the government for a directed verdict in its favor was then sustained, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff upon each count of the petition on June 4th as before stated. A stay of proceedings was then ordered until August 31, 1913, which was later extended to and including October 31, 1913, when the bill of exceptions was signed. On October 28th there was filed with the clerk, without further leave of court, a stipulation as follows: "It is hereby stipulated between the parties to the above-entitled cause by their respective attorneys, that the supplemental answer of the defendant, attached hereto and made part of this stipulation, may be filed in said cause, and may be considered as filed on or before the date on which said cause was called for trial, reasonable efficiency in the plant. State v. Young, — Or. —, 145 Pac. 647.

The necessity for putting in a new pump to supply a city with water in order to increase the pumping capacity of the system, and guard against the disastrous consequences which might possibly result from any breakage or impairment of the single pump which had theretofore been the sole reliance of the city, came within an exception "in cases of extraordinary emergency caused by fire, flood, or dangers to life or property," and justified the municipality in employing laborers for a greater number of hours per day than that provided for in the statute. People ex rel. Usoy v. Waring, 52 App. Div. 36, 64 N. Y. Supp. 865.

b. Under Federal hours of service act.

Under the provisions of the Federal hours of service act relating to railroads, that it shall not apply "in any case of casualty or unavoidable accident or the act of God," an act of God is something which occurs exclusively by the violence of nature, or at least an act of nature which implies an entire exclusion of all human agencies; a casualty is an act which proceeds from an unknown cause, or is an unusual effect of a known cause; and an unavoidable accident is an inevitable accident which could not have been foreseen and prevented by the exercise of that degree of diligence which reasonable men would exercise under like conditions, and which resulted without any fault attributable to the parties sought to be held responsible. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 189 Fed. 471.

In United States v. Great Northern R. Co. 220 Fed. 630, the court defined the term "casualty" as used in the statute as a delay from an occurrence or happening due entirely to an outside human agency, and held that an instruction which relieved the railway company from liability if the delay was caused by an accident, even though it was avoidable, was erroneous.

Under a further exception, that the act shall not apply "where the delay was the result of a cause not known to the carrier or L.R.A.1915D.

its officer or agent in charge of such employee at the time said employee left a terminal; and which could not have been foreseen," a railway company is not excusable if the delay causing the excessive hours of work was due to a cause which the carrier, at the time the train left a terminal, either knew or by the exercise of due care might have foreseen. Ibid.

Where an empty car was carried in a train by means of a chain connection, its drawhead having been broken, and the continuing of the car in the train was not only unnecessary, but unlawful within another act, and because of trouble with the chain connection the train was delayed so that the crew was required to work more than the sixteen hours limited in the statute, such delay was not the result of a casualty or unavoidable accident within the statute. United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 212 Fed. 1000.

So, also, hot boxes and loosened drawbars are matters which constantly arise in the operation of railroads, and cannot be accepted as excuses for the violation of the statute. United States v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. Dist. of N. D. S. W. Div. Jan. 21, 1913.

Delays of trains caused by trains upon connecting lines being late are common, and do not come within the exception. United States v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 219 Fed. 342.

Where a train was stopped before the expiration of the sixteen-hour period of continuous service, as provided for in the Federal hours of service act, because of an unusual storm making the continuation of the journey dangerous, and all the crew laid off so as not to violate the statute, except firemen, who were required to watch their engines and keep up the fires, the exception in case of a casualty, unavoidable accident, or act of God does not apply to such firemen. Northern P. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 157, 213 Fed. 577.

The fact that an engine did not steam properly, because of some latent defect in the coal used, does not constitute an excuse for excessive hours of service, under the ex-to wit, June 4, 1913; and it may be further considered that the trial of said cause was had as if said supplemental answer had theretofore been filed therein, and issue joined thereon, and evidence presented thereunder. [Signed by the attorneys of the respective parties.]”

The supplemental answer, so called, attached to the above stipulation, is as follows: “Comes now the above-named defendant, and by leave of court first had and obtained makes further answer to the plaintiff’s complaint herein, to wit: (1) States, as to plaintiff’s first cause of action, that if Joseph Boese, as alleged therein, was required and permitted to be and remain on duty as fireman and employee for a longer period than sixteen consecutive hours, that said Boese was so required and permitted to remain on duty because of delay which was the result of a cause or causes not known to the defendant or its officer or agent in charge of said Boese at the time said Boese left the terminal known as Devil’s Lake, North Dakota, for the terminal known as Redland, Minnesota, and such delay could not have been foreseen, and said Boese was not required or permitted again to go on duty until he had had at least ten consecutive hours off duty.”

This answer to the second and third counts of the petition is identical with that to the first count above, except the name of the fireman and the terminals of the train upon which he was employed.

The court was undoubtedly right in exception. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828.

A delay in starting by reason of the fact that another train is late; time lost by reason of side tracking to give passenger or superior freight trains the right of way; time lost by reason of hot boxes, and time lost by reason of the locomotive getting out of steam or in cleaning fires, are not delays caused by casualty, avoidable accident, act of God, or by any cause which could not have been foreseen, within the exception. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 189 Fed. 471.

But the failure of injectors in an engine, which were in good order, to work, due to impure water taken from a stream along a temporary logging road, was held to be an unavoidable accident which could not have been foreseen and prevented by the use of ordinary care, where the engine got out of water because of extra heavy switching while on a spur track, and, as it was, the engine worked properly until within four miles of a water tank. United States v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 212 Fed. 574.

And a heavy landslide which blocked the road and made detour over other roads necessary justified the continuous employment of a train crew until they reached a point at which they could by proper diligence be relieved, but did not excuse continuing the crew in service after that time. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 220 Fed. 737.

And the fact that, because of a severe wreck on a single-track railroad, both train dispatchers were deeply engrossed in arranging and caring for the movement of a large number of trains, including the necessary wrecking outfits, together with the numerous incidentals necessarily growing out of such disaster, because of which they failed to check up the time of service of various crews of the numerous trains passing over that particular piece of road, resulting in orders being given which required a train crew to work over the time limited by the statute, was held to bring the case within the exception enumerated, as being a casualty or unavoidable accident. United States v. Northern P. R. Co. 131 C. C. A. 372, 215 Fed. 64.

Where elements which were important to be taken into consideration in determining whether or not a casualty was within the terms of exception were supported only by testimony coming from defendant’s employees, the government was entitled to have the cause of action sent to the jury under appropriate instructions. United States v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 218 Fed. 608.

So, where the casualties or unavoidable accidents which were relied on to bring a case within the provisions of the third section of the statute were an unusually high wind while the train was going up a grade, a broken tail pin, and a hot box, and there was testimony as to the nature of the flaw in the tail pin and also as to what had been done as to packing and inspecting of the bearing which heated, the question as to whether those facts brought the case within the exception should have been submitted to the jury. United States v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. 219 Fed. 532.

And the fact that the flues of an engine leaked at some point on the trip, the evidence of inspection thereof and of means taken to keep the engine in repair being unsatisfactory, does not excuse excessive hours of service. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828.

Likewise, in the absence of any testimony fixing the time when a rod used in keeping the grates of the fire box free from cinders while the train was in motion was broken, and showing that its defective condition occasioned the delay in question, the court cannot hold that that defense, if it was a defense, was conclusively established. Ibid.

Under the provisions of the Federal hours of service statute limiting the hours for train dispatchers in offices operated only during the daytime to thirteen hours, “except in case of emergency, when the employees named in this proviso may be permitted to be and remain on duty for four additional hours in a twenty-four-hour period,” it was held that a carrier was not liable to the cluding the evidence offered by the defendant in support of any supposed defense it might have under the proviso in § 3 of the hours of service act, as the only defense pleaded when this offer was made was that neither of the firemen was employed more than sixteen consecutive hours upon his engine. If the defendant relied upon any defense under the proviso, it was its duty to allege the facts constituting such defense before the trial began, so that the government might know what it would be required to meet. The so-called supplemental answer is but an amendment to the original answer; but it was not filed until more than four and one-half months after the trial and judgment. It does not appear from the record that the attention of the trial court was ever called to this stipulation, or to this supplemental answer. It may be that the statement of the court that it "would permit an amendment to the answer," and the stipulation of the government's counsel that it may be filed so long after the trial and without objection thereto, are sufficient to authorize its retention in the record as an amendment to the answer. But counsel should not be permitted to bind the court by stipulation that a pleading filed four and one-half months after the trial is completed and judgment entered, which materially changes the issue, shall be considered as having been filed before the trial began, for this would permit penalties of the act for permitting or requiring a telegraph operator to work continuously for more than seventeen hours, where such service was made necessary because of an unavoidable wreck on the road, and because another operator could not be secured to take his place, the court saying: "It is incredible that the Congress intended to prohibit or did prohibit such extended service by operators, train despatchers, and others in their class in cases of such casualties and unavoidable accidents. The object of the statute, the safety of travelers and employees, the necessities of the cases of railroad casualties and accidents, the demands of humanity, and a rational and practical interpretation of the statute converge with compelling force to convince that the Congress intended what it expressed, that 'the provisions of the act,'—all the provisions of the act, those relating to the hours of service of telegraphers and train despatchers, as well as those relating to the hours of service of other employees,—shall not apply in any case of casualty or unavoidable accident or the act of God." United States v. Missouri P. R. Co. 130 C. C. A. 5, 213 Fed. 169.

So, where a train on which a relief operator was proceeding to take the place of a sick operator was wrecked, and the relief operator was retained at the wreck to establish a temporary office to facilitate clearing the track, making it necessary to work the operator he was to have relieved for more than the excessive time allowed by the statute, such wreck was an accident or casualty which prevented the operation of the statute. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, 220 Fed. 737.

The term "emergency" as used in the provision relating to train despatchers is used in its ordinary or popular sense, and the unexpected sickness of one of several train despatchers, which made it necessary to work the others for longer periods than the statute provided for, is such an emergency. United States v. Southern P. Co. 209 Fed. 562; San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. Co. v. United States, supra.

Sudden illness of a railway train despatcher is also a "casualty" excepting such L.R.A.1915D.

extra service from the provisions of the statute. United States v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. 216 Fed. 702.

So, also, the sudden death of the mother of a train despatcher, making it necessary for him to be off duty and for the company to employ a copy operator overtime to fill his place, was a "casualty" within the statute. Ibid.

To guard against an emergency with reference to the business of despatching trains, a railroad company was required to exercise ordinary care, and such ordinary care did not require that it have an extra train despatcher or despatchers to take the place of those who might unexpectedly become ill. United States v. Southern P. Co. 209 Fed. 562.

An allegation in an answer to an action for violation of the provision of the statute relating to telegraph operators, that one of the operators became of violent temper, abusive, insubordinate, and defiant, by reason of which it became necessary to dismiss him from the service of the company, because his retention thereafter would be inconsistent with discipline, and dangerous to the interest of the company and the safety of the public, alleged an emergency within the provision of the statute. United States v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 220 Fed. 293.

But the fact that the employees of a carnival company while loading its stuff on a train were intoxicated and ran a wagon off a flat car, which caused a long delay in the train's departure, and on account of which the train was of necessity loaded on one of the main lines, and that it was necessary to clear the line as soon as possible, furnished neither justification nor excuse for requiring a telegraph operator to remain on duty for more than the statutory period. United States v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 219 Fed. 342.

VIII. Pleading and proof as to emergency, etc.

a. In general.

A municipal corporation seeking to avoid payment on a contract for public work, be-them to require the appellate court to determine questions never determined by the trial court. But, putting aside this question, we are of opinion that the proffered testimony offered by the defendant does not show any casualty or unavoidable accident or an act of God, nor a delay which was the result of a cause not known to the carrier or its officer or agent in charge of the trainmen at the time they left a terminal, which could not have been anticipated and foreseen in the exercise of proper vigilance and care upon their part.

It is a matter of common knowledge among railroad officials and trainmen, as indicated by the defendant's testimony, that hot boxes are liable to occur at any time in the operation of railroad trains; and officials in charge of the running of such trains should be held to anticipate their occurrence, and to exercise reasonable diligence to guard against delays because of them. If a hot box occurs in the running of a train that is liable to prevent it from reaching the end of its run within the sixteen-hour period, reasonable diligence would require that the car upon which it occurs should be set out at the first opportunity, and trainmen not continued on duty overtime because thereof to their detriment, and the danger to persons and property because of their lack of required rest.

That there was a heavy grain movement upon defendant's road at the time in ques-cause of a violation by the contractor of a statute limiting the labor of his employees to eight hours in one day, must allege that the overwork was not in cases of extraordinary emergency caused by fire, flood, or danger to life or property, which are made exceptions to the statute, a mere allegation that the plaintiff violated the contract by permitting or requiring men to work more than eight hours being insufficient. Molloy v. Briarcliff Manor, 158 App. Div. 456, 143 N. Y. Supp. 599.

But under a statute limiting the hours of labor upon a public work except in case of extraordinary emergency, the duty of showing that such an emergency existed devolves upon the person charged with violating the statute. United States v. Sheridan-Kirk Contr. Co. 149 Fed. 809.

b. Under Federal hours of service act.

Where the complaint alleged, and the defendant in its answer admitted, that it had required or permitted its employees on interstate trains to remain on duty for a longer period than sixteen consecutive hours, a prima facie case of violation of the Federal hours of service statute was made out. United States v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 212 Fed. 1000.

And facts claimed to show an excuse within the statutes should be pleaded, a general denial being insufficient for that purpose. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828.

In United States v. Houston Belt & Terminal R. Co. 125 C. C. A. 481, 205 Fed. 344, it is held that the government is not required to allege that the excessive hours which an employee has been required to work do not come within the exception to the statute making the working of additional hours permissible in cases of emergency, the reason given being that, though for a penalty, the act is civil in its nature and the pleader is not required to state his cause of action with the exactness and particularity that would be necessary in a criminal indictment, the court saying: "In the nature of things, in most cases arising L.R.A.1915D.

under the act, facts bringing the case within the exception would be only within the knowledge of the railroad, and the government should not be required to allege that of which it knows nothing simply to conform to a mere technicality of pleading. If facts existed that would bring the case within the exception, they constituted a defense that the railroad should have pleaded and proved."

And in United States v. Great Northern R. Co. 220 Fed. 630, the court said that whether a plaintiff counting on a breach of statutory duty must plead and prove the negative of an exception in the statute was more than a mere artificiality, and stated the principle upon which the question should be determined to be that if a statute puts an exception or limitation into the definition of a duty, then plaintiff, counting on a breach of the duty, must plead and prove the negative of the exception or limitation; but if the statute gives a general definition of duty, and then subsequently provides that a violator shall not be liable under certain circumstances, plaintiff need plead and prove no more than the violation of the duty as defined, and defendant must plead and prove the circumstances that must save him from liability. So, as the proviso in the Federal hours of service statute comes in the latter class, the plaintiff need not allege and prove that the case did not come within one of the exceptions mentioned, and if affirmative defenses are pleaded, the proof should bring the case clearly within the letter, as well as within the spirit, of the proviso. See also GREAT NORTHERN R. CO. v. UNITED STATES.

In United States v. Great Northern R. Co. 220 Fed. 630, it was held to be error for the trial court to refuse to give an instruction on the part of the government, that "it cannot be presumed, in the absence of any proof, that the company's equipment was in good condition, and the mere statement that the delay was the result of a pulled-out drawbar in one instance, and a bursted air hose in another, is not, standing alone, sufficient to excuse the defendant."

tion is surely not an unavoidable casualty, nor is it a cause that cannot be known or foreseen in the exercise of proper diligence upon the part of the officials in charge of the running of trains before they are sent out. Neither is an "extraordinary head wind" or a storm that does not cause obstructions to or breaks in the track or road-bed that may delay trains to some extent in making their ordinary running time, a cause not to be anticipated or foreseen by train officials; and violations of the law in working the trainmen overtime can easily be avoided by relieving them, if necessary. In other words, the proviso in § 3 of the act does not relieve the officials in charge of train crews from exercising proper diligence to avoid working them overtime; and proper diligence requires train officials to know whether or not engines and cars are in

The burden of proving that an accident was unavoidable and could not have been foreseen at the time the train left the terminal is upon the defendant. United States v. Southern P. Co. 220 Fed. 745.

Where a carrier claims to be excused for exceeding the hours of service provided for in the statute, because the delay was due to an unavoidable accident, plaintiff is entitled to prove that like trouble was of daily occurrence during several months preceding the accident in question, as tending to show a negligent habit of the officers and agents of the railroad company. Ibid.

To bring itself within the exceptions stated in the statute, the carrier must be held to as high a degree of diligence and foresight as may be consistent with the object aimed at and the practical operation of its railroad, and must show that delays could not have been foreseen and prevented by exercise of the high degree of diligence demanded. United States v. Kansas City Southern R. Co. 121 C. C. A. 136, 202 Fed. 828.

But in United States v. Southern P. Co. supra, an answer that the employment for the excessive hours of service charged was made necessary by the breaking in two of the train, "and that the same was caused by an unavoidable accident, and one that could not have been foreseen by this defendant or any of its officers, agents, or employees," was held to be a sufficient defense on demurrer.

A carrier sued for keeping employees on duty more than sixteen consecutive hours cannot urge upon certiorari that the delay of the train which kept the employees beyond the proper time was caused by a defect in an injector that was not known to the carrier, and could not have been foreseen, when the employees left a terminal, where the question was raised only by a request to direct a verdict for the defendant, and the trouble might have been found to have been due to the scarcity and bad quality of the water, which was known to the carrier. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. United States, 231 U. S. 112, 58 L. ed. 144, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

IX. Effect of violation.

a. On liability for personal injuries to employees.

Generally, as to overwork of a servant as affecting the master's liability for injury to him or another servant, see Furlow v. L.R.A. 1916D.

United Oil Mills, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 372, and note. And particularly see in that note the cases of Smith v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 39 Tex. Civ. App. 468, 87 S. W. 1052, and Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 139 Am. St. Rep. 389, 87 N. E. 229, involving violation of statute limiting hours of labor. And see also note to Lloyd v. North Carolina R. Co. 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 378, as to effect of servant's own violation of statute limiting hours of labor.

A violation of the Federal hours of service act prohibiting more than sixteen hours of consecutive service from railway employees does not create an unconditional liability on the part of the carrier for all accidents to such employees happening during the period of service beyond the statutory limit, irrespective of proof showing a connection between the accident and the working overtime. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. McWhirter, 229 U. S. 265, 57 L. ed. 1179, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 858, reversing 145 Ky. 427, 140 S. W. 672, referred to in the note in 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 378, which held that the language of the provision in question is mandatory, and that the duty it imposes is a definite, absolute duty, nonperformance of which may not be excused by a showing on the part of the railroad company that it used ordinary care or reasonable diligence to perform it, but was unable to do so, and violation of the statutory duty is negligence per se.

The purpose of statutes limiting the hours of labor is to protect the employee or the public, and they do not abrogate the defenses of contributory negligence or assumption of risk in an action for damages for personal injuries to the servant against the employer unless they so declare, their effect being to render a failure to comply with their requirements negligence per se or legal negligence, and not to excuse negligence in other persons; so, if a violation of the statute by the employer is negligence, it is equally so on the part of the employee, and if the disobedience of the employer is the proximate cause of the injuries, so the dereliction on the part of the employee must be regarded as a contributory proximate cause or an indication that he assumed the risk, in which case the employee cannot recover because, in alleging the injury, he must of necessity allege his own fault. And these defenses may likewise be made against the wife and children of a deceased employee. Melville v. Butte-Balaklava Copper Co. 47 Mont. 1, 130 Pac. 441.

The defendant made no offer to show the length of time either of the trains in question was delayed because of the alleged unknown causes, except that there was an offer to prove that the engine mentioned in count 2 of the petition was delayed thirty-five minutes at some station on the line because of a hot box. But notwithstanding this the train arrived at Redland, its terminal, within the sixteen-hour period, and the crew, except the fireman, relieved within that period. See Northern P. R. Co. v. United States, 130 C. C. A. 157, 213 Fed. 577, 580, 581 (9th C. C. A.)

The judgment must be and is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied January 13, 1915.

In a suit under a statute which provides that no employee of a common carrier who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier, its officials, agents, or employees, of any law enacted for the safety of employees or persons, contributed to the injury or death of such employee, the court will not read into the provisions of the statute those of another statute which provides that contributory negligence shall not be a defense where an employee is injured while being required to work in excess of the hours provided by the statute, so as to make it unnecessary to show that the fact that the employee was working overtime contributed to his injury; but whether the violation of that statute in fact contributed to his injury is a question for the jury, and if they should find that it did, then the defense of contributory negligence is not available. Kansas City & M. R. Co. v. Huff, — Ark. —, 173 S. W. 419.

A causal connection between the unlawful employment and the injury of which complaint is made must be shown. Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, supra.

b. On payment for public work.

In Medina v. Dingledine, 211 N. Y. 24, 104 N. E. 1118, under a statute prohibiting the employment of laborers, workmen, or mechanics on work being done by or in behalf of the state or a municipal corporation or any commission appointed pursuant to law, for more than eight hours in any one calendar day, and providing that no person or corporation doing such work shall be entitled to receive any sum therefor, nor shall any officer, agent, or employee of the state or of any municipal corporation pay the same or authorize its payment from the funds under his charge or control, for work done upon any contract which in its form or manner of performance violates the provision of the statute, it is held that a municipal corporation may not waive a violation of the statute, even to the extent of compensating contractors for work and materials actually done and furnished on the basis of a quantum meruit, and where a municipal corporation has made payments to contractors with the knowledge that they were working their men more than eight hours in violation of the statute, it will not be credited with the payments made as against a surety for the contractor who is in default.

A city may be estopped from insisting upon a forfeiture of the rights of a contractor doing municipal work on the ground that he violated the eight-hour law in performing the contract, by continuing to avail itself of the contract with the contractor, and to accept work done under it after knowledge of the violation. People ex rel. Hausauer-Jones Printing Co. v. Zimmerman, 58 Misc. 264, 109 N. Y. Supp. 396.

Under a statute providing that it is unlawful for any contractor performing public work of any kind to require or permit his laborers to labor for more than eight hours in any one calendar day, and that each and every contract for such work shall stipulate a penalty for each violation, the amount of the penalty stipulated in the contract is all that may be withheld by a municipality, and where the answer of a city to a suit to recover the amount due on a contract does not show or attempt to show that the contract contained any stipulation whatever as to the time laborers or mechanics should be required to work, or as to the penalties referred to in the act, or that any inspector or officer reported any violation of the act or of any stipulation in the contract, or the amount of any penalties incurred, the city fails to show its right to withhold any amount from plaintiff. Worthington v. Breed, 142 Cal. 102, 75 Pac. 675.

X. What offices are operated night and day under Federal hours of service act.

A railroad telegraph office comes within the classification of offices "continuously operated night and day," within the terms of the Federal hours of service act, where it is closed for only two periods of one hour each during the twenty-four. United States v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 208 Fed. 957.

The classification of telegraph offices in the Federal hours of service statute is fixed by the length of time they are kept open, and not in the least by the nature of the duties performed, if only those duties include the handling of train orders as occasions may require. And an office comes within the class designated as those continuously operated night and day although it is closed at 10:15 p. m. and kept closed until 6:30 a. m. United States v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 128 C. C. A. 275, 211 Fed. 897; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. United States, 128 C. C. A. 281, 211 Fed. 903.

A telegraph office operated in connection with a railroad, which is closed during each twenty-four hours for four periods of one hour each, is continuously operated night and day within the contemplation of the statute. United States v. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. 189 Fed. 954.

XI. Violation of statute by employee.

Under a statute limiting the hours of labor for miners or laborers who may be employed in any coal mines of the state to eight hours, and providing that "any owner, lessee, or operator, his or its agents, employees, or servants, violating any of the provisions of this chapter, shall be fined not less than $50, nor more than $300, or imprisoned not more than three months, or both," the penal provision applies only to that class of employees or servants who stand in the place of the owner, lessee, or operator of a mine, and have something to do with employing, superintending, or directing the miners and laborers in the performance of their labors, and it was not intended to punish the miner or laborer who voluntarily performed more than eight hours' labor in the mine during a calendar day. State v. Thompson, 15 Wyo. 136, 87 Pac. 433.

But in Ex parte Kair, 28 Nev. 127, 113 Am. St. Rep. 817, 80 Pac. 463, 6 Ann. Cas. 893, affirmed on rehearing in 28 Nev. 425, 82 Pac. 453, 6 Ann. Cas. 897, a statute imposing a penalty on anyone working more than eight hours a day in any mine, smelter, or mill for the reduction of ores was applied to a workman in a smelter, and his conviction under the statute was sustained.

A statute providing that "the period of employment of workmen in smelters and all other institutions for the reduction or refining of ores or metals shall be eight (8) hours per day except in cases of emergency where life or property is in imminent danger. Any person, body corporate, agent, manager or employer who shall violate any of the provisions . . . of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," applies with equal force to the employer and the employee. Short v. Bullion-Beck & C. Min. Co. 20 Utah, 20, 45 L.R.A. 603, 57 Pac. 720.

And a statutory provision that "a period of eight (8) hours shall constitute a day's work on all works or undertakings carried on or aided by any municipal, county or state government, and on all contracts let by them, and in mills and smelters for the treatment of ores, and in underground mines," followed by a penal provision applying to "every person, corporation, stock company, or association of persons" who violate any of the provisions of the act, may be violated by either employer or employee. State v. Livingston Concrete Bldg. & Mfg. L.R.A. 1915D.

Co. 34 Mont. 570, 87 Pac. 980, 9 Ann. Cas. 204.

But the statute does not make a failure to work eight hours an offense. Ibid.

XII. Reports under Federal hours of service act.

Carriers subject to the Federal hours of service act cannot claim a privilege against self-crimination to justify the refusal to comply with an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission requiring the secretary or similar officer to make monthly reports under oath showing the instances where employees subject to the act have rendered excessive service, and giving the cause of such excessive service and explanatory facts, or, where there has been no excessive service, to make a separate oath to that effect. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 221 U. S. 612, 55 L. ed. 878, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 621.

Nor can a secretary or similar officer of a carrier subject to the act claim such a privilege personally. Ibid.

The filing in good faith of an incomplete or incorrect report as to instances of employment in excess of the hours limited by the hours of service act, with the Interstate Commerce Commission, does not subject a railroad company to the penalty provided for such a failure. Northern P. R. Co. v. United States, L.R.A. —, 129 C. C. A. 514, 213 Fed. 162; Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. v. United States, 222 Fed. 887.

But the penal provision of the statute which requires that carriers shall make reports of instances in which employees have been required to work more than the maximum number of hours is mandatory in respect to the penalty for failure to comply with the order of the Commission, and the court has no discretion to ameliorate the penalty provided for because of mitigating conditions. United States v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. 203 Fed. 159.

XIII. Miscellaneous cases.

A statute providing that "eight hours shall constitute a day's work for all laborers, workmen, and mechanics now employed, or who may hereafter be employed, by or on behalf of any city or town in this commonwealth," does not prevent a city employee from contracting to work a greater number of hours for extra compensation. Woods v. Woburn, — Mass. —, 107 N. E. 985.

Employees of a city who are required to work more than eight hours in violation of statute may maintain a suit for injunction to restrain the city from violating the statute. Davies v. Seattle, 67 Wash. 532, 121 Pac. 987.

A statute forbidding the employment of children after 7 o'clock in the evening applies to work done within the state under a contract executed in another state by persons residing there. Com. v. Griffith, 204 Mass. 18, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 957, 134 Am. St. Rep. 645, 19 N. E. 394.

The offense of requiring or permitting laborers and mechanics in the employ of a contractor to work upon a public work of the United States for more than eight hours in a calendar day does not consist in the doing of the work, but in requiring or permitting it to be done, and therefore where the work is directed from the jurisdiction within which the indictment is brought, the indictment is sufficient although the work is done in another jurisdiction. United States v. Sheridan-Kirk Contr. Co. 149 Fed. 809.

The Federal hours of service statute will not relieve a carrier from liability for failure to carry a passenger to his destination without delay, as the statute makes exceptions in cases of emergency, and if a train was unable to complete its journey within the time limited because of such an emergency, it would not have been a violation of the act to have continued, and if the delay was not due to such an emergency, it must have been due to defendant's negligence. Black v. Charleston & W. C. R. Co. 87 S. C. 241, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1184, 69 S. E. 230.

The fact that a civil action is given for the recovery of a penalty for violation of a statute limiting the hours of service of employees does not prevent the same violation being made a misdemeanor. People v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 85 Misc. 482, 147 N. Y. Supp. 789. This case was reversed in 163 App. Div. 79, 148 N. Y. Supp. 495, on the ground that the Federal hours of service act had superseded the state statute as to employees engaged in interstate commerce, and therefore a conviction under the state statute was void. NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

v.

T. J. BALLARD, Appt.,

(168 N. C. 16, 84 S. E. 21.)

Justice of the peace — judgment without summons — remedy.

1. The remedy of one against whom a judgment has been entered by a justice of the peace without service of summons is by motion before the justice to set aside the judgment.

Note. — Services of writ or process by telephone.

A search has disclosed but one reported case in addition to S. LOWMAN & Co. v. BALLARD passing upon the validity of service of process by telephone.

In Ex parte Terrell, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 95 S. W. 536, it is held that reading a subpoena to a witness over the telephone is not a sufficient service under a statute providing that "a subpoena is served by reading the same in the hearing of the witness." L.R.A.1915D.

Writ — service — reading over telephone.

2. Reading a summons to defendant over the telephone is not a sufficient service under a statute providing that summons shall be served by reading the same to defendant, where at the time the statute was enacted the telephone was not in existence as a general means of communication.

(Clark, Ch. J. and Allen, J., dissent.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Anson County affirming a judgment of a justice of the peace refusing to set aside a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action on an account. Reversed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

On the hearing, it appeared that in 1911 plaintiff instituted an action on account against defendant, before a justice of the peace in said county, and on March 16, 1911, recovered judgment for $173.75, defendant not appealing at this time; that defendant instituted a civil action against plaintiff to set aside said judgment, claiming that he owed plaintiff nothing, and that he had never been served with summons in said cause, and for many months after its rendition he had no notice or knowledge of the existence of the judgment or of any suit against him by plaintiff. Judgment in that cause was entered in favor of the present plaintiff, and on appeal judgment was affirmed, the court being of opinion that, on the facts presented in that record, defendant could only proceed by motion before the justice to set aside the judgment. See Ballard v. Lowry, 163 N. C. 487, 79 S. E. 966. Pursuant to that intimation, defendant, on notice duly served, made the present motion to set aside the judgment before the justice, J. H. Benton, Esq., and on the ground, among others, that the summons in the action had been originally served by telephone, the sheriff being at Wadesboro and defendant at Morven, 9 miles distant. On the hearing the justice found that the sheriff

The court pointed out that by the statute the officer was entitled to fees for service, and fees for mileage traveled in making the service, and thought that the statute contemplated a personal service, not only by reading the process in the hearing but in the presence of the witness; and said that in case of reading the subpoena over the telephone, the identification could only be by voice, which could apply only in a few cases, and would be at least a rather unsatisfactory method of identification.

The validity of an acknowledgment or had "read the summons by telephone to defendant, and, recognizing that it was defendant by conversation had between them at the time, he had made the return on the process served," etc. The justice, being of opinion that there had been a valid service, refused to set aside the judgment, and on appeal to superior court, this ruling was affirmed, the material portion of his Honor's judgment being as follows:

"The court finds as a fact that J. T. Short was a deputy sheriff of Anson county on the 27th day of February, 1911, and read the summons issued in said cause by said justice of the peace to the defendant, T. J. Ballard, over the telephone line connecting Wadesboro and Morven, and that the said deputy sheriff was well acquainted with said defendant, and recognized his voice over the telephone in the conversation between them at said time, whereupon said deputy sheriff made the return and indorsement upon the summons. Upon these facts the court finds that, as a matter of law, said service and reading of said summons over the telephone was a legal and valid service of said summons, and the court so holds. From this judgment, the defendant excepts and appeals to the supreme court."

Messrs. Lockhart & Dunlap for appellant.

Messrs. Gullledge & Boggan, for appellee:

Defendant's motion to set aside the judgment rendered by the justice of the peace must fail, because it was not made within one year from the time he had notice of the action and judgment rendered against him by said justice.

Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. v. Scott, 136 N. C. 157, 48 S. E. 581; Clement v. Ireland, 129 N. C. 220, 39 S. E. 838; Morehead Bkg. Co. v. Duke, 121 N. C. 111, 28 S. E. 191; Roberts v. Allman, 106 N. C. 391, 11 S. E. 424; Ruffin v. Harrison, 91 N. C. 398.

The reading of the summons to the defendant over the telephone, where the officer was well acquainted with and recognized his voice, is a sufficient reading and a legal service.

Oath taken over the telephone is discussed in the note to Wester v. Hunt, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 358.

The cases passing upon the validity of a presentment of bill or note by telephone are presented in the note to Gilpin v. Savage, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 417.

Generally as to necessity and sufficiency of identification as a foundation for the admission of a conversation or communication L.R.A.1915D.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On the facts appearing of record, and in like case whenever the remedy is available to him, the procedure open to defendant is by motion before the justice who tried the cause. This was virtually held on a former appeal between the parties (163 N. C. 487, 79 S. E. 966), and the position is in accord with our decisions on the subject (Thompson v. Lynchburg Notion Co. 160 N. C. 519, 76 S. E. 470; Clark v. Deloach Mills Mfg. Co. 110 N. C. 111, 14 S. E. 518; Whitehurst v. Merchants' & F. Transp. Co. 109 N. C. 342, 13 S. E. 937; McKee v. Angel, 90 N. C. 60).

In Thompson v. Lynchburg Notion Co. supra, that being a case where service had been regularly made by publication and defendant had neither appeared nor answered, the decision was made to rest on § 1491 of Revisal, which allowed an appeal to be taken in such cases within fifteen days after personal notice of the rendition of the judgment, but Associate Justice Allen, in his well-considered opinion, is careful to note that, in case of defective process, or where there is the appearance of service when in fact there was none, the remedy by motion before the justice is properly available. Both in the superior and justice's courts the statutory limits, as to time within which motion of this character shall be made, are cases where the proceedings are, in all respects, regular, and do not apply in cases when there is defective service of process or an entire absence of it. Massie v. Hainey, 165 N. C. 174, 81 S. E. 135; McKee v. Angel, 90 N. C. 60, supra. Authority here is also to the effect that, where a statute provides for service of summons or notices in the progress of a cause of certain persons or by designated methods, the specified requirements must be complied with or there is no valid service. Martin v. Buffaloe, 128 N. C. 305, 83 Am. St. Rep. 679, 38 S. E. 902; Smith v. Smith, 119 N. C. 314, 25 S. E. 878; Allen v. Strickland, 100 N. C. 225, 6 S. E. 780; McKee v. Angel, supra.

This, then, being proper procedure, and the only service of the original process in this cause having been by means of the telephone, "the sheriff being at Wadesboro and defendant at Morven, 9 miles distant," the question chiefly and directly presented by this appeal is whether, in this jurisdiction, there can be a valid service of original process by means of the telephone. Our statute on the subject (Revisal, § 439) provides that the summons "shall be served, in all cases except as hereinafter provided, by the sheriff or other officer reading the same to the party or parties named as defendant, and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service." This method of serving process was established by the legislature of 1876 and 1877, and at the time the telephone as a general system of communication was not in existence. An interesting account of its origin and development will be found in Telephone Cases, 126 U. S. 1, 31 L. ed. 863, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 778, the volume being devoted to a proper report of the telephone cases, from which it appears that the patents were applied for in 1876; that the litigation concerning them was continued for something over eleven years, and it was not until 1887 that decision was made declaring the rights in dispute to be in Professor Bell and his associates, and although the active development of the system was immediately and successfully entered upon, the telephone, as now operated, did not come into very general use and application until about the beginning of the present century, or a short period preceding that date.

At the time, therefore, when this legislation was enacted, the only method of service contemplated or provided for was by reading the summons in the personal presence of the party, and we are of opinion that this is and should continue to be the correct interpretation of the statute, as it is now written. This service of original process by which courts of justice acquire jurisdiction over the rights of person and of property of the citizen has always been, and properly, regulated with circumspect care. In the Code of 1868, it could only be done by leaving a copy of the summons under the court seal; later, in 1876 and 1877, the seal was omitted when the process ran to the county of the officer who issued it, and at the same session a service by reading by the sheriff or some officer was established; both of these changes, it will be noted, being by legislative enactment. And this method of service, by reading in the personal presence of the party, affording as it does to the sheriff a more satisfactory and certain means of identifying the person on whom the service is made, and giving assurance to the litigant of the true import of the act by present exhibition of the process, giving him better opportunity, too, to ascertain the position and authority of the officer, and being the method contemplated and described by the statute at the time it was passed, and the only one recognized and pursued for twenty years thereafter, should not be altered, if at all, save by express provision of the statute law.

The only valid objection to be made to this position is that it may, at times, make for inconvenience of the officer, but even as to him the proposed change is of doubtful benefit. We know that a sheriff, or other officer having a process of this character in charge, is properly held to a strict account as to the verity of the service. If he makes a false return, he and his bondsmen may be subjected to serious penalties, and, looked at only from the officer's point of view, there is grave question if in the effort to perform this important duty he should be subjected to the additional uncertainties, sure to arise by recognizing the proposed manner of service.

On authority the question does not seem to have been very much discussed in the courts. The nearest case we have been able to find on the subject is in Ex parte Terrell, — Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 95 S. W. 536. That case was an attachment for contempt against a defaulting witness, their statute requiring service of subpoena by "reading same in the hearing of the witness," and it was held that service by telephone was no valid service, and the position derives some support in a New York case of Gilpin v. Savage, 201 N. Y. 167, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 417, 94 N. E. 656, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 861, to the effect that presentment of a note and demand for payment must be by actual exhibit of the instrument, and that a demand made by telephone was insufficient. We are aware that, in a number of cases, it has been held that, under regulations requiring service of notices to be in writing, service by means of a telegram, written out by the agent and delivered, has been upheld, but these were generally in instances where the parties had voluntarily adopted that method of communication. And where the principle has been approved in reference to court process, the statute did not require that service be made by any particular or designated person; and the party being charged with the duty of having the notice served, the court has held that such party could make the company his agent to write the notice, within the meaning of the law. Such was the case presented in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Bailey, 115 Ga. 725, 61 L.R.A. 933, 42 S. E. 89, a case to which we were cited. On service of writs of certiorari, the statute required that the applicant should cause written notice of its proper sanction to be served on his opponent, and service by telegram was upheld on the ground that, as the statute required the party to cause notice to be served, and did not designate by whom, the plaintiff could designate the company as his agent, and the notice so written out would be considered a sufficient compliance with the law. Even in that aspect, the case seems to have caused the court much perplexity, and one of the judges dissented.

Again, there are cases in which notices of injunction were served by telegram and the service was sustained, but these decisions were in application of the principle declared by the English chancellors, to the effect that, under certain circumstances, if a party in an injunction proceeding knew of the existence of the order and intentionally violated it, or knowingly or intentionally acted so as to render the same of noneffect, he could be held for contempt. Vansandau v. Rose, 2 Jac. & W. 264, 22 Revised Rep. 114; Hearn v. Tennant, 14 Ves. Jr. 136, 9 Revised Rep. 253; Rulings by Lord Chancellor Eldon, the first referred to in Cape May & S. L. R. Co. v. Johnson, 35 N. J. Eq. 422-425, and the second in Davis v. Champion Fiber Co. 150 N. C. 87, 63 S. E. 178, 180, erroneously printed in this last citation as Lord Erskine. But, while this ruling may be upheld in proceedings of that character, the exigency of the case at times requiring the recognition of such a principle, it should not be allowed to prevail in reference to the service of original process where, as in this case, the statute, as heretofore stated, at the time it was enacted, contemplated and provided for a service by reading the writ in the personal presence of the party, and involving, too, the necessary exhibition of the process to the litigant. On the facts in evidence, we are of opinion and so hold that there has been no valid service of process shown, and this will be certified that the judgment of the justice court be set aside and defendant allowed to answer.

Reversed.

Clark, Ch. J., (dissenting):

Revisal 439 provides that the summons shall be served by the officer "reading the same to the defendant, and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service." All this has been done in this case. Unless the court shall legislate by putting into the statute what the legislature has not yet thought proper to put therein, this is "a legal and sufficient service." The summons, it is found as a fact, was read by the sheriff to this defendant, and indeed there is no question as to that fact, or as to his being sheriff, or as to the identity of the defendant. What more can be necessary? Whether or not there might be greater or less certainty as to the identity of the defendant, in service by phone, when he is brought to the phone by an agent of the sheriff, or the sheriff recognizes him, is a matter for the legislature if that body should find that the law needs amendment.

As to the identity of the sheriff, that is a matter for the court on the service of every process, which is authenticated by his signature. As to the identity of the defendant, the officer takes that risk whether he sees him (for he may not know him personally except by information) or phones him. The sheriff is under the highest obligations to be certain as to the identity of the defendant; for he is acting under the oath of his office, and is also liable under a heavy penalty for making a false return.

The law does not require that the sheriff shall "leave a copy" with the defendant. That was long since dispensed with. Nor has it ever required that he should see the defendant. There can be no question that a near-sighted sheriff or deputy could serve process, the identity of the defendant being in all cases a matter of which the officer must assure himself under liability to a penalty. If there is a mistake as to identity of the defendant, he can avail himself of it equally whether the sheriff is immediately present or is blind, or speaks over the phone. In the Trojan War, Stentor made his summons to surrender to the enemy on the walls of Troy at a good distance, out of the reach of arrows, and the service was sufficient. In fact in former days the heralds of opposing armies served their summons at a good distance by trumpet.

There is no statute, and no decision, that requires that the defendant shall see the paper or read it himself, or that he shall know the identity of the officer. The court knows its own officers, and the defendant takes the risk if he does not recognize the officer's authority. The officer takes the risk under his oath, and under a penalty, if he mistakes the identity of the defendant. Whether the service is on a defendant who was personally present or who is at the end of a phone, these principles apply.

In this day there is an urgent demand that courts shall reduce the time and expense of proceedings. Why should an officer ride all night over bad roads and in bad weather, at great expense, to read a summons or a subpoena to a party who is needed in court next morning, when he can read the paper as intelligently to the party over the phone and with as much certainty of his identity as if he went to the locality and hunted him up. Indeed when the service is made by phone the officer will take even greater precautions, because he cannot reach the party in that way unless he is brought to the phone, at his request by some agent of the sheriff, or voluntarily remains at the phone till the reading is completed.

It is suggested that "service by phone is not safe," millions of dollars in contracts are made every day over the phone, often at a long distance, between parties who do not see each other, but who are satisfied of each other's identity, by taking proper precautions. The great transportation systems of the country find it safe to use the telephone in controlling the movements of trains on which depend the safety of thousands of lives and millions of property daily. Great armies on whose movements depend the destiny of nations and the lives of thousands of men are risked, every day, on the use of the telephone. Over the phone doctors give prescriptions on which the lives of patients depend, and lawyers give advice on which rest the disposal of transfer of property. Yet we are asked to say that it is unsafe for this officer to notify this defendant to appear before a magistrate in a small action involving a few dollars, when it is found as a fact that this defendant was the proper party, that the officer was duly authorized, and that he fully read this summons to this defendant as required by the statute.

Why should the courts alone be deprived of the advantage of modern improvements, and retain every antiquated method as to service or as to pleadings, on the plea that it was "thus done under the Saxon heptarchy?" It is a great saving of useless expense and of time to use this method of summoning jurors and witnesses and parties over the phone, of which bank officials, business men, railroad officers, and everybody else avail themselves. Indeed there is less risk of imposition as to identity in the service of a summons or subpoena than in any of the other businesses of life, for the reason that the officer, being under a penalty for making an erroneous return, will take extra care in that regard. Besides the party who is served can rarely, if ever, have any motive to assume to be the defendant when he is not. Moreover, he waives any other service, as this defendant did, by remaining at the phone until the entire summons is read to him.

If an officer should read a summons to a man on the other side of a screen, or of a curtain, or in another room, and his identity is certain, as found in this case, and his hearing, it is not denied this surely would be sufficient. The invention of the phone has merely extended the range of the voice of the officer and of the hearing of the defendant.

The statute does not require that the officer should return that he "saw the defendant and read the summons to him." But it only requires "reading the same to defendant, and such reading shall be a legal and sufficient service." For the court to add the requirement that the officer "saw the defendant" is legislation by the court, and will make a very considerable addition of trouble and expense to the officers, which the legislature has not placed upon them.

Whether the officer sees, or does not see, the defendant, it is a defense that he was not an officer, or that there was a mistake of identity as to the defendant, or that the summons was not read to him. These defenses are in no wise affected by the circumstance that the summons was read over the phone, or at a distance, or to one in another room. The statute does not require the immediate presence of the defendant.

A captive with the Indians who received a letter told the chief its contents and from whom it came. The chieftain took the letter. He looked at it and saw nothing on it to that purport. He put it to his ears and heard nothing. He smelled of it and perceived nothing. He said that his captive was either a liar or a witch, and in either event he ought to be burned, and burned he was. The chief knew no other means of communication.

When the invention of the telescope vastly extended human vision, Galileo, gauging the starry depths, announced that the world revolved around the sun, and not the sun around the world. The ignorant priests condemned him to be burned, and he only escaped by taking it back.

The most ignorant man in North Carolina now knows that by the invention of the telephone the range of the human voice and of human hearing has been lengthened. When this summons was read to the defendant by the officer over the phone (all of which are found as facts), it was the officer's voice, and not a substitute—as in the case of a telegram or letter—which the defendant heard, and the officer truly reported, as is found, that he had "read" the summons to him. The statute requires nothing more, and there is no reason that it should. A few years ago it might have been asserted that thus reading a summons to a man 7 miles off was a physical impossibility, and therefore on its face untrue. But modern invention has made it an ordinary occurrence. A conversation over the phone is competent in evidence, why not the "reading" of a summons, when the identity of the party is found as a fact?

This system of serving summonses and subpoenas is a great saving of expense and of time. It has been much resorted to in the courts, and now to hold it illegal may jeopardize the validity of many legal proceedings which have been based upon such service. In a practical age there is no reason why the courts should not avail themselves of the same conveniences which business men, and indeed all others, customarily use and have found to be safe and reliable as well as convenient. No statute forbids it, and the courts in actual practice have recognized and used it.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

FARMERS' SECURITY BANK OF PARK RIVER, NORTH DAKOTA, Appt.,

v.

FLORENCE B. MARTIN et al., Respts.

(— N. D. —, 150 N. W. 572.)

Tax — insufficient description — validity.

1. This opinion decides two appeals. Plaintiff foreclosed two mortgages, exercising power of foreclosure under the mort-

Headnotes by Goss, J.

Note. — Right of mortgagor or owner of equity of redemption to contest validity of tax paid by mortgagee.

The few authorities on this question which research has disclosed appear generally to support the decision in FARMERS' SECUR. BANK v. MARTIN.

In Southard v. Dorrington, 10 Neb. 119, 4 N. W. 935, the mortgagee in a foreclosure action sought to have added to the amount of the mortgage debt the sum paid by him to redeem the property from a sale for delinquent taxes. It was held that an answer was insufficient that the taxes claimed by the plaintiff to have been paid were wholly void; that the land was not assessed as required by law; that the assessor did not take the oath required by law, and in fact took no oath at all; that the apparent levy was illegal; that no tax list and duplicate were made as required by law, and no warrant was issued to the treasurer of the county to collect any taxes upon the land as required by law; also, that the lots in question were assessed in bulk with certain other lots in which the defendant had gages because of failure of the mortgagors to pay the real estate taxes prior to delinquency, after which time plaintiff paid them, and immediately foreclosed because of such defaults. Defendants contend that because of defective descriptions of the land in the assessment roll, the taxes are invalid and insufficient as a basis for any foreclosure proceedings. Held, that the tax description would be void in an action wherein the tax could be assailed.

Mortgage — payment of illegal tax — effect.

2. A mortgagee is authorized to act on the assumption that the tax is valid, where no actual notice is had that the assessment was defective; and, the land being subject to taxation, the payment made by the mortgagee discharged the land from liability for taxation for that year, while otherwise it would have been subject to reassessment and retaxation; that the mortgagee had the right to pay taxes to preserve his security; that in an action to foreclose a mortgage because of nonpayment of such taxes by the mortgagors, equity will not allow the mortgagors, to whose benefit the payment made by the mortgagee inured, to assert the invalidity of the taxes so paid in good faith to protect its security.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Walsh County dismissing an action brought to foreclose certain mortgages because of nonpayment of taxes on the mortgaged property. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. Smith Petersen, for appellant: Plaintiff had the right to pay the delinno interest. The reasons for the decision sufficiently appear in the quotation from this case in FARMERS' SECUR. BANK v. MARTIN.

And in Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 Pac. 254, a mortgagee on foreclosure was allowed the amount of an assessment paid by him on the property, although it was contended that the assessment was illegal because not made to the owner of the land. The assessment was paid at the request of the mortgagor, and the case was decided under a statute providing that where the holder of a special lien is compelled to satisfy a prior lien for his own protection, he may enforce payment of the amount so paid by him as a part of the claim for which his own lien exists. But the decision, as indicated by the quotation in FARMERS' SECUR. BANK v. MARTIN, supports the conclusion reached in that case.

Where the mortgaged property was assessed with other property belonging to the mortgagor, and the mortgagee paid the entire amount of the tax, it not appearing what part of the tax was due on that part of the property subject to the mortgage, quent taxes and declare the whole debt secured by the mortgage immediately due.

The defendants were bound to know when the taxes became due and delinquent, and the plaintiff therefore was not required to notify the defendants that the taxes were due, or that it intended to pay them, before it made the payment.

Ellwood v. Wolcott, 32 Kan. 526, 4 Pac. 1056; Washburn v. Williams, 10 Colo. App. 153, 50 Pac. 223; Hoodless v. Reid, 112 Ill. 105, 1 N. E. 119; Fowler v. Woodward, 26 Minn. 347, 4 N. W. 231.

The option to declare the whole debt due having once been exercised, the default becomes fixed and established, and it cannot be cured even by tender of payment after commencement of the foreclosure.

Defendants cannot make a collateral attack upon the validity of the taxes paid by the plaintiff, as a defense to the action.

the court, in holding, on writ of entry by the mortgagee, that the amount paid for taxes should be included in the conditional judgment, said: "It was the duty of the mortgagor, and those holding under him, to discharge all taxes thus assessed upon the demanded premises, while they withheld the possession from the mortgagee, and in case taxes were assessed in a manner which they deemed illegal, notice of this fact should have been given to the mortgagee, and in case payment was to be resisted he should be indemnified against loss, because it would be unreasonable to subject the mortgagee to the hazard of contesting the legality of a tax title by a suit at law, in which, if the final result should be in favor of the validity of that title, all his rights under his mortgage would be forever lost." relations between the parties were very similar to those between mortgagor and mortgagee.

So, in Bates v. People's Sav. & L. Asso. 42 Ohio St. 655, judgment was rendered in favor of a mortgagee on foreclosure for an amount paid by him for taxes and assessments appearing upon the tax duplicate of the county as having been duly assessed against the mortgaged property, it being held that evidence for the defendant was properly rejected tending to show that a portion of the taxes and assessments so paid were illegally assessed against the property. A statute provided that any person having a lien on real estate might pay the taxes thereon "in so far as the same are a lien upon such real estate," and that the amount so paid should operate as a lien on the property in preference to all other liens, and the money so paid might be recovered from the person liable for the tax. The court said that the record showed that the taxes and assessments appeared on the duplicate to have been regularly and legally assessed, and that the plaintiff had no knowledge or notice of any defect or illegality in the assessment; that "the statute only gives a lien holder the right to pay taxes and thus save his security in so far as the taxes are a lien upon the real estate. Hence, the question fairly arises, Was the plaintiff bound to inquire as to the legality of the taxes beyond the appearances of the duplicate, and as to defects of which he had no knowledge or notice? This question is not free from doubt. But, inasmuch as the owner of the real estate, under like circumstances, would be justified in paying the taxes, and might afterwards, under the statute, upon discovering an illegality in the assessment, recover them back from the county without being held to the consequences of having made voluntary payment, so we think the lienor should be justified in making the payment to protect his lien, although he has no right to recover them back from the county in case of a subsequent discovery of illegality in the assessment. In the latter case, the payment by the lienor should be considered as payment by the owner, and the right to recover back would attach to the owner. Such holding does not nullify the limitation in the statute upon the right of a lienor to save his security by a payment of taxes, but leaves the same with ample scope for operation. If the owner has no knowledge of illegality in the assessment, or if he has such knowledge and does not communicate it to his mortgagee, we think the statute should be so construed as to authorize the latter to protect his lien by making payment of the taxes appearing on the duplicate to have been regularly and legally assessed."

See also Windett v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 144 U. S. 581, 36 L. ed. 551, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 751, from which the court quotes in FARMERS' SECUR. BANK v. MARTIN. The alleged invalidity, however, was not in the tax itself, but in the tax deed, the ground on which it was contended the deed was invalid being lack of statutory notice to the tenants of the tax sale. The mortgagee, it was held, was entitled to the sums paid by him to extinguish the tax title. L.R.A.1916D.

And to a similar effect is American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 C. C. A. 275, 60 U. S. App. 693, 89 Fed. 610, petition for writ of certiorari denied in 172 U. S. 650, 43 L. ed. 1184, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 883, where it was contended that a mortgagee should not, in a foreclosure proceeding, be allowed the amount paid by it to redeem the mortgaged property from a sale upon an assessment for a paving tax, it being contended that the sale of the property for the assessment was not authorized by statute.

But that a mortgagee who purchases and receives a deed to the property on foreclosure of his mortgage, and thereafter pays illegal sewer and paving assessments, will not be allowed the amount so paid, in a foreclosure suit by a junior mortgagee, who was not a party to the foreclosure of the prior mortgage, see Atwater v. West, 28 N. J. Eq. 361.

And it has been held in a suit to foreclose a mortgage that a decree awarding the plaintiff a lien for special paving and curbing taxes on the property, which he had paid, is error where he fails to show that the taxes were legally levied, the burden being upon him to establish their validity before he is entitled to a lien on account of their payment. Hartsuff v. Hall, 58 Neb. 417, 78 N. W. 716.

In Leavitt v. Bell, 55 Neb. 57, 75 N. W. 524, the court said the amount of taxes paid by a mortgagee to protect his lien on the land, "so far as they were legal," should have been included in the amount due on the mortgage.

Goss, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This opinion covers two separate appeals, having the same record and involving the same issues. Complaints are in the usual form, seeking foreclosure of commission mortgages securing a portion of interest on ten-year loans, which interest matures in yearly instalments for ten years. Nine instalments were unmatured. One has been paid. Both commission mortgages are held by plaintiff. The instalment of interest due on each mortgage prior to April, 1911, had been paid, and no payment under either mortgage would fall due until the following fall of 1911. Both mortgages contain the following stipulation: "First: But if default be made in the payment of money or the interest, or any part thereof, or in payment of taxes on said real estate when due, then the mortgagee, its successors or assigns, may declare the whole principal sum due and payable, and this mortgage may be foreclosed at once. (2) And in case of the failure of the mortgagors to pay said taxes, then the mortgagee, its successors or assigns, may pay the same, and such sum paid shall become a part of this mortgage indebtedness and draw interest at the same rate."

The taxes falling due December 1, 1910, and delinquent March 1, 1911, on the two quarter sections covered by the two mortgages, had not been paid until the mortgages, without notice to defendants, paid them on April 19, 1911, amounting to $61.62, for which the usual county treasurer's tax receipt was delivered. These actions were begun less than a week afterwards by service of summons and complaint, basing the right of foreclosure upon the default of the mortgagors in failing to pay these taxes. Mortgagee elected to and did declare the full amount of both mortgages immediately due and payable. The brief of respondents contains but two contentions: First, that the taxes were void; and, second, "that the right to accelerate time of payment of an otherwise immatured obligation, and to proceed to an immediate foreclosure of the mortgage security, can only exist by virtue of some binding contractual stipulation to that effect," and hence acceleration cannot be founded on failure to pay void taxes, "under a stipulation that the mortgagors will L.R.A.1915D.

"pay taxes when due,"—in other words that mortgagors were not in default in failing to pay the void taxes, for nonpayment of which the default is claimed as the basis of the right to accelerate interest instalments not otherwise matured.

There is no conflict in the testimony. Defendant testifies that he knew his taxes were delinquent and unpaid, and, in response to inquiry as to why they were allowed to become delinquent, said: "I did not have the money the 1st of March, and I went to the bank to borrow the money to pay it, and the bank explained to me where I would be a little ahead on interest by letting it go until fall and paying the penalty on it, and I came to the conclusion it would be all right. It was not because I would not pay the taxes."

The bank referred to was not the plaintiff bank.

Assuming for the present that the taxes were valid, their payment on or before delinquency was stipulated for in the mortgage, and the right was there given the mortgagee, should the mortgagors default in their payment on or before delinquency, to declare "the whole principal sum due and payable," and to immediately foreclose. The mortgagee could also, at its election, pay said taxes and reimburse itself by using its mortgage to enforce collection of the taxes on the property by foreclosure at once or at its pleasure. Real estate taxes are due December 1, and delinquent March 1. Upon delinquency in 1911 (and prior to chapter 199, Sess. Laws 1909, becoming effective) a penalty of 3 per cent attached in addition to the tax unpaid on March 1st, and to that extent, with additional penalty accruing from time to time on and after March 1st, the mortgage security was gradually becoming impaired by nonpayment of taxes. Whether foreclosure could be instituted prior to March 1st need not be determined, but any time thereafter, in the absence of equitable reasons preventing it, defendants were in default under the terms of the mortgage, and because of which default the mortgage could be foreclosed under the power granted by the mortgage, and which power is valid and enforceable in equity. If has but recently been held (Doolittle v. Nurnberg, 27 N. D. 521, 147 N. W. 400) that it is not required that the mortgagee, before foreclosure and a declaration thereunder that the amount secured by the mortgage shall be immediately due and payable, shall give notice thereof to the mortgagor or allow him an opportunity to cure his defaults. Instead the mortgagee may declare the default without notice, the declaration by foreclosure notice being sufficient; and it follows that a court of equity in which such a foreclosure is asked, the mortgagee having complied with the law, cannot, on that ground alone, deem the exercise of a legal right, the declaration of default without notice, any defense in itself to the exercise of the right of foreclosure. Hence, if the tax be a valid one, without any consideration of the mortgagee's right to act upon an invalid tax as constituting a cloud on the title of his security, in the absence of some defense to this foreclosure cognizable in equity, the plaintiff had a right to declare the default and to foreclose.

The validity of this tax is squarely before the court, and it must be determined whether it is void because based upon an invalid assessment. The assessment for 1910 is identical as to each tract of land. The description is as follows, viz.:

Cleveland township, county of Walsh, North Dakota. Name of owner, Florence B. Martin; description N. W. 4, Sec. 1, Twp. 155, Rng. 57.

The trial court in its findings found: "That said printed description is insufficient to identify the northwest quarter of section 1, township 155, range 57, as the property described,"—relying upon Power v. Larabee, 2 N. D. 141, 49 N. W. 724, and Power v. Bowdle, 3 N. D. 120, 21 L.R.A. 328, 44 Am. St. Rep. 511, 54 N. W. 404, and the many decisions of this court upon descriptions in assessments and taxation matters. The time has come when the rule must be followed under present statutes and concerning recent assessments, or a different rule announced as to taxes and assessments of 1897 and subsequent years, including those in question. A brief résumé of the holdings of this court on descriptions by abbreviations is now in order. In the initial case (Power v. Larabee, supra,) the description was similar to the one before us, except that the figure intended to qualify the abbreviation for the quarter section was on the line instead of above it, and was with reference to assessments for 1886-1888. The assessment was held to be invalid as an indefinite description upon which no valid tax could be based. The attitude of the early court is clearly apparent from a casual examination of early tax cases, and that decision but reflected such attitude. A year later the court was further committed along the same line in Power v. Bowdle, 3 N. D. 107, 21 L.R.A. 328, 44 Am. St. Rep. 511, 54 N. W. 404. A glance at page 113 of the third volume of our State Official Reports shows the description there given to be identical with the one before us so far as the placing of the figure to the upper right of the abbreviation of the description is concerned. The same description is again held void five years later with reference to the 1887 assessments in Iowa & D. Land Co. v. Barnes County, 6 N. D. 601-603, 72 N. W. 1019, citing and following the two Power Cases. The holding is reaffirmed as to 1890 and 1894 assessments in Sheets v. Paine, 10 N. D. 103, 86 N. W. 118, and again in Lee v. Crawford, 10 N. D. 482, 88 N. W. 97, as to 1888 taxes; State Finance Co. v. Beck, 15 N. D. 374, 109 N. W. 357, as to assessment for 1891; State Finance Co. v. Mulberger, 16 N. D. 214, 125 Am. St. Rep. 650, 112 N. W. 986, for tax of 1895; State Finance Co. v. Bowdle, 16 N. D. 193, 112 N. W. 76, for taxes for 1892-1896; and State Finance Co. v. Trimble, 16 N. D. 199, 112 N. W. 984, for taxes of 1895 and 1896. To make the list of similar taxation cases complete we cite Beggs v. Paine, 15 N. D. 436, 109 N. W. 322; Hodgson v. State Finance Co. 19 N. D. 139, 122 N. W. 336; Grand Forks County v. Frederick, 16 N. D. 118, 125 Am. St. Rep. 621, 112 N. W. 839; and Wright v. Jones, 23 N. D. 191, 135 N. W. 1120.

Our conclusion filed before rehearing was had in this case was to the effect that chapter 126, Sess. Laws, 1897, § 1600, Rev. Codes 1905, and § 2215, Comp. Laws 1913, operated to relieve recent assessments from the rule of property announced in Power v. Bowdle and the earlier cases decided on assessments prior to those for 1897. This was upon the supposition that this portion of chapter 126 of the Sess. Laws 1897 was new legislation. Instead this statutory provision was earlier in force as § 94 of chapter 132, Sess. Laws 1890, and in force from March, 1890, until repealed by the taking effect, January 1, 1896, of Rev. Codes 1895, and during which period the rule of property had been reaffirmed as to 1890-94 assessments in Sheets v. Paine, 10 N. D. 103, 86 N. W. 117, and State Finance Co. v. Mulberger, 16 N. D. 214, 125 Am. St. Rep. 650, 112 N. W. 986, as to assessments of 1895. As this statute was in force during that period, these assessments cannot be distinguished and validated unless the rule of property in question be overruled. The assessment must be held to be one which, under direct attack by a party in a situation to assail it, would be held void.

But appellant urges that, plaintiff, as mortgagee of defendants, having paid what it supposed to be a valid tax under the belief that it was a lien or cloud upon the title of its security, and when such property was legally subject to taxation, and which tax thereon is not shown to be inequitable, and where plaintiff was authorized by its mortgage contract to pay taxes and declare default for the nonpayment of same, plaintiff was placed in a position where, after such payment and exercise of power of default under the mortgage, the mortgagors should not be heard to urge against the mortgagee the invalidity of the apparent tax thus paid. Search of the authorities lends support to such contention. A mortgagee authorized by the mortgage to pay taxes is not obliged to determine at his peril the validity of an apparent tax regularly appearing upon the proper tax records as a tax, lien, and cloud upon the title of the mortgage security, when such property was, at all times, legally subject to taxation, and where, had the proceedings been regular, the tax would have been unassailable. To hold otherwise would make every mortgagee hazard his money against the validity of the tax, while permitting the mortgagor to allow his supposed taxes to become delinquent, and thus indirectly shift upon the mortgagee the burden of suffering a lien or cloud to remain upon his mortgage security, or determine by suit at his own expense the validity of the tax any time the mortgagor thus sees fit to assert against him its invalidity. Had the mortgagee allowed this property to have gone to tax sale six months later and then obtained a certificate on sale of the property, it would have been protected even though, as here, the taxes had been, under direct attack, void, because defendants would not have been heard to question the tax without a tender of the amount equitably due. Noble v. McIntosh, 23 N. D. 59, 135 N. W. 663; Tee v. Noble, 23 N. D. 225, 135 N. W. 769. Merely because the mortgagee elected to pay the tax instead of allowing the penalties to increase should not place it in equity in a worse position than it would have been as a purchaser at a sale for said tax. More especially is this true as here it appears that neither the mortgagors nor the mortgagee knew of the irregularities or defect in the assessment. The mortgagors intended to pay this tax. They did not even notify the mortgagee of their reasons for defaulting in its payment. Had they done so and the mortgagee have consented thereto, a different situation would be presented. The same would hold true had the mortgagors promptly tendered the amount of the tax and penalties paid back to the mortgagee before exercise by it of its power of sale under said mortgage because of such default. It is true that the position of the plaintiff bank as to acceleration of unearned interest by means of this foreclosure seems to be harsh. But this is a case where equity must follow the law, and the basis for the law is in the contract, the mortgage. To hold otherwise would announce a rule of property that might play havoc with settled property rights.

Dorrington, 10 Neb. 119, 4 N. W. 935; American Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Mut. L. Ins. Co. 32 C. C. A. 275, 60 U. S. App. 693, 89 Fed. 610; Williams v. Hilton, 35 Me. 547, 58 Am. Dec. 729; Bates v. People's Sav. & L. Assn. 42 Ohio St. 673; Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 Pac. 254; Windett v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. 144 U. S. 581, 36 L. ed. 551, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571. Judge Maxwell in Southard v. Dorrington announces the rule, in a case exactly parallel in facts with this, to be: "When the payment of taxes assessed on real estate is necessary to protect the security, the mortgagee may pay the same and have the amount paid added to the mortgage debt as expenses necessarily incurred in protecting the security. . . . But the courts look with jealousy upon the demands of the mortgagee beyond the payment of his debt, as increasing the difficulties in the way of the right to redeem. But where the land is liable to taxation, and taxes, if legally assessed, would be a legal charge upon the same, and there are no special circumstances showing the tax to be unjust or inequitable, a court of equity will not declare such tax void because some of the formalities necessary to make a tax deed valid have not been complied with. A party relying upon a tax deed relies upon his title, and must stand or fall upon that; but if he seeks to enjoin the collection of taxes, he must offer to do equity by paying, or offering to pay, what in justice he should pay; nor in such case is the mortgagee required to permit the land to be sold, when such sale would impair his security for the debt." And, further: "In an action at law for the possession of the premises under a tax deed, the answer would be sufficient in all probability, but not in a proceeding in equity to have the taxes, which appear to have been lawful in themselves, declared null and void. In such case the party must state facts showing his right to equitable relief."

And foreclosure was awarded although the taxes would have been invalid considered as a foundation for a tax deed. From Windett v. Union Mut. L. Ins. Co. supra, is the following: "The defendant argued that the plaintiff could not be allowed for the taxes, because they had been extinguished by the tax sales and deeds, and could not recover on the tax titles, because they were void, and because equity would not enforce them. But the plaintiff did not set up the tax deeds as a ground of suit, but only as evidence of clouds upon his title, arising out of the mortgagor's own neglect to pay the taxes. It is at least doubtful, upon the evidence, whether Gage did not give notice to the tenants of the tax sales; and there is no evidence whatever of any invalidity in the taxes, the sales, or the deeds in any other respect. In this state of things the mortgagee was not bound to take the risk of contesting the tax titles, and the sums paid to extinguish those titles were reasonable expenses chargeable to the mortgagor by the terms of the mortgage."

The California supreme court in Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, at page 657, 54 Pac. 254, has this to say in a parallel case: "Whether the form of the assessment was such as would have defeated an action for its collection, or would have conferred no title upon the purchaser at a sale under a judgment for its foreclosure, is not the test of the plaintiff's right to recover the amount paid for its discharge. The assessment created at least an apparent cloud upon the title to the mortgaged premises, and to the extent of such cloud impaired the sufficiency of the security."

Foreclosure was allowed for assessments concededly void, where the mortgagee had paid the same in good faith and without actual notice of the invalidity. In the instant case, as is said in Bates v. People's Sav. & L. Asso. 42 Ohio St. 655, this property was taxable for the year in question whether legally taxed or not; and the payment by the mortgagee paid a tax, inasmuch as it relieved taxable property from a liability for a valid tax to which the property could and presumptively would have been subjected subsequently on the state discovering the invalidity of assessment for this particular year. In fact, then, this mortgagee has paid what the state must treat as its tax, and to that extent relieved the mortgagors from a tax burden. Had the mortgagors paid this void assessment, they would have discharged a tax liability against them. The act of the mortgagee by their authorization under the mortgage clause likewise inures to their benefit, and is to be treated as their own act in such respect. They should not be heard to deny the legality of such payment any more than as though they themselves had paid the purported tax and later in other proceedings should attempt to collaterally repudiate both their act and the tax.

We have examined all the cases cited to the contrary, and some distinction on facts is found in all of them not present in this case. For instance, in Scott v. Society of Russian Israelites, 59 Neb. 571, 81 N. W. 624, it appears that the property upon which the mortgagee paid taxes was not subject to general taxation, it being held for religious and charitable use. Leavitt v. Bell, 55 Neb. 57, 75 N. W. 524, and Wells County v. McHenry, 7 N. D. 246, 74 N. W. 241, were direct attacks upon the tax itself, the former in an action to foreclose a tax lien, L.R.A.1915D.

the latter in proceedings to obtain a tax judgment against the land under the 1897 Woods law. The same is true of Morrill v. Lovett, 95 Me. 165, 56 L.R.A. 634, 49 Atl. 666, cited by respondents, where bill in equity was brought to remove a cloud upon real estate erroneously assessed as owned by a dead person, and where the law under which the assessment was made created a personal liability secured by lien on the specific real estate. Clark v. Coolidge, 8 Kan. 189, was on a special assessment. While somewhat parallel the facts are considerably different, and the reasoning is unsatisfactory. That decision seemed to have turned upon estoppel arising from the conduct of the parties. Likewise, Vermont Loan & T. Co. v. Tetzlaff, 6 Idaho, 105, 53 Pac. 104, involving right of foreclosure of usurious mortgage, is not authority; nor is Herriott v. Potter, 115 Iowa, 648, 89 N. W. 91, involving an inheritance tax.

Our conclusion is that the mortgagee had the right to pay this tax as a tax after its delinquency and without actual notice of its invalidity, though the assessment was fatally defective; that in so doing it discharged the land from a taxation liability, and to that extent relieved and preserved the security therefrom; that though the assessment might be held void for indefiniteness of description of property in an action wherein the validity of the tax could be raised, it would be inequitable to permit the mortgagors here to assert that the tax is invalid in this action; that defendants were in default under the terms of the mortgages, and plaintiff mortgagee is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure accordingly.

VERMONT SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF VERMONT

v.
BERT BIGELOW.

(— Vt. —, 92 Atl. 978.)

Adultery — intercourse between unmarried man and married woman.

A statute providing for the punishment of adultery without defining the offense ap-

Note. — Effect of fact that but one of the parties is married upon the offense of "adultery" within the penal statutes.

This note supplements the note to Bashford v. Wells, 18 L.R.A.(N.S.) 580, on the same subject. A reference to the earlier note will show that there is a division of opinion among the courts as to the effect of one of the parties being unmarried at the time the offense was committed. The plies to an unmarried man having illicit intercourse with a married woman, although another statute expressly provides punishment of an unmarried woman having illicit intercourse with a married man.

EXCEPTIONS by respondent to rulings of the Caledonia County Court made during the trial of an information charging respondent with adultery, which resulted in his conviction. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joseph Fairbanks, for respondent:

Under § 5881 of the Public Statutes, an unmarried man who has illicit intercourse with a married woman does not commit adultery.

court in STATE v. BIGELOW explained this lack of harmony by the statement that "In the jurisdictions holding that a single man is not guilty of adultery for sexual intercourse with a married woman, there is either, as was held in Respublica v. Roberts, 1 Yeates, 6, a compelling uniform practice, or some peculiar language of the statute, or, what is more often the case, they adopt the ecclesiastical, and not the common-law, definition of adultery. In those jurisdictions which adhere to the common-law definition, it is held that a single man is guilty of adultery, even in the absence of any express declaration in the statute."

Accepting the court's statement as the true explanation of the diversity of opinion, the question arises: Was it necessary for the courts to choose between the common-law and the ecclesiastical-law theories? The court in STATE v. BIGELOW did not consider itself obliged to do so, for the reason that "the amendment recognized the true theory, and extended our statute so as to include what would be adultery by ecclesiastical law, but in no way restricted the common-law definition of the term." This, of course, adopts the common-law definition, and adds the substance of the ecclesiastical-law definition because of the peculiar wording of the statute. This basis of the holding of necessity makes it one for limited application. But a theory has been advanced, based upon broader grounds, which leads to the same conclusion as was reached by the court in STATE v. BIGELOW. Thus, in State v. Holland, 162 Mo. App. 678, 145 S. W. 522, it was held that "it is true that the common law of England was adopted by our statute, and by that law a married woman was necessary to the crime of adultery. But the canon law changed this by substituting a more unrestricted definition, and as thus changed it was brought to this country by the colonists. 'Adultery, according to the definition thus established, is sexual connection between a man and a woman, one of whom is lawfully married to a third person; and the offense is the same whether the married person in the adulterous connection is a man or a

Mr. N. A. Norton for the State.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an information for adultery. The respondent pleaded guilty, and thereupon moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that no offense is charged in the information. The motion was overruled, to woman. The Roman law being in this respect superseded, this definition was accepted by every Christian state at the time of the colonization of America, and is, no doubt, part of the common law brought with them by the colonists of all Christian nationalities. That it corresponds with a sound judicial philosophy is illustrated by the fact that it is incorporated in the codes of the principal continental European states.' 2 Whart. Crim. Law, 10th ed. § 1719. By the common law of England adultery was not punishable as a crime. It has been made punishable in most of the American states, not as a common-law offense, for, as just said, it was not an offense under that law, but in response to the moral sense, which finds expression in the canon law. It is in that sense that it is made punishable by our statute, and in that sense ought the word to be defined and interpreted. An examination of the cases in this state leaves the question somewhat embarrassed. Thus, in slander it has been ruled that an unmarried woman cannot commit adultery. Adams v. Hannon, 3 Mo. 222; Christal v. Craig, 80 Mo. 367. But in criminal actions under this statute, it has not been deemed essential to a successful prosecution that the woman should have been married. In State v. Crouner, 56 Mo. 147, the information was against both the man and woman, and did not charge the woman to be married, nor did the proof show it. The contrary is to be inferred. In State v. Chandler, 132 Mo. 156, 53 Am. St. Rep. 483, 33 S. W. 797, the offense is defined at pages 160, 161 of the report, without including a necessity that the female must be a married woman. And so it was in State v. Bess, 20 Mo. 419, where the prosecution was against both parties. In State v. Coffee, 75 Mo. App. 88, a conviction of both parties was sustained by the St. Louis court of appeals, though the woman was unmarried. It is thus seen that, under the rulings on this statute, an unmarried woman may be guilty of adultery if her illicit intercourse is with a married man. The statute means that if either party to the intercourse be married, which the respondent excepted. There was judgment and sentence, the execution of which was stayed, and the cause passed to this court.

The information charges, with proper allegations of time and place, that the respondent, a single man, carnally knew one —, a married woman, then and there having a lawful husband living, naming him, and not then and there being the wife of the respondent, and that he did then and there commit the crime of adultery with the said —. The contention of the respondent is that a single man who has illicit sexual intercourse with a married woman is not guilty of adultery, in the absence of a statute to that effect.

both are guilty of adultery. No one would deny that proof by a complaining wife in an action for divorce, that her husband had had carnal connection with an unmarried woman, would sustain her charge of adultery. There is no reason to suppose that the legislature meant to make any different definition of the act in a criminal prosecution. Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. 509, 32 Am. Dec. 284. One is a public scandal and the other private; but each, in result, tending to the disorder and demoralization of society."

So, it may be said that some courts have adopted the common-law definition, others the ecclesiastical-law definition, and still others have combined the two definitions, which in effect makes both parties guilty if either or both were married to a third person at the time the offense was committed.

In Rich v. State, 1 Ala. App. 243, 55 So. 1022, it was held that "the term 'adultery' as used in our statutes means illicit intercourse between two persons of different sexes, one of whom is married to another person." But see statement by the court in Buchanan v. State, 55 Ala. 154, as cited in the earlier note, which statement would qualify the above definition, or rather limit its application to the married person, the unmarried one being guilty of fornication.

In Zackery v. State, 6 Ga. App. 104, 64 S. E. 281, it was held that "to constitute the crime of adultery in this state, both parties to the criminal act must be married persons at the time of its commission." This holding is broader than was necessary to dispose of the case, for apparently the man was the defendant, and it seems to have been his marriage that was in question. See Kendrick v. State, 100 Ga. 360, 28 S. E. 120, as cited in the earlier note, for wording of the statute and a holding such as would have sufficed to dispose of the case in Zackery v. State.

In People v. Martin, 180 Ill. App. 578, it was held that "adultery is sexual intercourse of a married person with a person other than the offender's husband or wife," and that a married man commits the crime by having intercourse with an unmarried

This claim finds support among some text writers and in the decisions of a few states cited in respondent's brief. See Bishop, Stat. Crimes, §§ 655-657; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 48; Respublica v. Roberts, 1 Yeates, 6; Com. v. Lafferty, 6 Gratt. 672; Hunter v. United States, 1 Pinney (Wis.) 91, 39 Am. Dec. 277. While reference to the question has been made in our decisions, it appears never before to have been squarely raised in this state. The question turns upon the definition of the term "adultery," as used in Pub. State. § 5881, upon which this prosecution is based. This statute does not define the offense, but punishes what was known as adultery under the common law, referring to it by name; so we must look to that source for its definition. State woman. This is in harmony with the holding in Lyman v. People, 198 Ill. 544, 64 N. E. 974, as cited in the earlier note.

An unmarried woman cannot commit the crime of adultery within the meaning of a criminal statute that does not define the term. Re Cooper, 162 Cal. 81, 121 Pac. 318 (another statute defined the term for divorce purposes, but apparently this conclusion would have been reached independently of the statutory definition).

In State v. Chafin, 80 Kan. 653, 103 Pac. 143, it is held that adultery cannot be committed by an unmarried person. An unmarried man was charged with the crime of adultery with a married woman. The court refers to its holding in Bashford v. Wells, and the note thereto in 18 L.R.A. (N. S.) 580; and in State v. Ling, 91 Kan. 647, 138 Pac. 582, the holdings in both former cases were approved and made the basis of a holding that an indictment for adultery may be brought against one person without joining the other party as a defendant.

In California the Code defines adultery as "the voluntary sexual intercourse of a married person with a person other than the offender's husband or wife." Under this section an unmarried person cannot commit the crime of adultery. Ex parte Sullivan, 17 Cal. App. 278, 119 Pac. 526. This is the same statute to which the court referred in Ex parte Cooper, supra, and the court here regarded it as defining the crime for the purposes of the criminal statute.

In Oregon the statute defines the crime in such language that a married man may be convicted of adultery with an unmarried woman. State v. Case, 61 Or. 265, 122 Pac. 304. Likewise, an unmarried man with a married woman. State v. Ayles, — Or., 145 Pac. 19. And Utah also has a similar statute, i. e., one that makes both parties liable to be convicted if either is married to a third person. State v. Greene, 38 Utah, 389, 115 Pac. 181.

As to construction and effect of statute requiring prosecution to be upon complaint of husband or wife, see note to State v. Wesil, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 786. J. W. M.

v. Clark, 83 Vt. 305, 308, 75 Atl. 534, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 261.

Adultery was a private wrong at the common law as it existed at the time of its adoption by our legislature, but was an offense against the ecclesiastical law. As known to the common law, as distinguished from ecclesiastical law, adultery consisted of sexual intercourse by a man, married or single, with a married woman, not his wife. The circumstance on which adultery depended at common law was the possibility of introducing spurious issue; in other words, its tendency to adulterate the issue of an innocent husband and turn the inheritance away from his own blood to that of a stranger. 1 R. C. L. 633, and cases cited. At the same time the ecclesiastical law dealt with unlawful sexual commerce as a breach of the marriage vow, and punished only the married party for adultery, while as to the unmarried person the offense was fornication. Bashford v. Wells, 78 Kan. 295, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 580, 96 Pac. 663, 16 Ann. Cas. 310 and note. The latter view of adultery is embodied in Pub. Stat. § 5882, which declares that a married man and an unmarried woman, who commit an act which would be adultery if such woman were married, shall each be guilty of adultery. State v. Clark, supra. The adoption in 1818 of what is now Pub. Stat. § 5882 as an amendment of the statute of 1797, which made adultery an indictable offense, clearly indicates that the common-law, and not the ecclesiastical, meaning of the term, was employed in the original statute, for otherwise the amendment would have been unnecessary.

Consideration of the opposing theories of adultery at common law and in the ecclesiastical courts makes it apparent that in the former there was no reason for distinguishing between a married and a single man, the particeps being a married woman; while in the latter the guilt inhered in the breach of the marriage vow, and so the offense could not be committed by an unmarried person, man or woman. Respondent's counsel argues that the amendment of 1818 shows that, but for the statute (now Pub. Stat. § 5882), an unmarried particeps would not be guilty of adultery in this state. The argument loses sight of the common-law theory of adultery. The amendment recognizes the true theory, and extended our statute so as to include what would be adultery by ecclesiastical law, but in no way restricted the common-law definition of the term.

It remains to consider whether, under the common-law definition of adultery, our statute makes both parties to the act guilty of the offense, or whether the fact of marriage on the part of the man is material. On this question the common law furnishes no direct authority; for, as we have seen, adultery was not an indictable offense at common law. That the wrong involved the man as well as the unfaithful wife is perfectly apparent. If we recur to the source from which the common-law idea of adultery sprung, we shall see that it regarded the man and woman alike. It found its root in the Mosaic law which provided: "If a man be found lying with a woman married to an husband, then they shall both of them die, both the man that lay with the woman and the woman." Deut. xxii. 22; Lev. xx. 10.

The common-law idea of adultery prevailed in the Mosaic law, for by the latter the man was condemned, not because he had violated his matrimonial vow, but "because he hath humbled his neighbor's wife." Deut. xxii. 24.

Turning to the decisions of our sister states that have made adultery an indictable offense without defining the term, we discover a well-defined line of cleavage between them. In the jurisdictions holding that a single man is not guilty of adultery for sexual intercourse with a married woman, there is either, as was held in Respublica v. Roberts, supra, a compelling uniform practice, or some peculiar language of the statute, or, what is more often the case, they adopt the ecclesiastical, and not the common-law, definition of adultery. In those jurisdictions which adhere to the common-law definition, it is held that a single man is guilty of adultery, even in the absence of any express declaration in the statute. State v. Wallace, 9 N. H. 515; Smitherman v. State, 27 Ala. 23; State v. Pearce, 2 Blackf. 318; State v. Connaway, Tappan, 58; note in 16 Ann. Cas. 314. See Hood v. State, 56 Ind. 263, 26 Am. Rep. 21; 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 165; State v. Weatherby, 43 Me. 258, 69 Am. Dec. 59; Com. v. Call, 21 Pick. 509, 32 Am. Dec. 284; State v. Lash, 16 N. J. L. 380, 32 Am. Dec. 397; 1 R. C. L. 631.

Having adopted the common-law definition of adultery, we regard it as the settled law of this state that any man, married or single, having voluntary sexual intercourse with a married woman, not his wife, is guilty of adultery under Pub. Stat. § 5881. State v. Searle, 56 Vt. 516; State v. Bisbee, 75 Vt. 293, 54 Atl. 1081, 15 Am. Crim. Rep. 460. The fact that the question has never before reached this court is a strong indication that the profession has not seriously doubted the view we now adopt. A uniform practice of more than a century, while it does not make the law, as said in Respublica v. Roberts, is strong evidence of what the law is. In the statute as amended in 1818 reference is made to the parties in a way to indicate an intention to punish the male particeps equally with the woman; besides, although ever since 1797 a single man has been deemed guilty under the so-called "blanket act," and since 1818 a single woman having sexual intercourse with a married man has been deemed guilty of adultery, a single man having sexual intercourse with a married woman has been outside the pale of the law, unless the legislature intended that both parties to the act should be equally guilty of adultery. Taken together, these facts make it doubly certain that under the statute in question marriage on the part of the man is wholly immaterial. Our conclusion is that the county court did not err in overruling the respondent's motion in arrest of judgment.

Judgment that there is no error in the proceedings, and that the respondent take nothing by his exception. Let execution be done.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Duval County to review a judgment in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Whitfield, J.:

The declaration herein is as follows:

Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic ocean near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant, and while within the waters of the Atlantic ocean in which the defendant invited patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died leaving neither husband nor minor child or children, nor any person or persons dependent upon her, the said Mary E. Proctor, for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on, to wit, the 17th day of July, 1912, duly appointed as administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Proctor.

Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic ocean adjacent to said bath house and bathing pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limit of the waters of said Atlantic ocean which constituted defendant's facilities for bathing as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide a proper person or persons, and to have such person or persons present on behalf of said defendant to search for and recover any of the patrons of said bath house, when such patrons were bathing in the waters customarily used by said patrons, and which constituted the facilities for bathing offered said patrons by the defendant, in which waters deceased was bathing, when such persons were or might have been in danger of drowning; that by reason thereof, and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic ocean near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant, and while within the waters of the Atlantic ocean in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died leaving neither husband nor minor child or children, nor any person or persons dependent upon her, the said Mary E. Proctor, for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on, to wit, the 17th day of July, 1912, duly appointed as administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Proctor.

"Wherefore the plaintiff brings this her suit and claims $50,000 damages."

To this declaration the following demurrer was filed:

"(1) The allegations of the second amended declaration show that the administratrix, as such, has no right of action in this cause.

"(2) The second amended declaration does not state any facts or circumstances or conditions that authorize an administratrix to maintain the action.

"(3) Each count of the second amended declaration shows and sets forth that the deceased intended to bathe and was attempting to bathe in the Atlantic ocean, and the Atlantic ocean is in no sense a bathing place or resort operated or controlled by defendant.

"(4) The facts stated in the second amended declaration show and establish that the defendant could not and would not invite the deceased to bathe in any bathing resort controlled by defendant, and defendant is in no wise responsible for any alleged lack of facilities for bathing in the Atlantic ocean, as mentioned in the second amended declaration.

"(5) The defendant, a private individual renting bathing suits, is not required to provide protection or safeguards for bathers in the Atlantic ocean, as described in the second amended declaration.

"(6) The mere renting of a bathing suit to deceased, as mentioned in said amended declaration, is not sufficient to create any obligation or duty on the part of the defendant to provide the alleged lines, persons, appliances, rafts, or other safeguards, as alleged in the second amended declaration.

"(7) The duty, if any, to provide such safeguards or persons to guard or rescue bathers in the Atlantic ocean is a public duty, if any such duty exists, incumbent upon the state or municipality, but not upon private individuals.

"(8) The deceased, attempting to bathe in the Atlantic ocean, took the risk of any damages in so doing, and there is no obligation or duty upon any person or public authority to provide safeguards for such bathers in such ocean.

"(9) That the second amended declaration, and each count thereof, fails entirely to show or set forth that the deceased or the public were invited by the defendant to bathe in the Atlantic ocean, or that the defendant had any such proprietorship over the Atlantic ocean as that he could or did invite bathers to bathe therein as to become responsible for any danger to such bathers from bathing in said ocean.

"(10) That persons bathing in the Atlantic ocean are not the guests of the defendant, or under any protection of the defendant, or licensees of the defendant, but voluntarily bathe in the said ocean and take all risks therefrom.

"(11) That neither of the said counts allege or set forth any facts, by reason of which the plaintiff, as an administratrix, has any interest in or right of action on account of the said alleged death of the said Mary E. Proctor.

"(12) That the said counts and each of them fail to allege or state any facts showing that any estate of Mary E. Proctor would be added to or increased by reasons of the said alleged facts set forth in said counts of said second amended declaration.

"(13) That the waters of the Atlantic ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant, and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

"(14) That each count of said second amended declaration fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house were in the Atlantic ocean, or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic ocean, but allege that same extended up and down the beach, and not in the waters of the ocean.

"As to first count:

"In addition to the foregoing above-mentioned grounds as to each of the counts of the second amended declaration, defendant states the following as to the first count:

"(1) Said count does not allege or set forth that at the time of the alleged renting of said bathing suit by the said Mary E. Proctor the defendant owned or operated any private bathing place where the deceased, Mary E. Proctor, at that time, intended to bathe, or did bathe.

"(2) Said count does not allege or set forth that the deceased paid a consideration for any right to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic ocean at said resort, but only alleges that she hired from defendant a certain bathing suit.

"(3) That there is no valid and constitutional statute of the state of Florida that required defendant to maintain life lines or life rafts for the protection of bathers or of deceased attempting to bathe in the Atlantic ocean.

"(4) That the said statute referred to in said first count is in violation of the Constitution of the state of Florida and of the Constitution of the United States, in attempting to interfere with and restrict legitimate business, and deprives the person engaged in the business of renting suits of his property without due process of law, and is a taking of such property without due compensation.

"(5) The said statute is unconstitutional in that it undertakes to put a burden or tax upon said business therein mentioned not authorized by the Constitution of Florida.

"(6) That said statute of Florida referred to in said count does not provide or give private individuals any right of action, or provide any penalty to be paid to private individuals for failure to comply therewith.

"(7) That said statute referred to is in violation of the Constitution of the state of Florida, in that it undertakes to compel persons renting bathing suits to perform certain public duties, to wit, to provide safeguards to bathers.

"(8) That the said statute has no application to, and does not relate to, persons who themselves and of their own accord undertake to bathe in public waters, to wit, in the Atlantic ocean.

"(9) That the waters of the Atlantic ocean were in no sense the premises or property of the defendant, and were not under his control, and were not, as matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

"(10) That the said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house was in the Atlantic ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach, and not in the waters of the ocean.

"As to second count:

"(1) As to the second count defendant repeats each of the grounds hereinabove mentioned, and in addition the following:

"That there is no duty or obligation, statutory or otherwise, upon the defendant to provide a suitable person or persons to superintend bathing in the waters of the Atlantic ocean.

"(2) The said count does not show or set forth that the waters where deceased was bathing were the property of or controlled by or in the possession of the defendant.

"(3) That said counts show no duty or obligation of the defendant to the deceased at the time of said alleged drowning of deceased.

"(4) That the waters of the Atlantic ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant, and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

"(5) That said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion or bath house was in the Atlantic ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach, and not in the waters of the ocean.

"As to third count:

"As to the third count defendant repeats each of the grounds hereinbefore mentioned, and in addition the following:

"(1) That there was no legal duty upon the defendant to provide persons or appliances to rescue persons bathing in the said waters of the Atlantic ocean, as alleged in said count.

"(2) That said count states a conclusion in said allegation, to wit, that the defendant did not provide persons or appliances to rescue persons bathing in the waters customarily used by patrons of said bathing house.

"(3) That the said count does not show or set forth that the waters in which deceased was bathing were owned, possessed, or controlled by the defendant, but does show that they were public waters of the Atlantic ocean, not under the control of the defendant.

"(4) That said count shows no duty or obligation of the defendant to the deceased at the time of such alleged drowning of deceased.

"(5) That the waters of the Atlantic ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant, and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

"(6) That said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house was in the Atlantic ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach, and not in the waters of the ocean.

"As to fourth count:

"As to the fourth count defendant repeats each of the grounds hereinbefore mentioned, and in addition the following:

"(1) That there was no legal duty or obligation on the defendant to provide a person or persons, and to have such person or persons present on behalf of the defendant, to search for and recover patrons of said bath house in said waters mentioned in said count.

"(2) That the waters of the Atlantic ocean were in no sense the premises of or property of the defendant, and were not under his control, and were not, as a matter of law, facilities which the defendant did or could provide to the deceased for bathing purposes.

"(3) That said count fails to allege or show that the house of the defendant described as a pavilion and bath house was in the Atlantic ocean or immediately next to the waters of the Atlantic ocean, but alleges that same extended up and down the beach, and not in the waters of the ocean."

The demurrer was sustained; and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, final judgment on the demurrer was rendered for the defendant, and the plaintiff took writ of error.

Messrs. Bryan & Carson and J. M. Carson for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. John C. Cooper & Son, for defendant in error:

To uphold the declaration there must be some allegation of ownership or control of the premises alleged to be offered to the public as bathing facilities.

Whitfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought under §§ 3145 and 3146 of the General Statutes of 1906, to recover "such damages as the party . . . entitled to sue may have sustained by reason of the death of the party killed." When the decedent could have recovered for her injury if her "death had not ensued," then her administrator has a right of action under the statute, the decedent leaving no husband or minor child, nor any person dependent on her for a support. The question here is the right to recover, not the amount of the "damages . . . sustained by reason of the death." Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 45 So. 755.

When this alleged cause of action accrued the following statute had been enacted:

"Chapter 6189—(No. 70).

"An Act to Require Persons, Firms and Corporations Maintaining and Operating Public Bath Houses, Bathing Pavilions, and Other Similar Places at Seaside Resorts, to Maintain Life Lines and Life Rafts for Protection of Bathers and Providing a Penalty for Failure to Do So.

"Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Florida:

"Section 1. Any person, persons, firm or corporation operating or maintaining public bath houses, bathing pavilions, or other similar places, where bathing suits are furnished for hire or rent, at the seaside resorts in the state of Florida, are hereby required to maintain at all times proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of the bathers at such seaside resorts.

"Section 2. Any person or persons, and the officers of any corporation violating the provisions of § 1 of this act shall be subject to a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment in the county jail of not more than six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the court.

"Approved May 23, 1911."

The effectiveness of this statute as defining a crime and prescribing a penalty for the offense cannot be considered here, but the policy of the statute has its influence upon the general principles of law applicable to the duties and correlative liabilities of persons engaged in business, as is alleged in this case, even though the particular things required to be done may not have been required at common law. The statute recognizes the use of the public waters of the state, "by persons, firms, and corporations who are" "operating or maintaining public bath houses, bathing pavilions, or other similar places, where bathing suits are furnished for hire or rent, at the seaside resorts in the state of Florida," and defines specific duties required of those who so use the public waters of the state, which specific duties are designed to protect the patrons of the particular business, and are not inconsistent with duties that may be imposed by implication of law upon those engaged in such business.

Where one assumes to offer the use of public waters for purposes of profit by establishing bath houses or dressing rooms on the shore and furnishing bathing suits for hire to persons who are expressly or impliedly invited to use the bathing suits by bathing or swimming in the public waters, and a patron uses the waters in the usual and ordinary way consistent with the express or implied invitation, and without his fault is injured because of the unsafe condition of the premises on which patrons are invited to bathe or swim, or because of the negligence of the proprietor in performing his duties to patrons, the one so offering the use of the waters for profit may be liable in damages for such injury.

The liability proceeds from the duty imposed by law upon one who thus assumes to offer the use of public waters for profit, to exercise due care to prevent injury to patrons who without fault use the waters in the customary way. One will not be permitted to establish for profit a business of furnishing facilities and inviting persons to use public waters for bathing or swimming, and to escape liability for injuries caused by the unsafe condition of the premises so used, of which unsafe condition the patron may not know or have due appreciation, but of which the proprietor of the business should know. The patron has a right to rely upon the due performance of the implied legal duty of the one furnishing the facilities and extending the implied invitation to use the premises, to keep the same in a reasonably safe condition or to give due warning as to and protection against dangers. Though the waters are public, and no governmental authority be expressly given to so offer them for use, one who assumes to so offer the use of the waters also assumes the legal duties and liabilities that are commensurate with such offer of the use. The nature of the use fixes the duties and correlative liabilities. An invitation may be implied from a continued and general custom in using the premises by the patrons of the business. The nature of the use and the extent of the premises covered by an implied invitation to use may be determined by the continued and general custom of the patrons of the place.

It may not be presumed from an injury that the keeper of the place failed to do his legal duty and consequently was negligent; but negligence of the keeper that proximately caused the injury must be duly alleged and proven, and any applicable contributory negligence on the part of the person injured will bar a recovery for a merely negligent injury. In determining whether the injured person is guilty of contributory negligence, the practical capabilities of such person for self-protection under the particular circumstances should be considered, together with facts, if any, that should charge the keeper of the place or his employees with notice or knowledge of the same, when the injured person was invited to use the premises.

If a negligent failure to perform a statutory or a common-law duty with reference to the safe condition of the premises customarily used by the patrons of a particular business enterprise is a proximate cause of an injury to a patron who is not guilty of contributory negligence, the proprietor of the business may be liable in damages for such negligent injury.

It is alleged that the defendant "was operating and maintaining a certain public bath house and bathing pavilion where bathing suits were furnished for hire or rent at Pablo Beach, a seaside resort in the state of Florida; . . . that the defendant had exclusive control and management of said bath house and bathing pavilion; that said bath house and bathing pavilion was situated at or near the waters of the Atlantic ocean at said Pablo Beach; that said defendant extended an invitation to the public to rent from him bathing suits, and to avail themselves of the dressing room and kindred facilities of the defendant at said pavilion; that the waters of the Atlantic ocean situated directly in front of said pavilion and bath house, and extending up and down the beach for a space of a few hundred feet on either side of said point directly in front of said bath house and pavilion, were the facilities for bathing which the defendant offered to the patrons of his bath house and bathing pavilion; that said defendant, by renting said bathing suits, invited such members of the pub-lie as rented bathing suits from him to avail themselves of the facilities aforementioned for bathing, and to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic ocean in front of and adjacent to the said pavilion as aforesaid; that said waters aforesaid were the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bathhouse, which the defendant well knew; that on, to wit, July 7, A. D. 1912, one Mary E. Proctor did rent from the said defendant a bathing suit for a valuable consideration in that behalf; that it was the intention of the said Mary E. Proctor, which the defendant then and there well knew, then and there to bathe in the waters of the Atlantic ocean adjacent to which the defendant's said bath house and bathing pavilion was located, and which waters constituted the facilities for bathing offered to defendant's patrons as aforesaid; that thereupon the said Mary E. Proctor did bathe in said Atlantic ocean adjacent to said bath house and bathing pavilion; that while so bathing the said Mary E. Proctor remained within the limit of the waters of said Atlantic ocean which constituted defendant's facilities for bathing as aforesaid; that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide and maintain proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of its patrons, bathers at the said seaside resort, contrary to the statutes of the state of Florida in such cases made and provided;" and also (2) that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide suitable and proper persons to superintend and watch over bathing in the waters customarily used by the patrons of said bath house, and in which waters deceased was bathing, and to watch over and superintend its (defendant's) patrons who were bathing in such waters; and also (3) "that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide proper persons or appliances to rescue his patrons in the said waters customarily used by his said patrons, which constituted the facilities for bathing offered to such patrons by the defendant, and in which waters deceased was bathing, when such patrons were or might have been in danger of drowning;" and also (4) "that the defendant negligently and carelessly failed to provide a proper person or persons, and to have such person or persons present on behalf of said defendant to search for and recover any of the patrons of said bath house, when such patrons were bathing in the waters customarily used by said patrons, and which constituted the facilities for bathing offered said patrons by the defendant, in which waters deceased was bathing, when such persons were or might have been in danger of drowning; that by reason thereof, and by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, the said Mary E. Proctor was then and there drowned in the waters of the Atlantic ocean near the bath house and bathing pavilion of the defendant, and while within the waters of the Atlantic ocean in which the defendant invited its patrons to bathe; that the said Mary E. Proctor died leaving neither husband nor minor child or children, nor any person or persons dependent upon her, the said Mary E. Proctor, for support; that the said Louise McKinney, plaintiff, was heretofore, on, to wit, the 17th day of July, 1912, duly appointed as administratrix of the estate of Mary E. Proctor."

The facts alleged as to the relation of patron and operator of a public bath house and bathing pavilion at a seaside resort, where bathing suits are furnished for hire, make it under the quoted statute a breach of duty for the defendant operator of a public bathing place to "negligently and carelessly fail to provide and maintain proper and safe life lines and life rafts for the protection of" his patrons. For this alleged breach of duty the defendant may be liable in damages, even if he is not liable for negligently and carelessly failing to provide proper supervision and proper persons and appliances to rescue his patrons in said waters customarily used by patrons, when such patrons are without their fault in danger of drowning. All of these precautions may be duties of the operator of the place who offers its use to the public, if the circumstances make such precautions reasonably necessary or expedient for the safety to those who use the waters in the customary way. See Larkin v. Saltair Beach Co. 30 Utah, 86, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 992, 116 Am. St. Rep. 818, 83 Pac. 686, 8 Ann. Cas. 977; Boyce v. Union P. R. Co. 8 Utah, 353, 18 L.R.A. 509, 31 Pac. 450; *Bass v. W. 479; Dinnihan v. Lake Ontario Beach Improv. Co. 8 App. Div. 500, 40 N. Y. Supp. 764.

The defense of contributory negligence should be shown by the defendant.

Ownership of premises is not essential to liability for injuries proximately caused by the dangerous condition of premises the use of which is expressly or impliedly offered to others. Liability may be imposed upon those who offer the use of premises under such circumstances as raise a legal duty to those who accept the offer, and are injured because of the dangerous condition of the premises, where the negligence of the injured party does not contribute to the injury.

If at any time peculiar conditions at the usual place for bathing and swimming make the customary use patently or obviously dangerous, it may be contributory negligence to encounter the dangers. When the negligence of a plaintiff or those whom he represents contributes appreciably in producing the injury complained of, the law affords no right of recovery in the absence of a statute covering the case. If a patron who is injured is not free from fault both of omission and commission while using the bathing facilities, there can be no recovery of damages from the party who provides the facilities for hire and invites or offers the use of the waters, even though such party is negligent in performing his duty to the patron.

The declaration in this case is sufficient as a lawful basis for proofs consistent with the allegation of negligence in the performance of legal duties due to a patron from one who furnishes facilities and offers the use of public waters for bathing purposes. If negligence within the scope of the allegations is shown to have proximately caused the death of the plaintiff's decedent, and such decedent was free from fault, there may be a recovery of damages in a proper amount as contemplated by the statute. See Florida East Coast R. Co. v. Hayes, 67 Fla. 101, L.R.A. —, 64 So. 504.

I dissent from the opinion in this case because I do not think the administratrix has shown any right to sue, and for a thorough discussion of my views, see dissenting opinion in the case of Jacksonville Electric Co. v. Bowden, 54 Fla. 461, text, 477, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 46 So. 755.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS
v.

UNION TRUST COMPANY, Admr., etc., of James C. King, Deceased, et al.

(255 Ill. 168, 99 N. E. 377.)

Tax — succession — in state of situs and domicil.

1. The imposition of a succession tax by L.R.A.1915D.

a state in which personal property is found will not prevent the imposition of another by the state in which the testator was domiciled.

Statute — adoption — construction.

2. The adoption of a statute from another state is presumed to carry the construction which has been given it by the courts of the state of origin.

Judgment — full faith and credit — closing estate — claims in other state.

3. A decree in one state distributing the estate of the decedent who died domiciled in another state, and discharging the administrator after finding that all claims which had been presented against the estate had been paid, is not conclusive that all existing claims were presented so that, under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, claims for inheritance taxes upon the estate so distributed cannot be allowed against the executor by the courts of testator's domicile, where, under the law of the former state, inheritance taxes are not expenses of administration or charges upon the general estate, although the administrator is permitted to retain sufficient funds to pay the local inheritance tax.

Tax — inheritance — legacies distributed in foreign state.

4. An executor or trustee may be required to pay the inheritance tax only on the funds sent to him by the courts of a sister state for distribution, and not upon those distributed by the local administrator by direction of such courts, where the statute of testator's domicile, where such executor or trustee resides, provides that he shall deduct the tax from legacies or property in his hands for distribution, which is construed to apply only to the beneficial interests of legatees.

Same — amount — compromise.

5. The inheritance tax against a widow who is entitled to a certain sum under an antenuptial agreement and an additional sum under the will will be assessed against the aggregate to which she is so entitled if the contract and will are not set aside, although, because of her contest, a compromise is effected by which she receives a much larger share of the estate.

Note. — Physical presence or absence of personal property or evidence thereof, as affecting liability to the payment of a succession tax, is treated at length in the note to Re Helena, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1167. That note covers both the liability to pay a succession tax at the decedent's domicile in respect of personal property in another state, and the liability to pay such a tax in respect of personal property found in the state belonging to the estate of a nonresident. See also later cases, State ex rel. Smith v. Probate Ct. 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 262; Security Trust Co. v. Com. 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 232; and Re Adams, L.R.A.1915C, 95.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Cook County Court approving the report of the appraisers in a proceeding for the collection of inheritance taxes on the estate of James C. King, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles R. Holden, William S. Miller, and A. B. Melville, with Messrs. Kraus, Alschuler, & Holden, for appellants:

Neither the administrator c. t. c. nor the residuary estate in Illinois is chargeable with inheritance taxes assessed with respect to California assets, finally administered upon and distributed in California.

The state of Illinois has no power to tax the transmission of personal property of a decedent, when such property is located in California, and there administered upon and distributed under a final order of a court of that state, even though the decedent was a resident of Illinois.

The question whether exacting a succession tax in two or more states amounts to double taxation in the constitutional sense is discussed in the note to Mann v. Carter, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 150. A similar question with respect to property taxation is discussed in the note to Judy v. Beckwith, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 142. It is to be noted however, that the injustice of double taxation resulting from the imposition of taxes on the same property for the same period in two or more states has been in a considerable degree mitigated by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky, 199 U. S. 194, 50 L. ed. 150, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 36, 4 Ann. Cas. 493, and other cases cited in note to Com. v. West India Oil Ref. Co. 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 295.

It is possible that the courts and legislatures may eventually adopt and act upon the view that the circumstances that will justify the exaction in one state of a succession tax in respect of personal property will negative the right to exact such a tax in another state in respect of the same property and succession. The United States L.R.A.1915D.

Supreme Court has practically adopted that view as regards property taxation, at least so far as concerns tangible chattels. As suggested at page 1169 of the note in 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1167, the New York legislature by the 1911 amendments to the inheritance tax law has gone far toward the accomplishment of such a result, by abandoning the plan of laying the tax according to inconsistent and mutually antagonistic principles, and adopting in its place the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam as the exclusive criterion of liability in respect of intangible personality, and actual situs as the criterion in respect of tangible personality. It is obvious, however, that the adoption of a uniform and consistent criterion by one or more states will not avoid the evil of double taxation; hence, the importance, if possible, of the adoption by the courts as a constitutional principle, of a single, exclusive criterion, binding in all the states, for the determination of the personal property in respect of which the tax is payable, so far as that question depends upon the domicile of the decedent, or the location of the property.

Maud A. Robinson, widow, succeeded to the legal title of one half of decedent's estate, less the debts, as of the date of said decedent's death. The source of her title is fixed by her renunciation of the will and the cancelation of the antenuptial agreement. Her succession to one half of decedent's property is taxable as of decedent's death.

The renunciation of the widow was not "withdrawn" in law. The state of Illinois was a stranger to the administration proceedings, and its right to a tax as of the date of decedent's death was not affected by the so-called "withdrawal of renunciation."

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

November 1, 1905, James C. King died testate, domiciled at Chicago, Illinois, leaving him surviving a widow, Maud A. Robinson King, but no child, children, or descendants thereof. On July 10, 1901, an antenuptial agreement was executed between said James C. King and Maud A. Robinson, then a spinster, by which she agreed to receive from his estate $100,000 in lieu of all her future rights under the law as his wife or widow. By his will, executed on July 6, 1901, after giving a number of legacies to nephews, nieces, and other persons, and a legacy of $10,000 to Maud A. Robinson, whom he afterwards married, he left the remainder of his estate to a trustee to organize and maintain a charitable institution to be called "The James C. King Home for Old Men." He executed a codicil to his will July 13, 1901, in which he referred to the antenuptial agreement, and republished and confirmed the will with all of its terms, conditions, and legacies, and stated that the antenuptial agreement was in lieu of a settlement for all of his wife's interest in his estate. The will and codicil were admitted to probate December 19, 1905, in the probate court of Cook county. December 23d of that year the widow executed an instrument repudiating the antenuptial agreement and renouncing the will. In February, 1906, the widow and the residuary legatee, the James C. King Home for Old Men, through its trustee, the Northern Trust Company, entered into an agreement whereby the widow was to retain as her share of the estate $600,000 in money and securities and an income for her life from a fund of $400,000. A bill was filed in the circuit court of Cook county with the necessary parties, and a decree entered confirming this compromise settlement. March 25, 1907, L.R.A.1915D.

James C. King died seised of certain property consisting of stocks and bonds of non-Illinois corporations, which were at that time lying in a safety deposit box in Los Angeles, California, amounting in value to something over $600,000. He also had a bank deposit of $16,140 in Los Angeles. His entire estate, real and personal, including the personal property in California, amounted approximately to $4,100,000. In February, 1906, an administrator with the will annexed was appointed by the superior court of Los Angeles county, California, who took possession of the personal property in that state left by the decedent. He published a notice to creditors and filed an inventory. No claims were presented against the estate under that administration. The California administrator, after paying the expenses of the administration, including inheritance taxes, paid out approximately $114,000 to the various legatees under the will, said legatees being the nephews, nieces, grandnephews, and grandnieces, and a brother and sister of said testator, and including a $10,000 legacy to a Pasadena hospital association. After the payment of these legacies and the costs and inheritance taxes under the California laws, the administrator there had on hand for distribution $439,727.17. The superior court of Los Angeles county, after approving the payment of the costs, expenses, and inheritance tax, ordered and decreed that the remainder of the property, consisting of said $439,727.17 in cash, be turned over, under the provisions of the will, to the Northern Trust Company of Chicago as trustee of said decedent, said sum to be set apart as provided by the will, as follows: Forty thousand dollars for each of the testator's nephews and nieces, the net income of said sum to be paid to them semi-annually for fifteen years after the testator's death, and at the end of said period the principal of said sums to be transferred, conveyed, and assigned to said nephews and nieces absolutely. If at any time during the continuance of said trust any of said nephews or nieces should die leaving lawful issue surviving, said lawful issue to take per stirpes the share in the income and principal which their parent or parents would have taken if living, and at the same time said parents would have taken the same if living. In the event of the death of any such nephews or nieces without lawful issue, then the funds set apart for such deceased nephew or niece to be by said trustee at once transferred to and become a part of the residuary estate, upon a trust, also, that there be paid out of the income of the balance of said trust estate, if any, to the brother and sister of said testator, in equal semiannual instalments, $2,500 per annum during the life of the said brother and sister, and upon the further trust that the balance of said trust estate, if any, should be used for the creation, erection, maintenance, and endowment of an old men's home in or near Chicago. Then follows in the decree a detailed statement as to the management and care of said old men's home from said funds in accordance with the provisions of the will.

November 2, 1908, the county court of Cook county appointed an appraiser to recommend the amount of inheritance tax in said estate. In March, 1907, the probate court of Cook county approved the final report of the Union Trust Company, administrator with the will annexed of said estate in Cook county, including the compromise settlement with the widow. In August, 1909, the appraiser reported to the county judge of Cook county his appraisal, and the report was approved by said county judge. From the order approving the report all parties appealed to the county court of Cook county. That court thereafter entered an order fixing an inheritance tax on all rights to succeed to the property of said testator, including the legacies that had been paid by the California administrator, less the exemptions allowed by the law of this state. The tax assessed by the order of the county court against the legacies paid in full, and the present value of those to be paid hereafter by the Northern Trust Company, was $6,567.10. There were also future interests included in said fund paid the trust company by the California administrator which might hereafter be required to pay an inheritance tax in this state. The order of the county court also appraised the property received by Maud A. Robinson King, the widow, at $2,044,685.82, and fixed the tax, after allowing the exemptions, at $20,246.85. The county court held as a proposition of law that the Union Trust Company of Chicago, both as administrator with the will annexed and in its corporate capacity, was liable for the inheritance tax of said widow, with interest until paid, and was also liable for all inheritance taxes, with interest, due and owing in said estate, and that said Union Trust Company, as administrator with the will annexed and individually, and the Northern Trust Company, as trustee and individually, were jointly and severally liable for all inheritance taxes, and interest, on all legacies and successions payable out of the funds limited to said Northern Trust Company.

county court was without authority, under the law, to include the personal property situated in California in fixing the inheritance tax. They argue that the power to tax is limited to property over which the sovereign power of the state extends, and that the personal property of a resident decedent located outside of Illinois is not within the dominion of the state. The ancient maxim of the law was that the personal property followed the person. The great increase in that class of property has necessitated certain limitations of the maxim, especially in matters of taxation. "It is still the law that personal property is sold, transmitted, bequeathed by will, and is descendible by inheritance according to the law of the domicile and not by that of its situs." Eidman v. Martinez, 184 U. S. 578, 46 L. ed. 697, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 515. The general rule in this country is that the succession to movable property is governed by the law of the owner's domicile at the time of his death. Frothingham v. Shaw, 175 Mass. 59, 78 Am. St. Rep. 475, 55 N. E. 623. When, however, we apply the laws of another jurisdiction, we do so because the principles of comity recognize that those laws are applicable to a particular case. The succession determined by the law of domicile is generally recognized in other jurisdictions. This recognition, however, is limited by the policy of the local law, especially in matters of taxation and the subjecting of the personal property of nonresidents to the claims of local creditors. The law in California is that the distribution of the decedent's personal estate will be governed by the law of his actual domicile at the time of his death, subject to certain limitations not here involved. Apple's Estate, 66 Cal. 432, 6 Pac. 7; Murphy v. Crouse, 135 Cal. 14, 87 Am. St. Rep. 90, 66 Pac. 971. "No one doubts that succession to a tangible chattel may be taxed wherever the property is found, and none the less that the law of the situs accepts its rules of succession from the law of the domicile, or that by the law of the domicile the chattel is part of a universitas and is taken into account again in the succession tax there." Blackstone v. Miller, 188 U. S. 189, 47 L. ed. 439, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 277. There is no constitutional objection to a law which lays an inheritance or succession tax according both to the principle of the domicile and to the principle of the situs, although this may result in double taxation. 1 Whart. Conf. L. 3d ed. § 80f. It may be inexpedient or inconsistent that one state should tax according to the situs and the other at the same time according to the fiction that succession after death is governed by the domicil of the decedent, but these inconsistencies infringe no rule of constitutional law. Blackstone v. Miller, supra.

Counsel have cited many authorities with reference to the power of a state as to general taxes. Laws imposing general taxes upon real and personal property are not controlling and usually give little assistance in considering the legality of inheritance taxes. People v. Griffith, 245 Ill. 532, 92 N. E. 313. We therefore deem it unnecessary to discuss or distinguish those authorities. Connell v. Crosby, 210 Ill. 380, 71 N. E. 350, cited and relied on, is not in point here, because the question there was whether an inheritance tax could be collected in this state on real estate in another state, and this court held that lands in a sister state pass, not under the laws of this state, but under those of the state where the land is situated. That, however, is not the law with reference to personal property in another state.

Counsel also rely on Keeney v. New York, 222 U. S. 525, 56 L. ed. 299, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1139, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 105. In that case Susan A. Keeney, a resident of New York, executed in that state a deed whereby she conveyed a cattle ranch in Texas and certain stocks and bonds to the Fidelity Trust Company of Newark, New Jersey, to hold in trust during her lifetime, and, after her death, to be paid to her children or their issue. The court, in discussing the question as to whether certain stocks and bonds in New Jersey were chargeable with a transfer tax in New York, after the death of Susan A. Keeney, said (222 U. S. 537, 56 L. ed. 306, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1150, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 108) that "the real estate and tangible property in Texas were not within the taxing jurisdiction of the state of New York, and there was no effort to tax the transfer of that property." Counsel argue from this statement that the court intended to include in the term "tangible property in Texas" personal property in that state, and to hold personal property not situated in New York could not be compelled to pay a transfer or inheritance tax. That certainly was not the holding, for the opinion continues: "It is urged that on the same principle the stocks and bonds could not be taxed because they were in New Jersey in the hands of a trustee holding title and possession by virtue of a deed made three years before the grantor died," and the property in New Jersey was held subject to the New York transfer tax.

We believe the authorities are a unit in holding that personal property within the jurisdiction of a foreign state may be made subject to a succession or inheritance tax L.R.A.1915D.

in the place of the decedent's or testator's domicil. See, in addition to the authorities already cited, McCurdy v. McCurdy, 197 Mass. 248, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 329, 83 N. E. 881, 14 Ann. Cas. 859; Re Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 18 L.R.A. 709, 32 N. E. 1096; Re Hull, 111 App. Div. 322, 97 N. Y. Supp. 701; Re Miller, 182 Pa. 157, 37 Atl. 1000; Hopkin's Appeal, 77 Conn. 644, 60 Atl. 657; Re Howard, 80 Vt. 489, 68 Atl. 513; Dos Passos, Inheritance Tax Law, 2d ed. § 46; Dicey, Conf. L. 2d ed. 664; McElroy, Transfer Tax Law, 120, 37 Cyc. 1654, and cases cited. The constitutional right of a state to impose such a tax at the domicil of the decedent cannot be questioned. The discussion in many of the decisions relied on by appellants turns on the meaning of the statute, and whether the legislature intended to levy such a tax.

The inheritance tax law of New York contemplated that such a tax should be imposed. Re Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 18 L.R.A. 709, 32 N. E. 1096. That act, after that decision, so far as it affects this question, was substantially adopted in this state. It must be presumed, therefore, that our legislature intended it to receive the construction given it by the courts of New York. People v. Griffith, supra. The personal property of the testator in California at the time of his death was subject to the payment of inheritance taxes in Illinois.

The further contention is made that the trial court in entering the order fixing the inheritance taxes on the personal property found in California failed to give due faith and credit to the decree of the superior court of Los Angeles county distributing the estate and discharging the administrator. That decree found that all claims presented against said estate had been paid, including taxes and inheritance taxes, and ordered that the administrator and his sureties be relieved of any obligations thereafter incurring. Was this finding conclusive, under the statutes and practice of the courts of California, as to all claims against the estate, the executor, legatees, or distributees?

In Tilt v. Kelsey, 207 U. S. 43, 52 L. ed. 95, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, the New York court attempted to assess an inheritance tax against the property and the executor when the estate had already been administered upon and distributed in New Jersey; the New Jersey court holding that the testator was a resident of that state. The New York court held that the testator was a resident of New York. The United States Supreme Court in that case held that the New York courts were not precluded by the New Jersey courts from investigating whether or not the testator was a resident of New Jersey or of New York. It further held that under the law and usage in the courts of New Jersey, as presented in that record, the New Jersey court had jurisdiction to probate the will and administer the estate and direct the final distribution, which should be final so far as concerned any person who had a demand against the estate; that, in ascertaining what faith and credit must be given to the judicial proceedings in New Jersey to carry into effect the constitutional provision as to full faith and credit being given to the judgment of any court in the United States, it must be ascertained what credit is given to such judicial proceedings by the laws of New Jersey; that the full faith and credit to be given to the judgments of any court under the Constitution of the United States mean such faith and credit as are given in the state where rendered; that "they can have no greater or less or other effect in other courts than in those of their own state." The court held that on the record there presented the decree of the New Jersey court was a final bar to all claims as against the estate and against the executors and distributees of the property.

In the last case cited the United States Supreme Court did not refer to the case of Borer v. Chapman, 119 U. S. 587, 30 L. ed. 532, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342. In the Borer Case a citizen in New Jersey recovered judgment in a civil action on a contract against a citizen of Minnesota whose property was situated principally in California, and who died testate, leaving real estate and personal property to various persons in Minnesota. His will was admitted to probate in Minnesota and letters testamentary issued thereon. Ancillary proof was then made in California and letters issued on the certified copy of the will, and the estate was administered in California in accordance with the laws of that state and distributed according to the will. The final account was rendered to the probate court in California and the executor discharged by that court. A creditor in Minnesota did not present his claim for payment in California. This creditor brought suit in Minnesota against one of the Minnesota executors. The United States Supreme Court held that the creditor was not barred by the proceedings and decree in California from the prosecution of the suit; that he had a right to follow into the hands of the holders in Minnesota, whether a legatee or executor, the assets of the deceased which had been distributed by the order of the probate court in California; and that the Minnesota court, in so doing, was not contravening that provision of the Constitution respecting the faith to be given to the judgments and public acts in every other state. The question in the Borer suit, so far as we can see, differed from Tilt v. Kelsey only in that in the latter case all of the property was finally distributed in New Jersey, while in the Borer Case only a part of the funds was distributed in California. Under the holding in the Borer Case the contentions of appellants on this point are without force.

Without attempting here to decide whether these two cases are in conflict or can be distinguished, we will consider whether, under the rules of law laid down in Tilt v. Kelsey, supra, on the facts in this record, the county court of Cook county, in entering this judgment as to the inheritance tax, contravened constitutional provisions. The New York courts, after a somewhat elaborate discussion of a similar question, held that such a decree of a California court was binding only "on heirs, legatees, or devisees," and did not preclude collecting claims for inheritance taxes in another state. Re Cummings, 142 App. Div. 377, 127 N. Y. Supp. 109. While we might not agree with all the reasoning in that case, we think the conclusion was correct. If it be conceded, as contended by appellants, that under the statutes of California, as construed by her courts, ordinary claims of creditors against an estate should be presented to the probate court, and that its determination as to such claims, whether the creditor appears and presents his claim or fails to appear, will be conclusive, "subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal" (William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 Pac. 323; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 Pac. 38; Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 148, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100, 61 Pac. 914; Childs v. De Laveaga, 150 Cal. 281, 89 Pac. 82; St. Mary's Hospital v. Perry, 152 Cal. 338, 92 Pac. 864), does it follow that the claim for the Illinois inheritance tax must be so presented in order not to be barred?

An inheritance tax has been held by the courts of California not to be one of the expenses of administration, or a charge upon the general estate of the decedent, but in the nature of an impost tax or tax upon the right of succession, to be imposed upon the several amounts of the decedent's estate to which the successors thereto are, respectively, entitled. It is a charge against each share or interest according to its value, and against the person entitled thereto. Re Chesney, 1 Cal. App. 31, 81 Pac. 679; Re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 49 Pac. 181. It is also the law in this state. People ex rel. George v. Nelms, 241 Ill. 571, 89 N. E. 683. It was the intention of the legislature in this state that a person should be taxed only on the beneficial interest which he receives. It is not a tax on the estate, but on the right to receive a portion of the estate. Such is the law generally. Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 44 L. ed. 969, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 747; Re Westurn, 152 N. Y. 93, 46 N. E. 315. The California courts have held that under its probate act the probate court can do no more than pay the claims against an estate and distribute the remainder to the heirs and devisees, or direct the administrator to do so; that it has no power to appropriate the share of an heir or devisee to the payment of his debts. Re Nerac, 35 Cal. 392, 95 Am. Dec. 111; Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt, 88 Cal. 522, 12 L.R.A. 508, 22 Am. St. Rep. 331, 26 Pac. 518; 3 Kerr's Cyclopedic Codes of California Civil Proc. ¶ 1666, p. 2145. True, the California statute provides that the administrator or executor may retain out of the funds in his hands sufficient to pay the inheritance tax imposed by the California statute, but that provision has no reference to an inheritance tax imposed by a foreign jurisdiction against a portion of the estate or against the person entitled thereto. Under the statute and practice of California courts, the Illinois inheritance tax must be held to be a claim or debt against the distributee or a portion of the estate, and not against the estate itself. The conclusion necessarily follows that the judgment of the county court did not deny to the California court proceedings in question the full faith and credit to which they were entitled by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

The order of the county court did not attempt to impose a liability upon the California administrator or his bondsmen, or create a lien on any property in that state. Section 5 of the inheritance tax act provides that executors, administrators, and trustees shall be personally liable for the payment of taxes and interest. This provision of the statute applies only to property within this state at the date of the testator's death, or to property that thereafter comes into the possession of the executor, administrator, or trustee. The administrator here received none of the California personal property or its proceeds. A part of it was paid out in costs of administration in that state and to the legatees and the balance turned over to the trustee under the will, the Northern Trust Company. Under our law the administrator or executor or trustee cannot retain out of the property that comes into his hands as a gross amount the entire sum of the inheritance taxes imposed. That law intended that a person should be taxed only on the beneficial interest that he received (People ex rel. George v. Nelms, supra), and the administrator or executor can only retain from any legacy the inheritance tax due on that legacy.

Section 4 of the inheritance tax law of this state provides that any trustee "having any charge or trust in legacies or property for distribution, subject to the said tax, shall deduct the tax therefrom." The Northern Trust Company, as trustee, is charged with the responsibility of paying out of the respective amounts of the California personal property that came to its possession for the various beneficiaries, the Illinois inheritance tax on such legacies before paying the legacies, but neither the administrator nor said trustee should be charged with the inheritance taxes on those legacies which did not come to their hands, but were paid out directly by the California administrator. While such payment directly by said California administrator did not make the legacies so paid free from the Illinois inheritance tax, yet the collection of that tax, if possible to be made at all, would be from the individual beneficiaries. There seems to be no dispute that the correct amount of inheritance taxes was imposed in the county court as to trust funds paid over to the Northern Trust Company by the California administrator, if that court had the right to impose any tax as to the California assets. As we understand this record, some of these taxes are due now, and some may fall due hereafter.

Counsel for appellants further insist that the court erred in basing the inheritance tax against Maud Robinson King, the widow, on a supposed succession by her to one half of the entire estate. If the antenuptial agreement was valid and binding upon the widow, she would only be entitled to receive the $100,000 under said contract and an additional $10,000 as a legacy under the will, and the inheritance tax on her right to succeed would be fixed on such amounts. People v. Field, 248 Ill. 147, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 230, 93 N. E. 721. If said antenuptial agreement was void, then, under the statute, she could renounce her rights under the will and elect to take, in lieu of dower and other rights, one half of the real and personal estate after the payment of just debts and claims. In the latter event the amount of the inheritance tax would be fixed by the amount that she was entitled to receive under the statute. Billings v. People, 189 Ill. 472, 59 L.R.A. 807, 59 N. E. 798.

It is contended by counsel for the people that the renunciation under the will filed in the probate court of Cook county, taken in connection with the compromise, canceled and rendered null and void the antenuptial contract, while counsel for the appellants insist that the settlement did not render the contract void, but was simply a compromise to adjust the differences between the contending interests. The estate, under the statute of descent or by the statute of wills, vests in the party entitled to receive it upon the death of the decedent. The inheritance tax accrues at the time the estate vests. If, in order to avoid litigation, the legatees, contestants, and others in interest under a will compromise their claims, the concessions made, while binding upon the parties, take effect under the agreement, and are not a modification of the will or the rights under it, or under the intestate laws of the state. Re Graves, 242 Ill. 212, 89 N. E. 978; Baxter v. The Treasurer, 209 Mass. 459, 95 N. E. 854. To permit the heirs, legatees, and parties interested in an estate to change, by agreement among themselves after the death of the testator or decedent, the proportionate amounts of the property on which the respective beneficiaries should pay an inheritance tax, might in some instances practically deprive the state of all power of collecting any inheritance tax. Without setting out at length the details of the decree of the circuit court confirming the compromise agreement, we deem it sufficient to say that we do not think the decree or the agreement annulled and set aside the antenuptial contract. They constituted an adjustment and compromise of the dispute as to the validity of the antenuptial contract, whereby the widow received much less than she would have received under the statute if she had renounced the will and the antenuptial contract was held void, but much more than she would have received under the antenuptial contract and the will. The widow received from the estate of the testator, as her beneficial interest under the will and the intestate laws of this state, $110,000, and this is the amount upon which she should pay an inheritance tax, less the exemption to which she, as widow, is entitled. The county court should have so held.

The judgment of the county court will be reversed and the cause remanded to that court for further proceedings in harmony with the views herein expressed.

Interstate commerce — form of cars — power of state.

1. A state may, without interfering with the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, prescribe the length of and form of running gear upon caboose cars used in the state; at least in the absence of any legislation by Congress or attempted regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the subject.

Evidence — to prove unconstitutionality of statute — admissibility.

2. Evidence is not admissible to show that a statute requiring caboose cars to be of a certain length and to be mounted on certain running gear is unreasonable because cars corresponding to those specified are not required for safety, and therefore that the statute which places additional expense on railroad companies is void as taking property without due process of law.

Same — judicial notice — constitutionality of statute.

3. The court does not judicially know that a caboose car 24 feet long with adjustable and oscillating four-wheeled trucks is not more safe than one 18 feet long with two-wheeled rigid ones, so as to declare a statute requiring a change from the one to the other unconstitutional as taking property without due process of law.

Statute — separable sections — right to question constitutionality.

4. A railroad company prosecuted for violating the provisions of a statute requiring it to remodel caboose cars which go into the shop for repairs cannot question the validity of sections of the statute attempting to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission, the provisions of which are not necessary to the determination of the cause, and are separable from the sections under which the prosecution is conducted.

Note. — Consideration of extrinsic evidence to show unconstitutionality of statute.

This note is supplemental to the note to Stevenson v. Colgan, 14 L.R.A. 459.

Cases as to evidence of passage of acts are excluded. On that question, see note to Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. State, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1.

This note includes only the comparatively few cases where the subject is discussed. It will be seen that in most of the cases cited infra, the court declined to take evidence. On the other hand in the rare cases it is a matter of course to admit without discussion

APPREAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Marion County convicting it of violating the act regulating the size and construction of caboose cars. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Samuel O. Pickens and Owen Pickens, for appellant:

The act of March 1, 1911, is a regulation of interstate commerce, and therefore void, in that it is repugnant to § 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States made thereunder and in pursuance thereof.

evidence of facts bearing upon the question whether the rate is or is not reasonable.

Whatever the practical result in a particular case, it must be admitted in theory (1) that a constitutional right is entitled to protection; (2) that the courts will protect it against the assault of the legislature, and (3) that if necessary they will take extrinsic evidence for that purpose (as, for example, in the rate cases). There is therefore no general principle of law that the courts, in considering the validity of a statute, are limited to facts of which they may take judicial notice.

"If . . . a statute purporting to have been enacted to protect the public health, the public morals, or the public safety has no real or substantial relation to those objects, or is a palpable invasion of rights secured by the fundamental law, it is the duty of the courts to so adjudge." Harlan, J., obiter, in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273.

In Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Tompkins, 176 U. S. 167, 44 L. ed. 417, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 336, Brewer, J., said: "Courts may not inquire whether any given act is wise or unwise, and only when such act trespasses upon vested rights may the courts intervene. A single illustration will make this clear: It is within the competency of the legislature to determine when and what property shall be taken for public uses. That question is one of policy over which the courts have no supervision; but if, after determining that certain property shall be taken for public uses, the legislature proceeds further, and declares that only a certain price shall be paid for it, then the owner may challenge the validity of that part of the act, may contend that his property is taken without due compensation; and the legislative determination of value does not preclude an investigation in the proper judicial tribunals. The same principle applies when vested rights of property are disturbed by a legislative enactment in respect to rates."

Having thus reached the principle that the courts, if necessary, can and will take evidence to protect a constitutional right L.R.A.1915D.

against a legislative assault, it does not seem possible at present to go further and point out any general rule declaring in what cases they will take evidence, and in what cases they will limit their inquiry to facts of which they may take judicial notice. In general, the courts will not take evidence, for example, to overthrow health statutes, and if the health cases seem to be governed by a general rule that the courts will not interfere with the decision of the legislature upon a question where there is a controversy as to the facts, how are we to distinguish the rate cases except by the assumption that the salient fact is capable of exact ascertainment in the rate cases, and not in the health cases, that the one is matter of fact and the other matter of opinion, which is hardly satisfactory. That there is no rule of law on the subject is indicated by the remarkable statement in Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States, 216 U. S. 177, 54 L. ed. 435, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 356, where the court, in refusing to review the decision of the Secretary of War under the Federal statute of 1899, that a certain bridge was an unreasonable obstruction to free navigation, said: "Learned counsel for the defendant suggests some extreme cases showing how reckless and arbitrary might be the action of executive officers proceeding under an act of Congress, the enforcement of which affects the enjoyment or value of private property. It will be time enough to deal with such cases as and when they arise. Suffice it to say that the courts have rarely, if ever, felt themselves so restrained by technical rules that they could not find some remedy consistent with the law, for acts, whether done by government or by individual persons, that violated natural justice, or were hostile to the fundamental principles devised for the protection of the essential rights of property."

Health laws, etc.

It has been held that in matters of the public health the court would not admit the testimony of experts in order to review the action of the legislature. Com. v. Pear,

Where there is a doubt whether a substance denounced by a statute as injurious to food is or is not so injurious the court will not investigate the facts for the purpose of determining whether the declaration of the legislature was warranted by the facts. People v. Price, 257 Ill. 537, 101 N. E. 196, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1154.

In State v. Schlenker, 112 Iowa, 642, 51 L.R.A. 347, 84 Am. St. Rep. 360, 84 N. W. 698, the court sustained a statute prohibiting the adulteration of milk, which provided that "for the purpose of this chapter the addition of water or any other substance or thing, to whole milk, or skimmed milk or partly skimmed milk, is hereby declared an adulteration," and said: "That the constitutionality of the statute ought not to be made to depend on the finding of a jury on the facts of a case is manifest. If the plain provisions of the Constitution have been violated, or if the act cannot be said to be a proper exercise of the police power in view of the facts of which judicial notice may be taken, then the duty of declaring the act invalid is clear. But, in the absence of such finding, the act should stand. L.R.A.1915D.

Ordinarily it cannot, we think, be a question of fact for the jury."

In State v. Layton, 160 Mo. 474, 62 L.R.A. 163, 83 Am. St. Rep. 487, 61 S. W. 171, the court, in sustaining a statute forbidding the sale of any article to be used in the preparation of food which contains alum, etc., said: "What, then, is the test when the constitutionality of an act of the legislature is assailed as invading the right of the citizen to use his faculties in the production of an article for sale of food or drink? We answer that, if it be an article so universally conceded to be wholesome and innocuous that the court may take judicial notice of it, the legislature, under the Constitution, has no right to absolutely prohibit it; but if there is a dispute as to the fact of its wholesomeness for food or drink, then the legislature can either regulate or prohibit it. The constitutionality of the law is not to be determined upon the question of fact in each case, but the courts determine for themselves upon the fundamental principles of our Constitution, which vests the legislative power in the general assembly, and the rule of construction adopted by our courts, that an act of the legislature is not to be declared void unless the violation of the Constitution is so manifest as to leave no room for reasonable doubt."

Statute commanding railroad to maintain a certain station.

In Louisiana & A. R. Co. v. State, 85 Ark. 12, 106 S. W. 960, it was held upon a prosecution against a railroad company for failure to locate and maintain a station at a certain point as commanded by statute, that it was error to exclude evidence offered by the company tending to show that there was no public necessity for a station at the place named, the court stating that the fact, if proved, that the cost of erecting and maintaining the station would be greatly in excess of and out of proportion to the revenues to be possibly derived from the business at that place would be important for the court to consider in de-

Mr. Thomas H. Branaman, with Mr. Thomas M. Honan, Attorney General, for appellee:

The act is not a regulation of interstate commerce, and does not violate § 8 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States enacted thereunder and in pursuance thereof.

S. 436, 437, 56 L. ed. 260, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 140.

The act is not in conflict with § 1 of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution termining whether or not the requirement was arbitrary and unreasonable, and whether or not there was any corresponding necessity for a station. "How, it may be asked," said the court, "is the question to be presented and determined whether the statute is a proper exercise of legislative power and valid? Is the validity of the statute a question of law or one of fact? We answer that it is a question of law for the determination of the court. The court may, however, and should, call to its aid all the available facts and information concerning the public necessity for the maintenance of a station at that place, the cost of erecting and maintaining it, as well as any other facts tending to show whether there is a necessity for a station, and whether the requirement placed upon the company to build and maintain it is a reasonable one."

Formation of counties.

In Lee v. Tucker, 130 Ga. 48, 60 S. E. 164, it was held that when the journals of the general assembly show nothing to the contrary, the courts cannot inquire whether at the time of a legislative change of a county site, there had been the constitutional requirement of "a two-thirds vote of the qualified voters of the county, voting at an election for that purpose," as there is no authority in the courts to hear evidence on the subject,—citing and following Cutcher v. Crawford, 105 Ga. 180, 31 S. E. 139, where it was held that a certified copy of the election return from the office of the secretary of state, which showed that the requisite vote had not been cast for the removal, was not admissible, as the court was bound to presume that the legislature in some way had satisfied itself that the constitutional two-thirds vote had been given for the change.

In State ex rel. Scanlan v. Archibold, 146 Wis. 363, 131 N. W. 895, the court, in sustaining the constitutionality of a statute providing certain matters as to the government of counties above a certain population, and attacked as lacking the degree of uniformity required by the Constitution, said: L.R.A.1915D.

"Counsel contends that, because facts alleged are admitted by demurrer, the conditions set up in the complaint as existing in different counties should, for the purpose of determining the validity of the law, be taken as true. This position is untenable. The law must be tested as to its constitutionality by its language in the light of such matters as the court will take judicial notice of."

In Farquharson v. Yeargin, 24 Wash. 549, 64 Pac. 717, it was urged that an act establishing a new county of Ferry was invalid "because it nowhere appears in the records of the lower house or the senate that the territory proposed to be set off as Ferry county had, at the time of presenting the petition to create such a new county, a population of 2,000, as required by § 3 of art. 11 of the Constitution of the state." The court quoted Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11, cited in the earlier note, and said: "We do not think that it is necessary that the records of the senate or the house should contain a recital of the facts determined by the legislature relative to population, any more than a final judgment in a court of general jurisdiction should contain a recital of the facts upon which it is based. Courts, in considering such acts, unless contrary facts appear affirmatively in the act under consideration, must assume that legislative discretion has been properly exercised. If evidence was required of a fact, it must be supposed that it was before the legislature when the act was passed; and if any special finding was required to warrant the passage of the particular act, it would seem that the passage of the act itself might be held equivalent to such finding."

Sacramento Drainage Dist.* 155 Cal. 373, 103 Pac. 207, as against the claim by a landowner that his property was taken without due process of law in that he was denied a hearing as to the question of the inclusion or exclusion of his land in a drainage district created by act of the legislature.

In Johnson v. Elliott, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 168 S. W. 968, the court said: "Whether or not the business of selling nonintoxicating malt liquors under a Federal license which also authorizes the sale of intoxicating malt liquors is a trade which in some way injuriously affects society is equally a question of fact, and one which must be settled by the legislature. It must be assumed, in construing laws like that here under consideration, that the legislature has made the necessary investigation, and has found that the facts warranted the restriction which it imposes. . . . To justify the courts in holding that a given act is an unwarranted invasion of the fundamental rights of the citizen, and therefore beyond the police power of the state, that objection must appear from the face of the act itself, or from the facts of which the courts must take judicial cognizance. . . .

It may be noted that in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hartford City, 170 Ind. 874, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 461, 82 N. E. 787, 85 N. E. 362, a case sustaining the validity of a city ordinance requiring the defendant to keep and maintain electric lights at certain points where its tracks intersected streets, the court, in denying the claim of defendant that there was a right to frame issues of fact regarding the necessity of the ordinance, and as to whether the exercise of the power was fair, honest, and proper, after stating that it regarded the ordinance as on the same general footing as an act of the legislature, said: "Cases might be conceived of wherein a question of fact might be raised as a means of arresting a legislative act, as, for instance, an inquiry might be made whether a law regulating the charges of a public service corporation amounted to a taking of property in the particular instance; but we regard it as a general rule that the determination by a legislative tribunal of open or debatable questions concerning what is expedient is not subject to review on questions of fact, provided that the question is one within the competency of the legislative tribunal to determine. . . . The view that legislative action can, in general, be made to depend upon the varying opinions of juries concerning its necessity or propriety, is wholly out of accord with the nature of a written law."

Compare, Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Jacksonville, 67 Ill. 37, 16 Am. Rep. 611, where it was held that an ordinance requiring a railroad to have a flagman at a crossing not unusually frequented was unconstitutional.

Section 1 applies the provisions of the act to any corporation, person, or persons "while engaged as common carriers in the transportation of passengers or property within this state to which the regulative powers of this state extend." Section 2 prescribes the kind of caboose which shall be used after June 1, 1914; and § 3 provides that "whenever any such cabooses cars or other cars now in use by such common carriers as provided by § 1 herein shall, after this act goes into effect be brought into any shop for general repairs, it shall be unlawful to again put the same into the service of such common carrier within this state unless it be equipped as provided in § 2 of this act." Other following sections define the exceptions, the powers, and duties of the Railroad Commission in respect to the matter, and provide the penalty.

The charge in the affidavit, in substance, is that on and prior to July 5, 1911, appellant owned and had in use on its line as a corporation and common carrier a in passing upon the reasonableness or unreasonableness of a statute, and deciding whether the legislature has exceeded its powers to such an extent as to render the act invalid, must look at the terms of the act itself, and bring to their assistance such scientific, economic, physical, and other pertinent facts as are common knowledge, and of which they can take judicial notice."

One of the reasons given by the courts is that proof in a single case that the statute was not a necessary regulation would be immaterial, as it must be considered from its application generally. Ibid.; People v. Smith, 108 Mich. 527, 32 L.R.A. 853, 62 Am. St. Rep. 715, 66 N. W. 382.

Thus, where the plaintiff was convicted of employing women in his hotel more than ten hours a day contrary to the statute, it was held that evidence that such employment was not injurious to women could not enable the court to determine the question as to the validity of the statute, as it must be considered from its application to all employers and employees, and not to any individual case. People v. Eldering, 254 Ill. 579, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 893, 98 N. E. 982.

So, in Shelby v. Cleveland Mill & Power Co. 155 N. C. 196, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 488, 71 S. E. 218, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 179, the court, in sustaining the validity of a statute prohibiting the discharge of sewage into waters from which a public drinking water supply is taken unless the same is purified, said: "The issue attempted to be raised by the pleadings that the stream is not dangerously polluted by the raw sewage poured into it from a large mill settlement working hundreds of operatives can be of no avail to defendant. That is a matter for the judgment of the legislature. Such legislation is preventive, and to limit it to cases where actual injury is shown to have occurred would be to deprive it of its most effective force. To be of value, such laws must be able to restrain acts which have a tendency to produce public injury."

In State ex rel. Board of Health v. Diamond Mills Paper Co. 63 N. J. Eq. 111, 51 Atl. 1019, affirmed on opinion below, 64 N. J. Eq. 793, 53 Atl. 1125, however, the court, L.R.A. 1915D.

in sustaining a statute prohibiting the discharge of factory refuse into rivers, referred to the fact that they had the evidence of scientific men (evidently favoring the statute), but did not comment on its admissibility.

Again it is said that another similar prosecution might result differently, and thus the act be declared both valid and invalid. State v. Somerville, supra.

Again, that expert evidence that the statute would inflict evil could not justify the court in deciding against the general opinion to the contrary. Com. v. Pear, 183 Mass. 242, 67 L.R.A. 935, 66 N. E. 719, affirmed in 197 U. S. 11, 49 L. ed. 643, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 358, 3 Ann. Cas. 765 (compulsory vaccination).

In People v. Smith, 108 Mich. 527, 32 L.R.A. 853, 62 Am. St. Rep. 715, 66 N. W. 382, where it does not appear whether extrinsic evidence was offered or not, the court, in sustaining a statute requiring emery wheels to be provided with blowers to carry away the dust, said, as to the question of the necessity of the statute: "Who shall decide the question, and by what rule? Shall it be the legislature or the courts? And, if the latter, is it to be determined by the evidence in the case that happens to be first brought, or by some other rule? Does it become a question of fact to be submitted to the jury, or decided by the court? Of all the devices known to human tribunals, the jury stands pre-eminent in its ability to determine cases in direct violation of and contrary to law, without impairing the binding force of the law as a rule of future action. We have known of instances where the question of the constitutionality of acts, as applied to the particular case on trial, has been made to depend upon the finding of the jury upon the facts in the case. But there is a manifest absurdity in allowing any tribunal, either court or jury, to determine from testimony in the case the question of the constitutionality of the law. Whether this law invades the rights of all the persons using emery wheels in the state is a serious question. If it is a necessary regulation, the law should certain numbered caboose car, resting on four wheels, and 18 feet and 6 inches in length, exclusive of the platforms on each end. On that date it was sent to the shops of appellant in the state of Indiana for general repairs, and after having been repaired was on August 22, 1911, owned by and put into service on appellant's lines in the state of Indiana, and continuously thereafter used in such service. The same was not as so used at least 24 feet in length, exclusive of the platforms, and was not equipped with two four-wheeled trucks. All exceptions of the statute are negative.

There was a motion in writing to quash for several reasons, all attacking the constitutionality of the act, and various sections of it on various grounds, which motion was overruled and exception to the ruling reserved. Appellant then filed a special plea that the facts alleged do not constitute a public offense, and alleging like other facts to those alleged in the motion to quash. A demurrer to this plea, for want of facts to constitute a defense, was sustained, and appellant accepted, and upon a plea of not guilty appellant was tried and found guilty and a fine of $100 imposed, and over motion for a new trial on the grounds that the finding is contrary to law, and not sustained by sufficient evidence, and over motion in arrest of judgment for the reasons set out in the special plea, judgment was entered.

As the validity of the law is the sole question presented, it is not necessary to consider any other question, except to say that the admissions and evidence show appellant to be a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and that the value of the particular car when it went into the shops was $380, and when repaired $442, and that the salvage in making the caboose correspond to the act of 1911 would be $185; that appellant has 251 like cars like employed as the car in question, and that like cars have been in use by appellant fifteen years, and that it would now cost approximately $1,150 each to construct the cars to conform to the requirements of the act of 1911, with a salvage of $185; that the timber in the present car would be valueless, and only the iron portions and the cupola usable; that 50 of the cars in use cost approximately, when built, $470, and the remainder $875 each, and the average cost when new was $666 and the average value now $442; that compliance with the act of 1911 would not add to the safety or comfort or health of the trainmen; that they have as much ventilation as a car required by the act; that the only difference from the present cars would be in the length and the additional set of trucks, and the car would not be as strong as the cars at present constructed and in use, and that as now constructed they are stronger than the 60,000 pound capacity freight cars. There was no objection to, or contradiction or rebuttal of this evidence.

We have stated the matter fully in order to present appellant's position fairly, and the question is, Does the evidence overcome the presumption, or is evidence admissible to controvert the presumption? It is the contention of appellant that the act is in violation of § 8 of article 1 of the Federal Constitution as a regulation of commerce "among the states." It is contended by the state that the act will be construed as applying only to operations in the state, and does not purport to be a regulation of interstate commerce, and that as a police power which affect interstate commerce incidentally is supreme until and unless the particular subject is taken cognizance of by Congress, and that the charbe sustained, but, if an unjust law, it should be annulled. The first case presented might show by the opinions of many witnesses that the use of the dry emery wheel is almost necessarily fatal to the operative, while the next might show exactly the opposite state of facts. . . . It would seem, then, that the questions of danger and reasonableness must be determined in another way. The legislature, in determining upon the passage of the law, may make investigations which the courts cannot. As a rule, the members (collectively) may be expected to acquire more technical and experimental knowledge of such matters than any court can be supposed to possess, both as to the dangers to be guarded against and the means of prevention of injury to be applied; and hence, while under our institutions the validity of laws must be finally passed upon by the courts, all presumptions should be L.R.A.1915D.

in favor of the validity of legislative action. If the courts find the plain provisions of the Constitution violated, or if it can be said that the act is not within the rule of necessity in view of facts of which judicial notice may be taken, then the act must fall; otherwise it should stand."

It may be noted that in People v. Williams, 189 N. Y. 131, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1130, 121 Am. St. Rep. 854, 81 N. E. 778, 12 Ann. Cas. 798, the New York court held unconstitutional as arbitrary and unnecessary a statute prohibiting late night work in factories by women, but that in People v. Charles Schweinler Press, 214 N. Y. 395, 108 N. E. 639, it sustained a similar statute not much less drastic in view particularly of the facts set forth in a report made by a legislative commission on the subject which recommended the law.

acter of caboose as to length and wheel base has not been the subject of Federal concern. If the subject of the length and wheel base of caboose cars has been taken cognizance of, and the length and wheel base fixed, we are bound to recognize the sole jurisdiction of the subject as in Congress, even though the car was at the time engaged in intrastate traffic, but in conjunction with interstate traffic or commerce. Southern R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 179 Ind. 23, 100 N. E. 337, and cases cited.

The acts of Congress and the Interstate Commerce Commission have not embraced the specific subject either of length of caboose cars or their wheel bases, and we regard the act of the state as not an interference with, or as placing a burden upon, or as regulating, interstate commerce, even though the right of control extends to all the instruments of such commerce (Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 497, 24 L. ed. 551), for the reason that this act does not lay any restrictions on commerce itself, or the objects of commerce, nor on an instrumentality of commerce by the manner of construction or the manner of its use, but the act is directed at the form of the instrumentality as to a matter as to which Congress has not seen fit to act. We are unable to perceive how it might affect it even incidentally, and it is not such legislation as is superseded by the Federal laws. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 172 Ind. 147, 166, 167, 87 N. E. 1034 and cases cited; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 178 Ind. 498, 99 N. E. 801; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Arkansas, 219 U. S. 453, 465, 55 L. ed. 290, 296, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 632, 41 L. ed. 853, 854, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 480, 31 L. ed. 508, 513, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564.

The serious question is the attack made upon the act as being in violation of the due process of law clause of the Federal and state Constitutions, on the ground of its being unreasonable and resulting in the destruction of a large amount of property, which would be in effect taken and actually destroyed without just reason and without any good purpose to be subserved in the public interest, under the guise of being a police regulation. In answer to this the state contends that a police regulation is not a denial of due process of law. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 178 Ind. 498, 99 N. E. 801; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 172 Ind. 147, 162, 163, 87 N. E. 1034; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Arkansas, 219 U. S. 453, 465, 466, 55 L. ed. 290, 296, 297, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275; New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S. 628, 632, 41 L. ed. 853, 854, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418. Also that the state Constitution applies only to the taking of specific property by virtue of the right of eminent domain. Hanly v. Sims, 175 Ind. 353, 93 N. E. 228, 94 N. E. 401; State v. Richcreek, 167 Ind. 217, 223, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874, 119 Am. St. Rep. 491, 77 N. E. 1085, 10 Ann. Cas. 899; Levy v. State, 161 Ind. 251, 256, 68 N. E. 172; Parks v. State, 159 Ind. 211, 220, 59 L.R.A. 190, 64 N. E. 862.

The police power is of very wide scope, and the extent to which it may go has not and cannot be defined, and its application in a proper case is not inimical to the Federal Constitution, but it must also be recognized that property or property rights may not be destroyed under the guise of the police power or so-called police regulation, if it appears that it has or can have no just relation to the protection of the public health, welfare, morals, or safety. Unless this negation affirmatively appears by the act or its history in enactment, the police power extends even to the taking and destruction of property, without being an infringement upon the due process of law clauses of either Constitution, even though compliance with the specific act shall require a large expenditure of money, and it will be presumed that the act is reasonable, unless the contrary appears from the facts of which the courts will take notice. State v. Barrett, 172 Ind. 169, 87 N. E. 7; State v. Richcreek, 167 Ind. 217, 223, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 874, 119 Am. St. Rep. 491, 77 N. E. 1085, 10 Ann. Cas. 899, and cases cited.

Regulation is the normal form of operation of the police power, and it operates on the relation which the property or rights affected bears to the danger or evil which is to be provided against. The courts can have nothing to do with the wisdom or expediency of legislative measures, or cost of compliance with them, as a rule; but if the legislature is the sole judge of the necessity of the measure it enacts, there could be no limitation on the so-called police power, and it is everywhere regarded under constitutional government that a measure must not be unreasonable, and it is necessarily of the very essence of constitutional government and co-ordinated power. Freund, Pol. Power, §§ 8, 15-18, 20, 21; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, §§ 1, 4, 144. It may be a matter of degree, but it must not be unreasonable, for it is apparent that a measure may be unreasonable from an excess of degree, and the question ordinarily is whether the regulation becomes prohibitive, destructive, or confiscatory, or reasonably adapted to promote some public purpose, or some purpose in which the public is interested, or in which the lives, health, or safety of classes of the public is directly interested, or affects others indirectly, as, for example, in respect to safety appliances. Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. State, 160 Ind. 379, 62 L.R.A. 136, 66 N. E. 1005; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 51 L. ed. 523, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 137, 38 L. ed. 385, 388, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 145, 24 L. ed. 91.

Courts will not attempt fine distinctions with respect to the matter of reasonableness or unreasonableness of a statute, and ordinarily it must be plain that no circumstances could justify an act before courts are authorized to interpose. State v. Barrett, supra.

As here presented, this court is confronted squarely with the proposition whether it is conclusively bound by the presumption that there were reasons presented to the legislature as the basis for the act as to which the court cannot be informed, as presented by the act itself; or whether evidence here adduced is admissible as tending to show that the act is arbitrary and unreasonable. The effect of such evidence is of course a collateral attack upon the legislative inquiry, judgment, and declaration (that is, to impeach it), and we fully appreciate the gravity of the question.

On the one hand we have the legislative determination; on the other the impeachment of that determination by the opinion of witnesses, which, if admissible, would seem to cover every phase of the case as presenting an unreasonable and arbitrary exercise of legislative authority. What the evidence might be in another case under the same act, as showing good cause for the enactment, only demonstrates the inadmissibility of this evidence for any purpose. It would be a dangerous rule to declare that the validity or invalidity of an act of the legislature can be the subject of collateral attack as to the facts upon which the legislature has acted; that is, that a jury may determine from evidence adduced before it, or from lack of evidence, that an act is or is not invalid, with as many varying conclusions as there might be bodies of triers, or upon such facts as ingenuity might suggest, as matters of opinion or actual facts in evidence. The question of the validity of a legislative act is necessarily one of law, and not of fact, and is not the subject of inquiry by triers of fact, and cannot be made to depend upon the testimony of witnesses, where the question is one within the competency of the legislature L.R.A.1915D.

to enact (that is, within its power), and its validity cannot be contested or brought into review by inquiries of fact into extraneous matters of which courts may not take judicial notice. State ex rel. Colbert v. Wheeler, 172 Ind. 584, 89 N. E. 1, 19 Ann. Cas. 834, and cases cited; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Hartford City, 170 Ind. 674, 82 N. E. 787, 85 N. E. 362, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 461, and cases cited; State v. Barrett, supra; Hovey v. State, 119 Ind. 395, 21 N. E. 21; Hovey v. Foster, 118 Ind. 502, 21 N. E. 39; Indianapolis v. Navin, 151 Ind. 139, 41 L.R.A. 337, 47 N. E. 525, 51 N. E. 80; Mode v. Beasley, 143 Ind. 306, 42 N. E. 727; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 28 L. ed. 1145, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 730; Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11; Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230, and note, 14 L.R.A. 459, and note; De Camp v. Eveland, 19 Barb. 81; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. pp. 267 et seq; Tiedeman, Pol. Power, § 73.

If it cannot be made to appear that a law is in conflict with the Constitution by argument deduced from the language of the law itself, or from matters of which a court can take judicial notice, then the act must stand. The testimony of expert or other witnesses is not admissible to show that in carrying out a law enacted by the legislature some provisions of the Constitution may possibly be violated. People ex rel. Kemmler v. Durston, 119 N. Y. 569, 24 N. E. 6, 16 Am. St. Rep. 859, 864, 7 L.R.A. 715, and cases cited; People v. Worden Grocer Co. 118 Mich. 604, 77 N. W. 315; People v. Elerding, 254 Ill. 579, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 893, 898, 98 N. E. 982; Bonnett v. Vallier, 136 Wis. 193, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 486, 128 Am. St. Rep. 1061, 1068, 116 N. W. 885.

We certainly cannot know that a longer car with two adjustable and oscillating four-wheeled trucks, instead of four rigid wheels, will not ride more comfortably, and it is probable with more safety. At least the court cannot say that it is unreasonable, but is bound to presume that there were facts before the legislature which would show it not to be unreasonable, and we hold that it cannot be the subject of attack, by oral evidence as unreasonable and arbitrary and confiscatory, as is sought in this case. We do not place this conclusion on any ground of abstract justice or judicial notions of natural right or equity, but upon the ground that the act cannot be attacked by oral evidence as to its unreasonableness, or the cost of expense, or the hardship which may result from compliance, for the reason that the question is one of power in the legislature as a police regulation, with which courts may not interfere unless they can say that it is not within the power, or that they judicially know that there could be no reason or reasons for the act.

It is next urged that the act is invalid because its going into effect is made to depend upon some other authority than is provided in the Constitution, in violation of article 1, § 25, and in violation of § 26, art. 1, as authorizing the suspension of laws without the authority of the general assembly, and invalid under articles 3 and 4 of the Constitution, as delegating legislative powers to the Railroad Commission under §§ 5 and 7 of the act.

Appellant is not prosecuted here for the violation of any order of the Railroad Commission, the taking effect or suspension, enforcement, or validity of which might be involved under §§ 25 and 26 of article 1, but for the violation of §§ 2 and 3 of the act, which are not involved with §§ 5 and 7, and are entirely independent; and if the latter are invalid, as to which we express no opinion, the valid and the invalid sections are independent and readily separable, and appellant cannot complain of an act which, if invalid, is not in question and does not affect it. Hammer v. State, 173 Ind. 199, 204, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 795, 140 Am. St. Rep. 248, 89 N. E. 850, 21 Ann. Cas. 1034.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

SARAH CALKINS

v.

ROSEAN PIERCE.

(112 Me. 474, 92 Atl. 529.)

Landlord and tenant — invalid life estate — recovery of possession.

A lessor of an estate by a lease purporting to be for life, but invalid as a life

Note. — Right of lessor to maintain an action for possession against his covenantant not to disturb lessee's possession, when the covenant is repugnant to the estate granted.

The law courts early established the rule that if the lessor's covenant, express or implied, from the nature of the estate intended to be created, not to disturb the lessee in his possession and enjoyment of the premises, is repugnant to the very nature and character of the estate actually created by the L.R.A.1915D.

estate because not under seal, upon consideration of support, cannot, where the statute does not require an ordinary lease to be under seal, maintain a real action to recover the possession while the lessee complies with his agreement.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Aroostook County made during the trial of an action brought to recover possession of certain real estate, which resulted in a judgment for plaintiff. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. B. Donworth, for defendant:

The lease was valid, and plaintiff is not entitled to recover possession of the property.

Messrs. Shaw, Burleigh, & Shaw also for defendant.

Messrs. Powers & Guild and William P. Allen, for plaintiff:

The instrument in question purports to convey a life estate in the demanded premises.

Doe ex dem. Warner v. Browne, 8 East, 165; Washb. Real Prop. 5th ed. 121, 122.

A life estate in land cannot be conveyed by a written instrument not under seal.

Haley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a real action brought to recover the possession of a lot of land situated in Caribou, county of Aroostook, and was heard at the February term, 1914, by the court without a jury on an agreed statement of facts, with the right of exception. The material facts of the agreed statement are that the plaintiff was devised for her life by the will of her husband, proved and allowed in the probate court on the third lease, the covenant is not binding and the lessor can maintain an action for possession, even against the covenant. The lessee was compelled to go into a court of equity to obtain relief. Since law courts in almost all jurisdictions now permit equitable defenses to actions at law, there seems to be no good reason why those courts ought not to hold that the lessor is estopped by an express or implied covenant not to disturb the lessee in his possession; so that, although it be impossible to regard the covenant as the determining factor in fixing the charac-

Tuesday of December, 1895, the lot of land demanded and described in the writ; that on May 4, 1909, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into the following agreement:

Caribou, Aroostook County, Me.,
May 4, 1909.

I, Sarah Calkins, this 4th day of May, 1909, do lease to Rosean Pierce my homestead farm in the town of Caribou, this being a life lease and said Rosean Pierce is to support me, Sarah Calkins, as long as I live, and said Sarah Calkins is to live and stay with me as long as she lives. I am to clothe and support the same at my home for the rent of her farm. I, Rosean

Pierce, am to pay all taxes on said farm, and if I should die before this lease expires, this lease is void. The house on this said farm is not included in this lease.

Within a week of the date of said agreement the defendant, Rosean Pierce, went into possession of the premises described in said writing, which are the premises demanded in the writ, and has remained in possession ever since.

The parties agreed that the only contested point was the construction of the lease or writing above mentioned, submitted by the defendant under the above state of facts.

The court filed the following ruling: "I think the writing relied upon by the deter of the estate, yet it can be given the force of a simple contract.

Most of the cases in which the question has arisen involve a lease in terms determinable solely at the will of the lessee, the lessor's covenant not to dispossess him being sometimes express and sometimes implied from the grant. It will be seen, infra, that a few courts have held that even though the lease is under seal, it creates only an estate at the will of the lessor, while most courts follow what is believed to be the correct rule, i. e., that the lessee takes a freehold estate either for life or in fee, according to the terms of the particular instrument and other considerations not material here. But if, for any reason, such as lack of seal or other defect, the particular instrument cannot pass a freehold estate, then the lessee takes only an estate at the will of the lessor. It is clear that the covenant in all these cases is repugnant to the very nature and character of an estate at the will of the lessor. So, except in those cases where the lease can be construed to pass a freehold estate, the covenant is not binding, and the lessor can, in an action at law, recover possession from the lessee, since the lease creates only a tenancy at will, except in jurisdictions in which equitable defenses are permitted in actions at law. See cases cited, infra. The note is not limited to this particular class of leases, but the same principle is the basis of the decisions involving leases for a term of years, from year to year, or for life.

"When the lease is made to have and to hold at the will of the lessor, the law implieth it to be at the will of the lessee also, for it cannot be only at the will of the lessor, but it must be at the will of the lessee also. And so it is when the lease is made to have and to hold at the will of the lessee; this must be also at the will of the lessor; and so are all the books that seem prima facie to differ clearly reconciled." Co. Lit. 55, a. If the words, "this must be also at the will of the lessor," are accepted without qualification, clearly the lessor—except in jurisdictions where equitable defenses are permitted in actions at law—is not estopped in an action at law by his grant, to maintain an action for possession. To say that the estate is terminable at the will of the lessor, but that he is estopped to sue for possession by the very grant or covenant which operated to create a tenancy at will, would be simply stating a paradox, so far as technical pleading in the law court goes.

Some courts in the United States have followed the rule that a lease that fixes no time for the termination of the estate, but expressly gives the right to terminate to the lessee only, creates an estate at will of the lessor, and he can maintain an action for possession. Doe ex dem. Pidgeon v. Richards, 4 Ind. 374; Knight v. Indiana Coal & I. Co. 47 Ind. 105, 17 Am. Rep. 692 (action by lessor to quiet title); Cheever v. Pearson, 16 Pick. 266; Corby v. McSpadden, 63 Mo. App. 648 (by way of argument); Western Transp. Co. v. Lansing, 49 N. Y. 499; Doe ex dem. Mhoon v. Drizzle, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 414; Beauchamp v. Runnels, 35 Tex. Civ. App. 212, 79 S. W. 1105 (forcible entry and detainer for possession); Cowan v. Radford Iron Co. 83 Va. 547, 3 S. E. 120, 15 Mor. Min. Rep. 453 (merely an approval of the principle); Reese v. Zinn, 103 Fed. 97. These cases are in harmony with the practically unanimous opinion of the courts so far as the soundness of the rule is concerned, and they are not in harmony only in the fact that these courts apply the rule when the lease is under seal. The courts in these cases have held, although the leases were under seal, exactly what other courts would have held only in the absence of the seal. See, infra. The fact that other courts would have construed the lease, it being under seal, so as to convey an estate that would not be repugnant to the covenant, does not detract from the value of these cases on the question here under discussion. As construed, they passed an estate repugnant to the covenant. For the purpose of this note the court's construction as to the estate passed must be accepted.

In Doe ex dem. Pidgeon v. Richards, 4 Ind. 374, the lease was practically the same as the one in CALKINS v. PIERCE, except that it was sealed, and instead of being fendant, if it had been sealed, would have operated to create a tenancy for life. A tenancy which operates as an estate for life, being a freehold, can only pass by deed, that is by writing under seal. It follows that the writing referred to is invalid to create any estate or right of possession in the defendant, Rosean Pierce," and ordered judgment for the plaintiff, to which the defendant excepted, and the case is before this court upon her exceptions.

The ruling of the court that "a tenancy which operates as an estate for life, being a freehold, can only be passed by deed, that is, by writing under seal," is undoubtedly the law. But it does not follow that the writing referred to is invalid to create any estate or right of possession of the property described in the defendant, for, as said by the court in Hurd v. Chase, 100 Me. 561, 62 Atl. 660: "It may be conceded that the plaintiff has the legal title to a life estate in the land, but to maintain this action (ignoring technicalities in pleading) she must be entitled to possession as well. Rev. Stat. chap. 106, § 5. One may retain his title to real estate while debarring himself from right of entry and possession."

The plaintiff relies upon § 35 of Taylor on Landlord & Tenant, which, after stating that a life estate can only be created by deed, reads: "An agreement not under seal, that a lessor should not turn out the tenant so long as he paid rent, has been held invalid, because the tenancy created by it would not be determinable so long as the expressly for life, it was for "so long as he (the lessee) desires." The action in ejectment for possession was brought in the right of the lessor after notice to lessee to quit. The court quoted Lord Coke's rule in full, and applied the same by sustaining the plaintiff's action.

In Den ex dem. Mhoon v. Drizzle, 14 N. C. (3 Dev. L.) 414, the term was "during his natural life or so long as said Drizzle may wish to tend it himself, and no longer." Although lessee was in possession and had cleared a great portion of the land, the court, while admitting that it was a hard case, applied Lord Coke's rule and sustained an action in ejectment by a judgment creditor of the heirs of the lessor after the latter's death, holding that the lease created only a tenancy at will, which was terminated by the death of the lessor. The lease was under seal.

And the same rule has been applied where the lease was for a definite term of years, but the lessee expressly given the right to terminate at any time during the term. Eclipse Oil Co. v. South Penn Oil Co. 47 W. Va. 84, 34 S. E. 923, 20 Mor. Min. Rep. 234.

However, convincing arguments have been presented tending to show that Coke had in mind, when he made the statement, only leases without livery of seisin, which at that time was necessary to the creation of a freehold estate (after the seal and formal execution took the place of livery of seisin, Coke's statement would apply only to leases not under seal or otherwise defective as conveyances of freehold estates). The authorities in support of this position lead far beyond the scope of the present note. Therefore, it must suffice to say that the arguments produced and the authorities cited in Tiffany, Landlord & Tenant, vol. 1, § 13 (1) p. 101, in support of this position, leave scarcely room to doubt that the position is the correct one. But for the purpose of this note it does not make much difference whether Lord Coke and other writers on the same point meant to limit the rule to leases without livery of seisin or not, for the principle of the rule remains correct if it is so limited, but it becomes applicable to fewer cases. The rule is so limited by the great weight of authority, in practice at least, for it is held that a lease under seal conveys a freehold estate if by its terms its termination is dependent wholly upon the will of the lessee. In England it usually creates a life estate for the reason that the word "heirs" is necessary to convey a fee simple estate, but in some states in this country it conveys the fee (see citations by Tiffany in the section cited supra). Cases in which it is held that a lease terminable solely at the will of the lessee creates a life estate or conveys a fee are not in point here, except perhaps indirectly. For example, in Lewis v. Kilinger, 30 Pa. 281, second appeal 32 Pa. 367, a lease of property at an annual rental was made for the term of one hundred years and thereafter as long as the lessee, his heirs and assigns, shall think proper. At the expiration of the one hundred years, the parties who had succeeded to the rights of the lessor brought ejectment. It was held that a fee simple estate had passed by the instrument, since it met all formal requirements to convey such an estate, but the court quotes Lord Coke's rule and fully explains the fact that if the instrument had not been under seal, the rule would be applicable.

From what is said, supra, the reason for Lord Coke's rule becomes apparent. The lessor is permitted to recover against his covenant only when the covenant is repugnant to the very nature or character of any estate that could possibly be conveyed by the instrument. The covenant is coextensive with a life estate, which is a freehold. By construing the instrument as a conveyance of a freehold estate there is no repugnancy. But if there were no livery of seisin (later, if there were no seal) the lease could not convey a freehold estate, and the covenant was repugnant to the very nature and character of the estate granted by the lease, hence the lessor was permitted to recover against it.

The court in CALKINS v. PIERCE, after reviewing Doe ex dem. Warner v. Browne, 8 East, 165, says: "The only point that case decided was that an estate for life can tenant complied with the terms of his agreement, and would therefore operate as an estate for life, which, being a freehold, can only pass by deed."

The authority for the text is Doe ex dem. Warner v. Browne, 8 East, 165. An examination of the case shows that it does not support the test to the extent claimed by the plaintiff. It was an action to recover possession of a messuage that the defendant was in possession of under an agreement not under seal, whereby the defendant was to have possession of certain premises for a certain rent, payable quarterly, which contains the following clause: "That W. Warner shall not raise the rent nor turn out J. Browne so long as the rent is duly paid quarterly, and he does not expose to sale or sell any article that may be injurious to W. Warner in his business."

It was not claimed the tenant had broken any of the conditions, but the plaintiff rested his case on proving half a year's notice to the defendant to quit on the 25th day of March, and the question was whether the lessor had a right to determine the tenancy on such notice, considering the defendant as tenant only from year to year.

At the trial Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., held the notice to be good, and a verdict was accordingly taken for the plaintiff with leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit; a rule having been obtained for that purpose, upon the ground that the agreement operated as a lease for so long as the tenant pleased and he complied with only be created by deed or will, and that the writing did not create a life estate, but did create an interest in the land, viz., a tenancy from year to year." With all deference to the court, it is submitted that it did not adequately state the holding of the English court. That case was tried upon the theory that the writing created a tenancy from year to year, making a decision on that point unnecessary. But the tenant contended that the landlord was estopped from maintaining ejectment, as could be done on six months' notice under the ordinary tenancy from year to year, by his covenant "that W. Warner shall not raise the rent nor turn out J. Browne so long as the rent is duly paid quarterly, and he does not expose to sale or sell any article that may be injurious to W. Warner in his business." It was held that he was not so estopped, for the reason that the covenant was repugnant to a tenancy from year to year, i. e., the leasehold estate could not possibly be one from year to year and at the same time be terminable only at the will of the tenant. The reasoning was that, in order to give the covenant effect, the theory of a tenancy from year to year must be abandoned, and that of a tenancy for life adopted, but the latter theory could not be adopted for the reason that the lease was not under seal. An important principle underlying the case is that a leasehold life estate cannot be in effect created as distinct from a freehold life estate. Counsel cited Right ex dem. Green v. Proctor, 4 Burr, 2208, to the point "that a lessor shall not recover in ejectment against his covenant," and Doe ex dem. Rigge v. Bell, 5 T. R. 471, 2 Revised Rep. 642, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 596, "where, though the lease by parol for seven years was avoided by the statute of frauds, yet the lessor was holden to be bound by his agreement, as to the time of giving notice to quit." To which citations Lord Ellenborough, Ch. J., answered: "It was not repugnant to the nature of the estate there, that the agreement, though void as to the duration of the lease, should regulate the time of giving notice to quit; but here it is entirely repugnant to the nature of a tenancy from year to year, such as this is contended to be, that the option of determining it should rest solely with the tenant." When Lawrence, J., said: "If this interest be not determinable so long as the tenant complies with the terms of the agreement, it would operate as an estate for life, which can only be created by deed, as a feoffment or a conveyance to uses. The notion of a tenancy from year to year, the lessor binding himself not to give notice to quit, which was once thrown out by Lord Mansfield, has been long exploded,"—he did not, it is submitted, have in mind, or in any way refer to, counsel's citation of Right ex dem. Green v. Proctor, although Lord Mansfield sat in the trial of that case. That he referred to Right ex dem. Green v. Proctor seems to be extremely doubtful, for three reasons: (1) The conclusion in that case, as is pointed out by the court in CALKINS v. PIERCE, was approved unanimously by the whole court. (2) It would seem that neither the court nor Lord Mansfield nor anyone else connected with the case of Right ex dem. Green v. Proctor said anything about "a tenancy from year to year, the lessor binding himself not to give notice to quit." The lease in that case was embodied in a partnership agreement, the owner, one of the partners, dedicating the house to the use of the firm as a part of its capital, by stipulating that the other, who was an active partner, should occupy and care for the house and partnership property and receive a certain amount towards expenses. It would be difficult to see how any court could avoid holding that the covenant amounted to a lease, and that the lessor could not eject the lessee during the time the partnership continued. The report of the case in 4 Burr. 2208, is as follows: "This was a case reserved for the opinion of the court. In ejectment. Edward Green was seised of a house in St. Margarets' Westminster, a brewhouse, and the stock belonging to it. Proctor agreed to purchase one fifth of it. Green covenanted to assign it accordingly. Articles of partnership were entered into, in which were several covenants. Amongst others, Green covenanted that the said the conditions. The case was argued in the King's bench, and Lord Ellenborough stated: "That either his estate might inure for life at his option, and then, according to Lord Coke, such an estate would, in legal contemplation be an estate for life, which could not be created by parol; or, if not for life, being for no assignable period, it must operate as a tenancy from year to year; in which case it would be inconsistent with and repugnant to the nature of such an estate, that it should not be determinable at the pleasure of either party giving the regular notice."

Lawrence, J., said: "If this interest be not determinable so long as the tenant complies with the terms of the agreement, it would operate as an estate for life, which can only be created by deed, as a feoffment or a conveyance to uses. The notion of a tenancy from year to year, the lessor binding himself not to give notice to quit, which was once thrown out by Lord Mansfield, has been long exploded."

The only point that case decided was that an estate for life can only be created by deed or will, and that the writing did not create a life estate, but did create an interest in the land, viz., a tenancy from year to year.

Right ex dem. Green v. Proctor, 4 Burr. 2208, was the case in which it was stated that the notion was advanced by Lord Mansfield of a tenancy from year to year; the lessor binding himself not to give notice to quit. The case was tried before Lord trade shall be carried on between Green, Ekins, and Proctor, etc., and £300 allotted for the yearly rent of the house shall be paid by Green. He covenants, also, that Proctor shall reside and dwell in the house free of all rent, except taxes; and shall be allowed certain perquisites and household expenses, and receive £6, 6s. weekly for his trouble, etc. And he covenanted that if he should die, his executor should renew the lease to Proctor. It was likewise covenanted that neither party should dispose of his share without acquainting the other. Then there is a proviso that Proctor and his family may use the water of Green's canal. Proctor alone resided in the house. At the trial a verdict was found for the plaintiff, and 1s. damages, subject to the opinion of this court upon this question—"Whether, upon this state of the case, the plaintiff has a right to recover." This question first came before the court on Friday last, the 29th of April, and was then ordered to stand over to this day. Mr. Ashurst, on behalf of the plaintiff, argued that Green had not excluded himself from a joint occupation. And if the words do not import it, the court will not enforce such a construction as seems contrary to the intention. Green had either the sole legal right, or was joint tenant with Proctor. Mr. Walker, contra, was stopped by Lord Mansfield, it being a clear case. Lord Mansfield: At the trial I had no doubt upon the construction of the articles, and none of us have any doubt now. The plaintiff cannot recover against his own covenant. Green was to be a gentleman in this affair; Ekins, to furnish skill and money; Proctor, to contribute labor and attendance. The house was to be appropriated to the use of the trade. Proctor was to have the use and occupation of it, and be bound to reside there, and to have coals, candles, etc., and other perquisites, and the use of a pond which belonged to Mr. Green; and if Green should die, his executor was bound to renew the lease to Proctor. And Proctor did live in the house. Green has no right to recover under all these circumstances. Mr. Justice Yates: Even as a license to inhabit, it amounts to a lease, and it appears most plainly to be intended that he was to reside in it. Mr. Justice Aston and Mr. Justice Willes were of the same opinion. Per Cur' unanimously. Judgment of nonsuit." (3) It is submitted that the reference of Lawrence, J., was to the "notion . . . thrown out by Lord Mansfield" in Ferguson v. Cornish, 2 Burr. 1032, 3 T. R. 463, note, expressed more accurately and followed in Goodright ex dem. Hall v. Richardson, 3 T. R. 462. The lease in the Ferguson Case was for "seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, as the lessee (Cornish) should think proper, at £60 per annum rent." Lord Mansfield seems to have held, although the case did not turn upon the point, that either the lessor or the lessee could terminate the lease, by proper notice, at the end of seven or fourteen years. This statement of the holding is stronger than Lord Mansfield expressed it, but it is a fair statement of the doctrine evolved from his statement, by Lord Kenyon, in Goodright ex dem. Hall v. Richardson, supra, who elaborated and approved the doctrine, although it seems to have been unnecessary to the decision in this case also. This doctrine, which has been attributed to Lord Mansfield, "has been long exploded," as having been extrajudicial, in both the cases cited supra (Dann v. Spurrier, 3 Bos. & P. 399, 7 Ves. Jr. 231, 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 756; Doe ex dem. Webb v. Dixon, 9 East, 15; Bacon, Abr. Leases (L) 628). In the Spurrier Case the doctrine is referred to as having been "thrown out" by Lord Mansfield. To paraphrase the words of Lawrence, J., in Doe ex dem. Warner v. Browne: We do not base our decision upon the notion once thrown out by Lord Mansfield, but long ago exploded, that a covenant by the lessor not to give notice to quit is in every case of tenancy from year to year of no effect, but in the case before us the covenant is repugnant to the very nature of the estate, and for that reason alone the lessor is not estopped to recover against it. It will be seen that the "notion once thrown out by Lord Mansfield" went much farther toward permitting the lessor to recover against his covenant than any of the judges in Doe ex dem. Warner

Mansfield, and a verdict for the plaintiff was taken. The case was then taken to the King's bench, and at the trial Lord Mansfield stopped the argument for the defendants, saying: "At the trial I had no doubt upon the construction of the articles, and none of us have any doubt now. The plaintiff cannot recover against his own covenant."

Justice Yates said, "Even as a license to inhabit, it amounts to a lease," and it was the unanimous opinion of the court that a nonsuit should be entered. The case shows, not the notion of Lord Mansfield of a tenancy from year to year, the lessor binding himself not to give notice to quit, being valid between the parties, but the unanimous opinion of King's bench that that was the law.

The same principle was enforced in Kelleher v. Fong, 108 Me. 181, 79 Atl. 466, where the defendant was in possession of a store under a contract not under seal, whereby he and his brother were to pay rent at the

v. Browne, were willing to go. They limited the rule to cases of repugnancy between the covenant and the estate conveyed, and the expounded theory did not. As to further history of Browne v. Warner, in equity, see same case infra.

The same principle underlies the decision in Dossee v. East India Co. 8 Week. Rep. 245, 1 L. T. N. S. 345. The court, assuming that the lessors had let lessee "into possession under an agreement that they would not disturb him until after a month from a contingent uncertain event," which event in fact never happened, held that, had the agreement been under seal, it would have passed a freehold estate subject to be defeated by the happening of the contingency, etc. But it was held that since the agreement was not under seal, and therefore could not pass a freehold estate, the lessee was in possession as a tenant at will, and that the lessor could maintain an action of ejectment for possession of the premises. See same case, infra, as to the right of defendant in equity.

So, it would seem that for centuries the law courts have held that an action for possession by the lessor can be maintained against his covenant not to disturb the lessee's possession, if the covenant is repugnant to the nature and character of any estate that could be granted by the particular instrument under which the lessee holds. But it must always be remembered that law courts at the present time have, in almost all jurisdictions, very extended equitable powers, and that actions at law are now controlled to a certain extent by equitable principles. It is neither asserted nor intimated in any of the cases cited supra, that a court of equity could not intervene and prevent the lessor from taking possession of his own property on the ground that he has agreed not to do so. On the contrary in Dossee v. East India Co. supra (for facts see same case, supra), Lord Chelmsford, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Yet the instrument was binding upon them as an agreement, and a court of equity would have protected the appellants against any attempt to dispossess them contrary to its stipulations. Notwithstanding the provision which it contains for a month's notice, the East India Company might have maintained an ejectment the day after the agreement was entered into, because it passed no legal interest, but they could have been instantly restrained from proceeding by a court of equity."

It should also be noted that after the decision in Doe ex dem. Warner v. Browne, 8 East, 165, discussed supra, an injunction against the ejectment was issued upon the lessee's petition alleging that the instrument was an agreement for a lease, and the issue before the court was whether or not the terms of the agreement were sufficiently specific to justify a decree of specific performance. Browne v. Warner, 14 Ves. Jr. 156, 9 Revised Rep. 259 and same case 14 Ves. Jr. 409. In the latter opinion, p. 413, Eldon, Lord Chancellor, said: "I admit that the court must find in the paper before it sufficient evidence of the term and interest intended to be granted; but even if the bill should be dismissed upon that ground, relief of a more limited kind must be given upon another ground, with reference to the terms in which the agreement is conceived." The case seems to have gone by default after death of the lessee (see 3 Beav. 296), so that we have no record of a final adjudication of the kind of relief that might have been given.

So, it would appear that when the court in CALKINS v. PIERCE held that, although no estate passed to the lessee by reason of the fact that the instrument was not under seal, but that plaintiff was estopped by her implied agreement to not disturb the defendant in her possession during life, it was merely permitting an equitable defense in an action at law. The court fortified itself to some extent by its own former decisions.

In Sweetser v. McKenney, 65 Me. 225 (see citation of this case in CALKINS v. PIERCE), the lessor in a lease "for five years and as much longer as he desires, provided, etc.," was held to be estopped to maintain forcible entry and detainer against the lessee after the five years had expired, so long as the lessee kept all his covenants and remained in possession.

The case of Kelleher v. Fong, 108 Me. 181, 79 Atl. 466, is sufficiently explained in CALKINS v. PIERCE to show that it involved a lease terminable solely at the will of the lessee. There is one paragraph in the case sufficiently illuminating to justify its quotation here. After reviewing its earlier decisions the court said: "But it is contended by the learned counsel for the plaintiff that the great weight of authority in other jurisrate of $20 per month during the winter and until the beginning of spring, and after that period to pay $25 per month, and also, "that they are to have the use and occupation of said store as long as they want it." The defendant claimed he was occupying as lessee under a written lease, with an option upon his part to hold a life estate. The plaintiff contended it was a tenancy at will, and, after defendant had been in possession several years, gave notice to terminate the tenancy. The court held the plaintiff bound by his agreement, upon the authority of Sweetser v. McKenney, 65 Me. 225. From a hasty reading of the case it might seem that the court decided that a life estate could be created by an instrument not under seal, but a careful reading shows that it was not so intended, but that it was intended to be an affirmation of the doctrine of Sweetser v. McKenney.

The agreement did not convey a life estate, yet there is no pretense that it was not executed knowingly and understandingly

dictions is opposed to the doctrines laid down by the Maine court in the cases above quoted. It has been seen, however, that the decisions of this court in those cases were not influenced by the medievalism of the law, or controlled by any arbitrary legal dogmas. It was obviously not the purpose of the court to establish any inflexible rules of law, but simply to reach the conclusion that would effectuate the intention of the parties to the several written agreements there under consideration, without violating any established principles of law or considerations of public policy. And this court is still of opinion that a doctrine which enables the court to give effect to the intention of the parties as shown by the language of the written agreement, the circumstances attending it, and the object to be accomplished by it will be found more consonant with reason and justice than one which compels the court to defeat that intention." Here the court practically admits that it has broken away from the doctrine of the law courts established at an early date. If, in CALKINS v. PIERCE, it had not attempted to interpret English law court decisions to be in harmony with its doctrine, but had merely explained that it was permitting an equitable defense to an action at law, its position would be unassailable.

In Horner v. Den, 25 N. J. L. 106, the court adopted a line of reasoning very similar to that adopted in Doe ex dem. Warner v. Browne, supra, but the question before it was whether the instrument passed a fee simple estate terminable at the will of the grantee, or was a lease terminable whenever the lessee abandoned the manufacture of salt thereon. The instrument was formally executed and mentioned the "heirs" of the second party. It purported to "demise, grant, and to farm let" the premises "for any term of years the said John Blake [the party of the second part] may think proper from the above date." The court, although it did not so state, appeared to assume that, if taken literally, the instrument would convey a fee simple estate terminable at the will of the grantee. It said: "This is certainly an unusual limitation of the term. Literally taken, it means that the demise is for a term of years only, but that that term is to run during Blake's pleasure, as long as he thinks proper." It then rejected a literal interpretation, and held that the true meaning, as L.R.A.1915D.

gathered from the whole instrument, its purpose, and the circumstances surrounding the making thereof, was that the term was to terminate whenever the second party or his heirs should cease to devote the property to the use to which it was to be put, i. e., the manufacture of salt. Therefore, the instrument was a lease, and not a conveyance of the fee. The defendant had abandoned the manufacture of salt on the premises, and the lessor was allowed to recover in ejectment. Thus, the court apparently assumed that a lease from year to year terminable solely at the will of the lessee is an anomaly, but it construed the instrument before it so as to avoid the necessity of so holding. The case is not of much value here for the reason that the covenant not to disturb the tenant was construed away.

In People ex rel. Norton v. Gillis, 24 Wend. 201, it was held that a tenant under a lease terminable when the profits of the business conducted on the premises should pay a debt owed him by lessor could not maintain an action of forcible entry and detainer after he had been deprived of possession, if the lease was not under seal, and therefore not valid to convey a life estate. The main holding was independent of this proposition, and in that sense this holding was not necessary to dispose of the case, but the court appeared to regard this as an independent or an additional reason for its holding. The only value of this case in this connection arises out of the fact that the instrument was said to be only an agreement upon which the plaintiff might maintain an action for breach of contract.

Throughout this note the fact that the covenant was repugnant to the estate granted according to the court's interpretation of the instrument has been assumed. The question of construing the instrument so as to avoid repugnancy cannot be considered. However, as a practical proposition, it may be said that cases like Manning v. Franklin, 81 Cal. 205, 22 Pac. 550, and Husheon v. Kelley, 162 Cal. 656, 124 Pac. 231, where it was held that there was sufficient part performance to take out of the statute of frauds an oral life lease and make it valid to convey a freehold life estate, might be valuable in some cases, but even if the court had held the leases invalid the cases would not be in point here, since the statute of frauds goes to the proof of the agreement which includes the covenant. J. W. M.

by both parties. No fraud is claimed, and, relying upon the agreement, the defendant entered into possession of the premises. It is not claimed that the defendant has failed to perform her part of the agreement. In Sweetser v. McKenney, supra, the court, in discussing the same claim advanced by the plaintiff in this case, said: "We think that in any view which could be taken these plaintiffs are estopped by their agreement from maintaining this process to oust the defendant from the possession which they gave him so long as he lives up to that agreement and desires to remain." Approved in Willoughby v. Atkinson Furnishing Co. 93 Me. 189, 44 Atl. 612. Although the agreement did not convey a life estate, yet it was a valid agreement between the parties, and conveyed to the defendant an interest in the land, viz., the right of possession. It is not necessary, under our statute, that a lease of land be under seal. Rev. Stat. chap. 75, § 13; Id. chap. 96, § 10. And the plaintiff, before she can repudiate it, or avoid it as between her and the defendant, must prove that the defendant has failed, or refuses to perform her part of the contract, for the plaintiff is precluded, by her own written agreement, from asserting that the defendant dispossessed her, or refuses to turn over the premises to her, for the defendant is in possession of the premises with the consent of the plaintiff, and in possession by virtue of a contract which binds her to render valuable services to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff cannot be permitted to avoid the contract which she entered into, confessedly lawful, and not repudiated by the defendant.

There being nothing illegal in its terms, the court will not aid one party to violate it when it has been performed, or is being performed, by the other. Sweetser v. McKenney, and Kelleher v. Fong, supra.

Exceptions sustained.

Trover — conversion by sale of store-room.

To constitute a conversion of personal property of another there must be some exercise of the right of complete ownership and dominion over it, to the total exclusion of the rights of the owner, or else some act done which destroys it or changes its character, or in some way deprives the owner of it permanently or for an indefinite length of time. Conversion may be proved by demand and refusal of possession, but evidence of this is not necessary, if there is other evidence of actual conversion. Neglect of a bailee to notify the bailor of a sale of the premises, where a gratuitous bailment is kept, is not a conversion, where no loss or misappropriation follows; nor is the advertising of goods for sale through a mistake a conversion so long as there is no sale or loss or misappropriation; nor is the sale of a few articles which have in some manner become commingled with the bailor's goods a conversion of the whole stock, in the absence of evidence as to how the commingling took place.

(February 11, 1915.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for the alleged conversion of a stock of millinery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles M. Brewer and F. A. Pike for appellant.

Messrs. Todd & Kerr and Walter Fosnes, for respondents:

Where the original taking by the defendants was rightful and there is no evidence of an actual conversion, the conversion consisting merely in a wrongful detention, there can be no recovery without proof of a demand and refusal before suit.

For numerous illustrations as to what constitutes conversion, see Index to L.R.A. Notes, "Trover," § 6.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action in conversion. The court dismissed the action at the close of plaintiff's case, and plaintiff appeals. The facts are as follows:

Plaintiff's husband conducted a general store at Faribault. Plaintiff conducted a millinery business on a balcony of the store. The husband failed and transferred his stock to a representative of defendant Northwestern Jobbers' Credit Bureau, for the benefit of creditors, and the bureau took charge of the stock and building. When this occurred, plaintiff discontinued her millinery business, packed her goods in boxes, and left them in the balcony, by permission of the bureau's representative. She paid nothing for the privilege. In other words, the bureau was a gratuitous bailee. There is evidence that the representative of the bureau agreed to notify plaintiff when it disposed of the stock or put anyone else in possession. A few weeks later the husband's stock was sold to defendant Wendlandt and he was put in possession of the store. Wendlandt at once proceeded to advertise the stock for sale. Under the mistaken belief that the millinery was part of the stock he had purchased, he prepared an advertisement announcing a "trustee's sale" of the stock, and included the millinery stock in the advertisement. Before the sale commenced, he discovered his error. At no time after the sale commenced did he make any claim to the stock of millinery in the balcony. On the contrary, the evidence is undisputed that during the sale he instructed his clerks that the millinery stock belonged to plaintiff, and directed them not to touch it. There is evidence, however, that some small articles from this stock became in some manner commingled with the general stock and were sold by Wendlandt's clerks, and there is evidence that his wife took some articles from the millinery stock. There is also evidence that when an inventory of the millinery stock was taken, about a month later, the amount on hand was nearly $100 less than when inventoried at the time of closing the store. The bureau's representative did not notify plaintiff of the sale to Wendlandt, but a friend of plaintiff notified her by telephone before the trustee's sale commenced. Plaintiff went to the store a very few days later. She took no exception to any conduct of defendants; in fact, she opened negotiations for leaving the stock in the balcony and for renting the balcony from defendant Wendlandt in order to reopen her millinery business.

Plaintiff does not sue for the conversion of the few articles claimed to have been taken and sold, and she asks for no recovery on that basis. Her contention is that both these defendants converted the whole stock of millinery to their own use. The question is: Did the evidence make out a prima facie case of such conversion? We hold it did not.

It is a little difficult to frame a comprehensive definition of conversion. In Burroughes v. Bayne, 5 Hurlst. & N. 296, Baron Bramwell observed that "after all, no one can undertake to define what a conversion is." But in general it may be said that to constitute a conversion of personal property there must be some exercise of the right of complete ownership and dominion over it, to the total exclusion of the rights of the owner, or else some act done which destroys it or changes its character, or in some way deprives the owner of it permanently or for an indefinite length of time. See Hodge v. Eastern R. Co. 70 Minn. 193, 196, 72 N. W. 1074; McCurdy v. Wallblom Furniture & Carpet Co. 94 Minn. 326, 102 N. W. 873, 3 Ann. Cas. 468; Sutton v. Great Northern R. Co. 99 Minn. 376, 109 N. W. 815; Merz v. Croxen, 102 Minn. 69, 112 N. Y. 890. Conversion is often proved by a demand of possession by the owner and refusal by the person in possession to deliver. There was no demand or refusal in this case. Demand and refusal are, however, merely evidence of conversion and need not be proved when there is other evidence of conversion in fact. Kronschable v. Knoblauch, 21 Minn. 56; Kenrick v. Rogers, 26 Minn. 344, 4 N. W. 46; Homerger v. Brandenburg, 35 Minn. 401, 29 N. W. 123; Adams v. Castle, 64 Minn. 505, 67 N. W. 637; Hogan v. Atlantic Elevator Co. 66 Minn. 344, 349, 69 N. W. 1. The question is: Was there in this case other evidence of an actual conversion?

As to the defendant Northwestern Jobbers' Credit Bureau, the case is clear. There is not a single element of conversion by that defendant. It did not sell plaintiff's stock nor in any manner misappropriate it. The only delinquency claimed on its part was its failure to keep a promise to notify plaintiff that her husband's stock had been sold and the purchaser put in possession. But neglect of this sort on the part of a bailee is not conversion of goods which were in no manner misappropriated, injured, or destroyed. See McCurdy v. Wallblom Furniture & Carpet Co. 94 Minn. 326, 102 N. W. 873, 3 Ann. Cas. 468. Nor could defendant's neglect in this particular have caused plaintiff any damage, for plaintiff was advised of the transfer by a friend before the "trustee's sale" commenced.

As to defendant Wendlandt, it likewise seems to us that the evidence falls short of proof of conversion. The mistaken advertisement of goods for sale, not followed by any sale or by any exercise of dominion or ownership, is not a conversion. It has been held that even a paper sale of goods does not constitute conversion, if made by mistake, and there is no misappropriation in fact. 28 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 700; Taylor v. Horrall, 4 Blackf. 317. There is doubtless evidence of conversion of some few articles of this stock; and, if recovery were asked for the value of these, a case would be made for the jury. But it in no manner appears from the evidence how or under what circumstances these articles were taken or commingled. The conversion of a few articles out of the stock in some manner not disclosed did not constitute conversion of the whole stock which was untouched, and as to which defendant at all times expressly disclaimed ownership or dominion.

Order affirmed.

BIRDIE WINTER, Appt.,
v.
AMERICAN RADIATOR COMPANY et al.,
Respts.

(128 Minn. 508, 151 N. W. 277.)

Master and servant — parcel delivery — independent contractor.

The defendant radiator company employed a transfer company to make deliveries for it. The transfer company exercised an independent calling, routed the deliveries, took other deliveries with those of the defendant, received an agreed compensation per hundred weight, and the defendant exercised no control over it. A driver, in making a delivery, negligently left some radiators in the sidewalk space, and the plaintiff fell over them and was injured. It is held that the transfer company was an independent contractor, and the defendant is not liable on the doctrine of respondet superior.

Headnote by DIBELL, C.

Note. — The question whether one is responsible for the negligence of the driver of a vehicle owned by a third person, but performing a service for the former at the time of the injury, sometimes assumes the form whether the driver is the servant of the owner of the vehicle or of the person for whom the service is being performed, and sometimes, as in WINTER v. AMERICAN RADIATOR Co., the form whether or not the driver is a servant of an independent contractor; both forms of the question are covered in notes to Frerker v. Nicholson, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1123; Burns v. Michigan Paint Co. 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 816; Morris v. Tredo, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 33; and Ash v. Century Lumber Co. 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 973.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Ramsey County denying a new trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendant's servant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. H. A. Loughran for appellant.

Messrs. Lind, Ueland, & Jerome, for respondent Radiator Company:

Defendant Radiator Company cannot be held liable on the theory of respondet superior.

Dibell, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff fell over some radiators left on the sidewalk space and was injured. This action was brought against the defendant American Radiator Company and another, for damages sustained through such fall. The case was dismissed as to the radiator company at the close of the testimony. The plaintiff appeals from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

The American Radiator Company sold these radiators to one Stone, who as contractor was constructing a residence. It employed the Cavanaugh Transfer & Storage Company to make delivery. The method of their doing business was this: When the radiator company wished material delivered by the transfer company it telephoned it, giving the place of delivery. The transfer company routed its deliveries so as to make an economical transfer; that is, it made out a number of deliveries which a particular wagon on a particular day could economically make, and such wagon made the deliveries. The wagon took the radiators about 9 o'clock in the morning. It made a number of other deliveries coming within its route,—in all something like eight or nine. About half past 8 in the evening it reached the premises at which the radiators were to be delivered. This was the last delivery but one for the day. The driver left the radiators on the sidewalk space in front of the lot adjoining the residence being constructed. In doing this he was negligent.

The question is whether the transfer company, in making the delivery, was a servant of the defendant for whose acts it is liable under the doctrine of respondent superior, or an independent contractor for whose acts it is not liable. The defendant exercised no control over the transfer company in the doing of the work. It paid it an agreed compensation per hundred weight. It used this company and other companies. The transfer company exercised an independent calling. The arrangement between the radiator company and the transfer company is a common one. We are unable to hold that the doctrine of respondent superior applies. The case is quite unlike Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. 52 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, 55 N. W. 52, where the teamster was hired with his team and was in control of the defendant and under its special direction. The transfer company was an independent contractor, and the case comes fairly within the following cases so holding: Riedel v. Moran, Fitzsimons Co. 103 Mich. 262, 61 N. W. 509 (plaintiff, a pedestrian, struck by barrel rolled out of defendant's warehouse on sidewalk by employee of cartage company under contract with defendant to do its carting); Foster v. Wadsworth-Howland Co. 168 Ill. 514, 48 N. E. 163 (death of child on street caused by negligence of driver of teaming company delivering for the defendant at an agreed sum per week); Moore v. Stainton, 80 App. Div. 295, 80 N. Y. Supp. 244, affirmed in 177 N. Y. 581, 69 N. E. 1127 (plaintiff injured while standing on street by being struck by a truck engaged in delivering merchandise of defendant); Burns v. Michigan Paint Co. 152 Mich. 613, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 816, 116 N. W. 182 (plaintiff, a pedestrian, injured by express wagon of a licensed expressman delivering merchandise for defendant); De Forrest v. Wright, 2 Mich. 366 (plaintiff, a pedestrian, injured by negligence of licensed drayman in unloading merchandise on sidewalk, he being employed by defendants to haul merchandise from warehouse and deliver to their store); *Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Barnes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought in the district court for Douglas county to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff for his wrongful discharge from his employment as a traveling salesman of the defendant company. The plaintiff's petition was in the usual form in such cases. By defendant's answer it was alleged that plaintiff had tendered his resignation as defendant's salesman on May 21, 1910, and that defendant had accepted plaintiff's resignation; that plaintiff had been guilty of unjust criticism and insolent conduct toward his employer; that plaintiff had been guilty of using part of his time in his own private affairs. The reply was in effect a general denial. There was a trial to a jury which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $1,054.13, and the defendant has appealed.

It appears that on the 21st day of December, 1909, defendant Giblin & Company employed the plaintiff as a traveling salesman for one year, at a salary of $2,100, payable in monthly instalments of $175 per month. The contract was in writing.

The bill of exceptions discloses that in May, 1910, certain differences arose between plaintiff and defendant out of a sale made by the plaintiff to the firm of Abel & Doyle of Indianapolis, Indiana. Plaintiff had been continuously in the employ of the defendant, with the exception of one year, for the ten years preceding the written contract of December 21, 1909. It is apparent that he had been a trusted employee, and had often advised with his employers in respect to their business affairs. When the plaintiff visited the firm at Indianapolis known as Abel & Doyle, he took a certain order for furnaces, which was submitted to his employers under a blank form, and subject to their approval. The above-mentioned sale was the subject of a letter to plaintiff from defendant written May 16, 1910, which contained some very caustic criticisms of plaintiff's method of doing business. The letter contained this language: "When all is said and done, we are the ones who are paying your salary and expenses, and we can only do so out of the profit we make on the goods we sell, and your inclinations are very strongly in the way of giving to customers everything possible that you can give them. . . . We wish you would bear this carefully in mind, and before making concessions to customers, find out what we think about the matter before making these concessions. This refers particularly to what you have done for Haines and also what you have done for Abel & Doyle. During the past year we have sold Abel & Doyle our 7 series furnaces on exactly the same terms we sold the other furnaces, and never had any complaint about it, nor any suggestions that we should do any differently. We find that you have given them 5 per cent additional on the 8 series furnaces, and believe this 5 per cent was given to them without any need whatever, and is just so much thrown away. . . . We certainly are not at all pleased that you go to old customers and reduce prices to them, which we consider wholly unnecessary, and it leads us to believe that it might be better not to have sent you there at all. . . . On the order you have sent in, the difference is $63.19, an wholly unnecessary allowance."

When plaintiff received this letter, which seemed to reflect both on his ability as a salesman and his integrity, he wrote to his employers with respect thereto. The letter was written on May 20th, and among other things contained the following statement:

swung them over to the 8 series, so that they will handle that instead of the 4 series, which they declared they would not handle more than to carry the sample at the old price. Now, by handling this in the way I did, they will use the 8 series, and at a price which is an advance on same size furnaces and the same size fire pots, with the same amount of iron, of about 7½ per cent over last year's price."

The letter also contained the following: "After getting this much of an advance on this contract and handling it in this way, you tell me in your letter that I deliberately cut the price and am not working to your interest. Any such thought or idea of my deliberately cutting the price and not working to your interest is as far from the truth as you are to-day from Halley's Comet, and if there has ever been any deal made or transaction by me since I have been in your employ in which your interest has not been fully considered to the best of my judgment, it has been because my judgment has not been good, and not because my intentions were wrong.

. . . While I have a contract with you yet for the balance of this year, I should feel guilty to accept the salary and have you feel as you intimate in this letter that you do feel, and if you have any such feeling, I would be glad to have you accept my resignation, and I will remain here until I hear from you, for I do not feel that I could go to Minneapolis and put up the fight that is necessary—or any other place—in the interest of your business, with any such insinuation resting against me as I infer from your letter."

It will be observed that this letter contains an offer to resign, coupled with the condition, however, that the writer will remain where he is until he receives a reply. The defendant did not answer this letter. In a few days the plaintiff went to Minneapolis and transacted business there for the defendant in the way of an adjustment of some former sales, and while there again wrote to the defendant. Meanwhile no intimation was made by the defendant that it intended to accept the plaintiff's conditional offer to resign, but defendant wrote again finding fault with plaintiff's sales at Indianapolis. Without quoting from these letters, it is sufficient to say that they contained repeated faultfindings with plaintiff's conduct, and also were full of criticisms and somewhat insolent statements. On May 29th, the plaintiff wrote the defendant as follows: "I wish to say in the above paragraph you have assumed and said things that have not been proven, cannot be proven, and while I have no money to give away to anyone, I will send you a check at any time for $100 if you can prove the above assertion, that they (meaning Abel & Doyle) intended to use all along the 8 series. . . . You say farther along in your letter, on page 3 of same, they had no intention of ordering 4 series furnaces, and would not have done so in any case. They intended ordering just what they did order and they got from me $57.93 better price than they would have been willing to pay, and it was this action of which you complained. If this statement is true, as above stated, then what I have said to you is not true, and I will not rest under the above accusation from you or anyone else. Unless I hear from you immediately on receipt of this letter, retracting the above statements, which I defy you or anyone else to prove, as soon as I am finished up with the transactions here in connection with the Gilmore deal, I will leave immediately for Indianapolis, Indiana, and procure affidavits substantiating my statements to you."

On June 4th defendant telegraphed to plaintiff that no answer would be given to his letter. The plaintiff then went to Indianapolis and procured some affidavits respecting the matter and forwarded the same to his employers. In pursuance of his employers' business, Mr. Nesbit went to Minneapolis and settled an old and complicated deal whereby he collected some $900 for his employers. It appears that plaintiff's wife had been ill and in the hospital since November, and in June he wrote to his employers to the effect that he wished to take his wife home, and it would be necessary to use one or two days in his affairs at Omaha in straightening out the house so his wife could live in it. The plaintiff returned to Omaha about June 8th, and with the exception of a day in straightening up his affairs he was engaged in his employers' business, taking an order at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and likewise one at Onawa, which were sent to the defendant, who on June 20th wrote the plaintiff as follows: "In a letter addressed to us from Milwaukee dated May 21st you tendered your resignation. We write you to say that we hereby accept this resignation to take effect immediately. Please send to us at once, all books, letters of introduction, etc., belonging to us, and send statement of your expense account to date."

To this letter plaintiff replied as follows:

"Answering your letter of June 20th in reference to my letter from Milwaukee on May 20th in reference to my tending my resignation at that time, I did so, and would have been very much pleased to have had L.R.A.1915D.

you accept it at that time, which I asked you to do, and said I would remain in Milwaukee until I heard from you. In your answer you did not accept my resignation. I therefore kept on at work. I would say at this time that conditions have changed and the opportunities I had at that time have been lost, and under the present conditions I am still in your employ, working under contract of 1910, and am waiting here for your directions as to route, also expense money."

To this letter defendant replied on June 24th as follows: "Answering yours of June 22d, your resignation was presented to us and accepted and your services with us are ended. . . . We have to-day inserted a notice in the Trade Papers, stating that you are no longer in our employment," etc.

It will thus be observed that the basis for the discharge of plaintiff in both of defendant's letters was that they had accepted his offer to resign on May 20th. Notwithstanding this claim, defendant wrote to plaintiff on June 6th in relation to some advertising matter, and their letter contains the following: "We intend following up these with issues at frequent intervals until November, and will forward them to you as issued. You will probably run across them in the hands of some of the dealers you visit. We will keep you fully informed in regard to all inquiries in your territory so that you may follow them up closely and get sample orders."

This letter was written two weeks after the plaintiff made his conditional offer to resign, and it thus appears that defendant had no intention to accept his conditional offer of resignation, but on the contrary expected him to continue his work. Whether the plaintiff acted prudently or wisely in the matter of the contract with Abel & Doyle was not in issue in this case. He felt aggrieved at the caustic criticisms of his employers, and wrote them that he was willing to tender his resignation, as he did not wish to continue in their service if they felt toward him as their letters seemed to indicate. Their answer to his letter clearly intimated that they would expect him to continue in their employ, and their telegram to the effect that no answer would be given to his letter informing them of his intended trip to Indianapolis implied that they did not object to his making that trip. The matter, however, is of minor importance, because the affidavits which he obtained in Indianapolis were forwarded to the defendants and they did not write to him concerning it, and made no criticism in relation to it. When they discharged the plaintiff some two weeks later they made no reference to the affidavits or his conduct in that matter, but based the reason for his discharge specifically upon the ground that they had accepted his resignation, which had been tendered more than thirty days before. Having thus assigned a reason for the plaintiff's discharge, the defendant should not be now heard to urge any other or different reason.

Upon the testimony which has been partially set forth in the opinion the cause was submitted to the jury, and the defendant contends that the court erred in instruction No. 6, given to the jury on his own motion. The instruction complained of reads as follows: "You are instructed the letter written by the plaintiff on the 20th or 21st day of May, 1910, was not of itself a letter of resignation, but was what might be termed in law a conditional resignation, and by the terms and conditions of said letter the defendants had the right to accept or reject the said resignation on or before the time fixed by the said letter of said date. And in this connection you are further instructed the defendants did not comply with the terms and conditions of said letter on that date, and as a matter of law, had no right to accept said resignation at a later time than that fixed by the terms and conditions of said letter, unless you find from a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was guilty of misconduct toward the defendants subsequent to the time he left Milwaukee for Minneapolis, or unless you further find that the defendants had discovered other misconduct of the plaintiff that occurred prior to the time they answered the letter written by the plaintiff at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, dated on the 20th or 21st day of May, 1910."

We think this instruction correctly stated the law. There was no conflict in the evidence, and, as we view the letters which passed between plaintiff and defendant, plaintiff's conditional letter of resignation was not accepted by the defendant; but plaintiff was deliberately continued in his employment for practically thirty days after he wrote the letter of May 21, 1910.

It is next contended that the court erred in refusing to give instruction No. 6, requested by the defendant, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that in his letter of May 21st the plaintiff tendered his resignation to the defendants, and that, unless you find that said resignation had been withdrawn prior to the 20th day of June, the defendants had the right to accept said resignation, and that, after such acceptance, said resignation could not be withdrawn."

We think the court was justified in refusing this instruction, as it does not accord with the facts, and is not applicable to L.R.A.1915D.

the evidence contained in the record. Numerous other errors are assigned in giving and refusing instructions. We have examined the instructions given and refused, and find the same to be without reversible error.

It is contended that the defendant was justified in discharging the plaintiff because he was guilty of disrespectful conduct towards his employer; that plaintiff was a man of superior ability and education; and that his conduct towards his employer was neither due to inadvertence nor ignorance, and therefore the defendant was justified in discharging him from its service.

A careful examination of the correspondence discloses that the plaintiff treated the defendant in all of the letters written by him with reasonable courtesy and consideration. We find nothing in plaintiff's conduct which would justify the defendant in discharging him. It appears from the testimony that plaintiff, from the time he was discharged until the latter part of December, 1910, was unable to find profitable employment, and therefore the amount of the verdict is not excessive. In fact no serious complaint of that kind is made by the appellant.

As we view the record, the defendant had a fair trial, and, finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

JOHN F. YAWGER, Receiver of Metropolitan Surety Company, Respt.,
v.

AMERICAN SURETY COMPANY, Appt.

(212 N. Y. 292, 106 N. E. 64.)

Bond — treasurer — accounting for bank deposit.

1. A town treasurer who, upon re-election to office, continues a deposit account of the town's money in a bank so insolvent that it

Note. — Right of reimbursement or contribution as between sureties of official for different terms.

The court in YAWGER v. AMERICAN SURETY Co. seems not to have used the term "contribution" in its strict sense as applied in the law of suretyship, at least, the surety for the first term was held liable to the extent that the moneys were lost cannot pay the amount, does not, although he is ignorant of the true conditions, account for it within the meaning of his official bond satisfying its obligation in case of such accounting, so as to relieve the surety from liability in case the account is lost because of the bank's insolvency.

Contribution — official bonds — successive terms.

2. A surety on the bond of a town treasurer for a second term who is compelled to make good money lost through a deposit in an insolvent bank during the first term may compel contribution from the surety on the bond covering such term.

(July 14, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, reversing an interlocutory judgment of a Special Term, Part VII., for New York County, in his favor, and overruling a demurrer to the complaint filed to compel contribution from during the first term. It is apparent that this is not contribution, but a recovery of money by the surety for a succeeding term against the surety for a prior term, which the succeeding surety has been called upon to pay, and which is equitably owing from the first surety. If the succeeding surety were entitled to contribution, this amount of loss would be divided between the sureties; the succeeding surety would not be entitled to recover the entire amount.

The distinction between contribution and an equitable right to recover money under such circumstance is clearly stated in Boone County v. Jones, 58 Iowa, 373, 12 N. W. 313, where a surety on the bond of a public officer against whom a judgment had been obtained by the county of which the principal was an official was held not entitled to contribution from a surety for a preceding term of the officer. The court states: "The appellant claims the true doctrine 'to be, that when a surety pays the debt of a principal he may compel his co-sureties to contribute, and if the creditor has other securities out of which the debt can be made, then the surety paying the debt will have the right to full substitution and reimbursement.' Conceding this to be so, it is evident the latter part of the proposition depends upon the question whether the right to contribution exists; and that depends on the further question, whether the person demanding contribution is a co-surety with the person on whom the demand is made. Several persons may be sureties for another to the same creditor, and yet not be co-sureties. It may not be essential they should be bound by the same instrument, but they must be sureties bound for the performance of the same thing. The defendants were only bound for the performance by Jones of the duties incumbent on him for a period extending from the execution of the bond signed by them until the L.R.A.1915D.

the surety company on an official bond. Affirmed.

The question certified was as follows:

Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?

The facts, so far as material, are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Carl Ehlermann, Jr., for appellant:

The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action because the bond of the first-year surety and the bond of the second-year surety cover separate years and separate obligations, and, therefore, no matter when the loss occurred, the two sureties are not co-sureties.

United States v. Irving, 1 How. 250, 11 L. ed. 120; Meyers v. Llock, 120 U. S. 206, 30 L. ed. 642, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525; Farrar v. United States, 5 Pet. 373; 8 L. ed. 159.

The complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action because it appears conclusively that the 18th day of September, 1876, and the liability of the appellant began when that of defendants ceased. Suppose the county had recovered of the defendants for defalcation which occurred during the first named period,—could they have compelled appellant to contribute in payment of the judgment on the ground he was a co-surety with them? Clearly not, because the appellant never bound himself or became responsible for such defalcation. The converse of this proposition must be true, and that is, if there was a defalcation after the 18th day of September, 1876, the appellant could not require the defendants to contribute to the payment of such defalcation. Therefore the defendants and appellant are not co-sureties entitled to contribution. It is urged the demurrer admits the defalcation occurred prior to September, 1876, but this fact has no bearing whatever on the question of contribution. Conceding the admission to have full force and effect, it amounts to this: that the appellant has paid or been compelled to pay the debt of the defendants because a judgment has been rendered against him therefor. Now, as we have seen, the appellant is not entitled to contribution. Is he entitled to recover because he has paid the debt of another under the circumstances stated in the pleadings? This question has not been presented by counsel for the appellant. There is some doubt whether such a case would come within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. But whether this is so or not, we do not feel called upon to determine the question suggested."

Trustees of Schools*, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 131, and see also note to Pine County v. Willard, 1 L.R.A. 118, on the liability of sureties for a second term for delinquencies of the first term.

The American Surety Company and the Metropolitan Surety Company are cosureties in reference to the amount of the loss occurring during Grisco's first term of office.

Morley v. Metamora, 78 Ill. 394, 20 Am. Rep. 266.

The complaint clearly shows a breach under the bond of the American Surety Company, and sets forth a good cause of action in favor of the town of Cicero against the American Surety Company on its bond, which bond and cause of action have been assigned to the plaintiff herein.

Schram v. Werner, 85 Hun, 293, 32 N. Y. Supp. 995; Kolb v. National Surety Co. 176 N. Y. 233, 68 N. E. 247.

Cardozo, J., delivered the opinion of the the court:

This case comes here on a demurrer to the complaint. One Grisco was the supervisor, and ex officio the treasurer, of the town of Cicero, in Illinois. He was elected for the first time on April 4, 1905, for the term of one year, and until the election and qualification of a successor. By the town charter, the treasurer is required to receive and hold the town's moneys; and to give a bond in a form prescribed by law. It is also declared to be his duty "to keep a correct account of all moneys received and paid out by him, and when required to furnish to the board a statement of the moneys in his hands." Following Grisco's election in April, 1905, the defendant, American Surety Company, became surety for him in the sum of $100,000. The bond is dated April 25, 1905; it recites that he was elected supervisor on April 4, 1905, for the period of one year, and its condition reads as follows: "Now, therefore, if the said Louis Grisco shall faithfully account for all moneys that may come into his hands, as such supervisor, and pay over the same pursuant to the provisions of law or the order or resolution of the board of trustees of the town of Cicero, and shall faithfully perform the duties of his office to the best of his skill and abilities, then this obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

Grisco's first term expired on April 4, 1906, and he was then re-elected for another year. On April 16, 1906, he gave another bond similar in form to the first one, with the exception that the surety on the second bond was the Metropolitan Surety Company, and not the defendant.

Between April 4, 1905, and April 16, 1906, Grisco deposited in the Lincoln Bank in Cicero moneys belonging to the town amounting in the aggregate to $44,191.39. He drew from the bank during that period only $2,661.61, and these withdrawals were all made in May, 1905, the second month of his term. On April 16, 1906, when he qualified for his second term, the amount supposed to be on deposit in the bank was $41,529.78. Between April 16, 1906, and December of the same year he made additional deposits of $12,061.13, and during the same period drew from the bank only $100. There was thus a final balance for the two years of $53,490.91.

On December 17, 1906, the Lincoln Bank was adjudged a bankrupt. In reality, it had been insolvent for a long time. It was insolvent on April 16, 1906, when the Metropolitan Surety Company signed a bond for the second term. The allegation is that Grisco "did not then nor thereafter withdraw from the said Lincoln Bank any of the aforesaid balance of $41,529.78 which he had on deposit . . . at the conclusion of his previous term of office, . . . nor could the said balance have been withdrawn on account of the insolvency of said private banking institution as herein set forth." The allegation also is that he "did not and could not, on account of the aforesaid insolvency of the said private banking institution," pay over the said balance to himself as supervisor and treasurer. When Grisco's second term expired in April, 1907, demand was made by his successor for the payment of $53,490.91, but he "failed and neglected," so the complaint alleges, "to account for said $53,490.91 to the town of Cicero, and failed to pay over the said sum to his successor, . . . as required by law." The town of Cicero then sued the Metropolitan Surety Company for $53,490.91, with interest. Included in this claim was the $41,529.78, deposited in the first term. The action was tried in Illinois, and after an appeal had been carried to the highest court of that state, the Metropolitan Surety Company, in obedience to the judgment of the court, paid to the town of Cicero $58,000. It thereupon received an assignment of the town's rights against the defendant, the American Surety Company, by reason of the latter's bond. On this state of facts the plaintiff, as receiver of the Metropolitan Surety Company, claims that the loss sustained during the first term should be borne by the two surety companies, and he brings this action to enforce an equitable contribution.

It is urged for the defendant that there has been no default under the first bond. It is insisted that Grisco fulfilled the condition of the bond when, acting as his own successor, he continued the account in the Lincoln Bank during his second term, and that thereafter the sole liability, not only for later deposits, but also for those made during the first term, devolved upon the second surety. We do not share that view. We think that to the extent of the loss suffered during the first term the defendant, as well as the second surety, was liable to the town, and that the second surety, having discharged a debt for which the defendant was equally bound, is entitled, through the remedy of contribution, to enforce an equitable division. Barnes v. Cushing, 168 N. Y. 542, 61 N. E. 902. This must be so unless it can be said that Grisco has already satisfied the condition of the defendant's bond. We do not think he has. In our view he has neither accounted for the moneys that came into his hands during his first term, nor paid them over pursuant to law.

It is important to bear in mind the nature of a public officer's liability for public moneys received by virtue of his office. His liability does not grow out of negligence. It is absolute, admitting of no excuse, except perhaps the act of God or the public enemy. Tillinghast v. Merrill, 151 N. Y. 135, 142, 34 L.R.A. 673, 56 Am. St. Rep. 612, 45 N. E. 375; Smythe v. United States, 188 U. S. 156, 47 L. ed. 425, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 279. If he puts the money in a safe and burglars break open the safe and steal the money, he is liable. If he puts it in a bank, and the bank loses it, he is liable. The allegation in this complaint is, in substance, that the Lincoln Bank lost the money, and lost it during the first term. At the end of that term it was no longer money in Grisco's hands; it was no longer money in bank; it was merely a fictitious and misleading entry on a balance sheet. In these circumstances it is impossible to hold that Grisco accounted for the money by keeping his books as if he still held it. The L.R.A.1915D.

fact is that he had already lost it, and he has never put it back. He may have been innocent of any wilful wrong, but that does not absolve him. He may have been ignorant of the loss, but that again does not absolve him. He did not account for the money by innocently carrying forward a fictitious balance any more than he would have accounted for it by carrying forward such a balance with guilty knowledge. It might as well be said that, if he had put the money in a vault, and the vault was robbed without his knowledge, he could have discharged his first surety by reporting to the second surety that the money was intact. Before the first term was ended, the money had been lost, and something more than mere words was needed to restore it.

We do not mean to say that the plaintiff would establish a loss of the money during the first term by proof that the liabilities of the bank to all its depositors were in excess of its assets. That would not make out a present loss to this particular depositor. If the bank, though insolvent, was continuously engaged in business, responding to all demands, so that a check for the town's deposit would have been honored, the loss was not yet complete. But the allegations of the complaint show more than a deficit of aggregate assets as compared with aggregate liabilities. They show that by April, 1906, the deficit had progressed so far that the balance due to the town could not have been paid. This suffices, we think, to show that part at least of the loss had been then sustained. The form of the allegation is criticized, but we think it is proof against demurrer. The suggestion is made that, even though the treasurer was unable to draw out the entire balance, he might, for all the complaint shows, have drawn out part of it. That is something which bears not so much on the right of recovery as on its extent. If the plaintiff has a right to recover anything, the complaint states a cause of action. The measure of the loss may be litigated hereafter.

It is argued, however, that if the first surety was liable to the town for the deposits lost during the first term, the second surety, on a proper construction of its bond, was not, and that without identity of liability between sureties the right to contribution fails. We think this argument as applied to the case at bar is without force. The second surety in paying this loss was not a volunteer. It resisted the town's suit and did not pay till its liability was adjudged. Cicero v. Griako, 240 Ill. 220, 88 N. E. 478. The adjudication seems to be in accord with the settled rule in Illinois. Morley v. Metamora, 78 Ill. 394, 20 Am. Rep. 266; Cowden v. Trustees of Schools, 235 Ill. 604, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 131, 126 Am. St. Rep. 244, 85 N. E. 924. At all events, the second surety, having discharged the defendant's liability not officiously, but under compulsion of law, has brought itself within the reason and the equity of the rule of contribution. Aspinwall v. Sacchi, 57 N. Y. 331; Pease v. Egan, 131 N. Y. 262, 273, 30 N. E. 102.

Our conclusion therefore, is that the town treasurer did not account for the town's moneys and pay them over to his successor by taking office a second time and giving a new bond, and that to the extent that the moneys were lost during the first term the defendant continued liable.

The order should be affirmed, with costs, and the question certified answered in the affirmative.

tain a suit in equity to determine the result of an election at which the question was submitted to the voters whether or not a constitutional convention should be held.

(October 23, 1914.)

APPEAL by petitioner from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a Special Term, Part I., for New York County, denying an injunction to restrain defendants from taking steps preliminary to the nomination and election of delegates to a constitutional convention. Affirmed.

The questions certified to the court were as follows:

First. Is chapter 819 of the Laws of 1913, entitled, "An Act to Provide for Submitting to the People the Question, 'Shall There Be a Convention to Revise the Constitution and Amend the Same?' and to Provide for Such Convention, if a Majority of the Electors Shall Decide That Such Convention Be Held," constitutional?

Second. Was the special election held under chapter 819 of the Laws of 1913, on the first Tuesday of April, 1914, a valid election?

Third. In calculating the total number of electors voting upon the question of holding a constitutional convention, submitted pursuant to § 2 of article 14 of the Constitution and chapter 819 of the Laws of 1913, and in determining whether a majority of the electors voting thereon have decided in favor of a convention, should the electors voting blank and void ballots, or either, be included?

Fourth. Has the supreme court of the state of New York jurisdiction in equity to grant to the plaintiff an injunction against the defendants, as prayed for in the amended complaint herein?

Fifth. Does § 605 of the Code of Civil Procedure preclude the supreme court, sitting in the first judicial district, from issuing an injunction against the secretary of state for the relief prayed for in the amended complaint herein?

Sixth. Is § 605 of the Code of Civil Procedure constitutional in so far as it may be construed to preclude the supreme court, sitting in a department other than that in which the secretary of state is located or is required to perform duties imposed upon him by the election law, from enjoining him as prayed for in the amended complaint herein?

Seventh. Does the court have jurisdiction of the subject of the action?

Eighth. Does the court have jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants?

Ninth. Does the complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?

The material facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Louis Marshall, Mansfield Ferry, and Albert S. Bard, for appellant:

Plaintiff, as an elector and taxpayer, has the right to maintain this action, to restrain the holding of an election for delegates to the Constitutional Convention, because of the invalidity of the election held in April, 1914, and because of the fact that a majority of the lawful votes cast thereat did not decide the question submitted in the affirmative, there being no adequate remedy at law to determine the validity of the election.

Although § 2 of article XIV. and § 1 of article VI., of the New York Constitution, do not in so many words confer a cause of action upon the plaintiff for the relief now sought, the necessary implication from those provisions is, that such a remedy exists in order to effectuate their plain intentment.

Mr. J. Hampden Dougherty also amicus curiæ.

Chase, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by an individual against the persons constituting the board of elections and custodians of primary records in each of the 62 counties of the state, and against Mitchell May, as secretary of state, for an injunction to restrain the boards of elections and the election officials of the state from taking steps preliminary to the nomination and election of delegates to a constitutional convention. In his complaint he alleges that he is a citizen, resident elector, and taxpayer of the city and county of New York.

An application was made in the action for an injunction pendente lite. That application was denied at special term, and the order denying such motion has been affirmed by the appellate division of the supreme court.

The Constitution provides (art. 14, § 2): "At the general election to be held in the year 1916, and every twentieth year thereafter, and also at such times as the legislature may by law provide, the question, 'shall there be a convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?" shall be decided by the electors of the state; and in case a majority of the electors voting thereon shall decide in favor of a convention for such purpose, the electors of every senate district of the state, as then organized, shall elect three delegates at the next ensuing general election at which members of the assembly shall be chosen, and the electors of the state voting at the same election shall elect fifteen delegates at large. . . . Any proposed Constitution or constitutional amendment which shall have been adopted by such convention, shall be submitted to a vote of the electors of the state at the time and in the manner provided by such convention, at an election which shall be held not less than six weeks after the adjournment of such convention. Upon the approval of such Constitution or constitutional amendments, in the manner provided in the last receding section, such Constitution or constitutional amendment, shall go into effect on the first day of January next after such approval."

The legislature of the state in December, 1913, passed an act which became chapter 819 of the Laws of 1913, which provided: "Section 1. A special election shall be held throughout the state on the first Tuesday in April, in the year 1914, at which there shall be submitted to the electors of the state to be decided by them the question, 'Shall there be a convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?' Every person qualified at that time to vote for members of the legislature may vote upon such question at the special election hereby appointed to be held. Such question shall be submitted in the manner provided by law for the submission of constitutional amendments. Such election shall be conducted by the same officers and in the same manner, and ballots, booths and election supplies furnished therefor, as a special election called by the governor, except as otherwise provided herein. . . . Inspectors of election of the various election districts shall meet in their respective districts at the place designated therefor, on the second Saturday preceding such election, from 8 o'clock in the forenoon to 10 o'clock in the evening, for the purpose of revising and correcting the register of voters in the manner provided by the election law for ascertaining electors qualified to vote at a special election. If a majority of the electors voting on such question are shown to have voted in the affirmative upon such question, as shall appear from the returns of county boards of canvassers to the state board of canvassers and by its canvass of such returns, such convention shall be held and shall be deemed duly called thereby, L.R.A.1915D.

and delegates therefor shall be elected as provided in § 2 of article 14 of the Constitution."

Pursuant to said act a special election was held April 7, 1914, and as appears from the returns of the county boards of canvassers to the state board of canvassers and by its canvass of such returns, a majority of the electors voting on the question, "Shall there be a convention to revise the Constitution and amend the same?" voted in the affirmative.

The plaintiff alleges that the act of 1913 is unconstitutional and void: (1) Because it permits of a special election to answer said question without providing for the registration of voters to vote thereat, as required by the Constitution; (2) that a majority of the electors voting on such question did not vote in the affirmative.

It plainly appears from the record that this action was brought upon the theory that the legislature had expressly provided therefor by the well-known taxpayers' acts. Section 1925 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "An action to obtain a judgment, preventing waste of, or injury to, the estate, funds, or other property of a county, town, city, or incorporated village of the state, may be maintained against any officer thereof, or any agent, commissioner, or other person, acting in its behalf, either by a citizen, resident therein, or by a corporation who is assessed for and is liable to pay, or, within one year before the commencement of the action, has paid, a tax therein. This section does not affect any right of action in favor of a county, city, town, or incorporated village, or any public officer."

The general municipal law (Consol. Laws, chap. 24, § 51) provides as follows: "All officers, agents, commissioners and other persons acting, or who have acted, for and on behalf of any county, town, village or municipal corporation in this state, and each and every one of them, may be prosecuted, and an action may be maintained against them to prevent any illegal official act on the part of any such officers, agents, commissioners or other persons, or to prevent waste or injury to, or to restore and make good, any property, funds or estate of such county, town, village or municipal corporation by any person or corporation whose assessment, or by any number of persons or corporations, jointly, the sum of whose assessments shall amount to 1,000 dollars, and who shall be liable to pay taxes on such assessment in the county, town, village or municipal corporation to prevent the waste or injury of whose property the action is brought, or who have been assessed or paid taxes therein upon any assessment of the above named amount within one year previous to the commencement of any such action. . . ."

Under the statutes quoted a plaintiff to maintain an action is not bound to show that he has suffered or is in danger of suffering an injury that is personal and peculiar to himself. The right of action is given to one who has paid a tax within one year, or is assessed and liable to pay a tax, and he maintains it for the purposes provided by the statutes. The right rests upon the statute, and not upon the interest of the plaintiff in the subject-matter in common with all other taxpayers.

That the action cannot be maintained against the defendants in this action under either statute has been conclusively determined by Re Reynolds, 202 N. Y. 430, 440, 96 N. E. 87, 88. Several appeals were considered, and they were all determined as stated in the opinion written under the general heading of Matter of Reynolds. In the second of the cases there considered a taxpayer had brought an action to enjoin the defendants, constituting the board of elections of the city of New York, from holding the primaries of the respective political parties and the general election in conformity with the apportionment act of 1907 upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional. The court held that an injunction was properly denied, and answered in the negative a certified question, which was as follows: "Can a taxpayer maintain an action to enjoin the board of elections of the city of New York from expending the money of said city necessary to hold a primary and general election for the year 1911 in the several senate and assembly districts in said city as organized under chapter 727, Laws of 1907, on the ground that said act is unconstitutional?"

The court says: "We are of opinion that neither § 1925 of the code, nor § 51 of the general municipal law authorizes the maintenance of this action. The first statute provides that an action may be maintained 'to obtain a judgment, preventing waste of, or injury to, the estate, funds, or other property of a county, town, city or incorporated village of the state . . . against any officer thereof, or any agent, commissioner, or other person, acting in its behalf.' The second statute provides that 'all officers, agents, commissioners and other persons acting, or who have acted, for or on behalf of any county, town, village or municipal corporation in this state, and each and every one of them, may be prosecuted, and an action may be maintained against them to prevent any illegal official act on the part of any such officers, L.R.A.1915D.

agents, commissioners or other persons, or to prevent waste or injury to, or to restore and make good, any property, funds or estate of such county, town, village or municipal corporation.' To bring the case within either statute the act sought to be enjoined should in some manner affect the estate, funds, or property rights of the municipality. The Code provision expressly limits the action to that purpose. The municipal law authorizes the maintenance of an action to prevent 'any illegal official act on the part of any such officers, agents, commissioners or other persons.' But who are the officers whose illegal acts may be restrained? Only those 'acting or who have acted for or on behalf of' the municipal corporation. The defendants, the city board of elections, doubtless are local officers, but no relation of principal and agent, or of master and servant, exists between them and the city. Maxmillian v. New York, 62 N. Y. 160, 20 Am. Rep. 468; Ham v. New York, 70 N. Y. 459; New York & B. Saw-mill & Lumber Co. v. Brooklyn, 71 N. Y. 580. They did not act on behalf of the municipal corporation, but for the public in the control and direction of the machinery of the general elections of the state."

The principle involved in the Reynolds Case was unanimously approved in Albany County v. Hooker, 204 N. Y. 1, 97 N. E. 403, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 663, and in the concurring opinion it is said: "The taxpayers' act (originally Laws of 1872, chap. 161, now Code Civ. Proc. § 1925, and general municipal law, § 51) authorizes such actions against only municipal corporations and their officers, not against state officers. Hence an action to restrain the expenditure of state moneys on the highways mentioned in the complaint, if such expenditure is illegal, can be brought by the people of the state alone." p. 19.

There is no other statute expressly permitting an individual taxpayer to sustain an action to test the constitutionality of an act of the legislature without showing that his civil or property rights are specially and particularly affected and in which he demands and is entitled to relief based upon his rights.

The fact that the Constitution makes express provision for a review by the supreme court of an act of the legislature apportioning the state into districts, at the suit of any citizen, and refrains from providing for such a review in other cases, is of itself evidence that it was not the intention of the people by the Constitution to confer upon the judicial branch of government general authority at the suit of a citizen, as such, to sit in review of the acts of other branches of government.

The Constitution provides how future constitutional conventions can be called, but it does not provide that the courts, even when moved so to do by one of the body of citizens, shall supervise the action of the legislature or of the people, and thus see to it that it or they obey its mandates in attempting to carry out its provisions.

It is claimed by the appellant that the action can be maintained to determine the constitutionality of the act of 1913, because of inherent power in the court to pass upon acts of the legislative branch of government. We are of the opinion that there is no inherent power in a court of equity to set aside a statute as unconstitutional except in a controversy between litigants where it is sought to enforce rights, or to enjoin, redress, or punish wrongs affecting the individual life, liberty, or property of one or more of the litigants. The court has no inherent power to right a wrong unless thereby the civil, property, or personal rights of the plaintiff in the action or the petitioner in the proceeding are affected.

The rights to be affected must be personal as distinguished from the rights in common with the great body of people. Jurisdiction has never been directly conferred upon the courts to supervise the acts of other departments of government. The jurisdiction to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional arises because it is the province and duty of the judicial department of government to declare the law in the determination of the individual rights of the parties.

The assumption of jurisdiction in any other case would be an interference by one department of government with another department of government when each is equally independent within the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution itself. Re Guden, 171 N. Y. 529, 84 N. E. 451.

Jurisdiction, being the power to hear and determine, is not given to the courts as guardians of the rights of the people generally against illegal acts of the executive or legislative branches of government. When a controversy arises between litigants, in which controversy the Constitution and an act of the legislature are each invoked and they are in conflict, it is necessary to follow the Constitution, which is the supreme law, and ignore the act of the legislature, and thus incidentally and necessarily the courts pass upon an act of a co-ordinate and independent department of government. That is the extent of the power of the judiciary over the legislative branch of government.

duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. So if a law be in opposition to the Constitution; in both the law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the Constitution, or conformably to the Constitution, disregarding the law—the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is of the very essence of judicial duty."

Justice Gray in Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 210, 31 L. ed. 402, 405, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482, 489, says: "The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity, unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property."

In Green v. Mills, 30 L.R.A. 90, 16 C. C. A. 516, 26 U. S. App. 383, 69 Fed. 852, Circuit Justice Fuller, speaking for the circuit court of appeals, says: "It is well settled that a court of chancery is conversant only with matters of property and the maintenance of civil rights. The court has no jurisdiction in matters of a political nature, nor to interfere with the duties of any department of government, unless under special circumstances, and when necessary to the protection of rights of property, nor in matters merely criminal, or merely immoral, which do not affect any right of property. Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 31 L. ed. 402, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482; Luther v. Borden, 7 How. 1, 12 L. ed. 581; Mississippi v. Johnson, 4 Wall. 475, 18 L. ed. 437; Georgia v. Stanton, 6 Wall. 50, 18 L. ed. 721; Holmes v. Oldham, 1 Hughes, 76, Fed. Cas. No. 6,643. Neither the legislative nor the executive department, said Chief Justice Chase, in Mississippi v. Johnson, 'can be restrained in its action by the judicial department, though the acts of both, when performed, are, in proper cases, subject to its cognizance.' 'The office and jurisdiction of a court of equity,' said Mr. Justice Gray in Re Sawyer, 'unless enlarged by express statute, are limited to the protection of rights of property.' To assume jurisdiction to control the exercise of political powers, or to protect the purely political rights of individuals, would be to invade the domain of other departments of governments or of the courts of common law. Similar views have been repeatedly expressed by state tribunals of high authority. Thus in Fletcher v. Tuttle, 151 Ill. 41, 25 L.R.A. 143, 42 Am. St. Rep. 220, 37 N. E. 683, the supreme court of Illinois says: 'The question, then, is whether the assertion and protection of political rights, as judicial power is apportioned in this state between courts of law and courts of chancery, are a proper matter of chancery jurisdiction. We would not be understood as holding that political rights are not a matter of judicial solicitude and protection, and that the appropriate judicial tribunal will not, in proper cases, give them prompt and efficient protection, but we think they do not come within the proper cognizance of courts of equity."

More recently and in Muskrat v. United States, 219 U. S. 346, 357, 55 L. ed. 246, 250, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 250, 254, the court says: "Whenever the claim of a party under the Constitution, laws, or treaties of the United States takes such a form that the judicial power is capable of acting upon it, then it has become a case. The term implies the existence of present or possible adverse parties whose contentions are submitted to the court for adjudication. . . . Whenever, in pursuance of an honest and actual antagonistic assertion of rights by one individual against another, there is presented a question involving the validity of any act of any legislature, state or Federal, and the decision necessarily rests on the competency of the legislature to so enact, the court must, in the exercise of its solemn duties, determine whether the act be constitutional or not; but such an exercise of power is the ultimate and supreme function of courts. It is legitimate only in the last resort, and as a necessity in the determination of real, earnest, and vital controversy between individuals. It never was the thought that, by means of a friendly suit, a party beaten in the legislature could transfer to the courts an inquiry as to the constitutionality of the legislative act."

The clear weight of authority in this state is against the alleged power and authority of the courts to pass upon the constitutionality of a statute except in an action or proceeding in behalf of a person whose special, peculiar personal rights are affected thereby. The question was before the court and the authorities prior to that time considered in Doolittle v. Broome County, 18 N. Y. 155. The purpose of that action was to have declared null and void an act of the board of supervisors of Broome county, which divided one of the towns of the county into three towns. The plaintiffs, seventeen in number, were residents and freeholders of the town divided, and they brought the action in behalf of persons having an interest with them in the relief sought. The court, in determining the action, say that the question is of considerable practical importance, which ought to be definitely settled, and after discussing the matter at length, together with analogous cases, concludes, as correctly stated in the headnote, that the action cannot be maintained by persons having no other interest than one common to all the freeholders of the proposed towns, and that the proceedings of the board of supervisors, if void, can only be redressed or prevented at the suit of the state or some other officer authorized to act in behalf of the public, and that a private person cannot bring the action in question unless it involves some peculiar damage to his individual interest.

In Roosevelt v. Draper, 23 N. Y. 318, 323, the plaintiff, who alleged that he was a resident and taxpayer of the city of New York, owning real and personal property situated therein and paying taxes thereon, and also as a creditor of the city by reason of being the owner and holder of a portion of the city stock, brought the action to have declared void and to set aside conveyances which it was alleged had been illegally made by the corporation of the city of New York of a piece of land under the waters of the North river. The court says: "As a resident citizen and a person liable to be taxed, he has no other rights than such as are common to all the people of that community who own property; and we have decided, upon full consideration, that it requires some individual interest, distinct from that which belongs to every inhabitant of the town or county, to give the party complaining a standing in court, where it is an alleged delinquency in the administration of public affairs which is called in question. Doolittle v. Broome County, supra. The fact of owning taxable property is not such a peculiarity as to take the case out of the rule, for all property, with very limited exceptions, is taxable, and everybody either has, or is capable of acquiring, property. Liability to contribute to the public burdens, where there are no privileged classes, is the lot of every member of the state, and a large proportion of all the acts of government, either general or local, involves questions of expenditure, and affects more or less the subject of taxation. If a plaintiff has taxable property at the time he commences his action, he may not have it when the next assessment for purposes of taxation is made; and if he have none when the act complained of is committed, he may be a large taxpayer when that act produces its result in increased taxation. The actual liability of the plaintiff to injury consists in his belonging to a community in which every person is subject to pay taxes of all he possesses. An act of administration likely to produce taxation is not therefore a matter of private or individual concern."

This court in People v. Canal Board, 55 N. Y. 390, 394, which was an action brought by the attorney general in behalf of the people, says: "A court of equity has, as such, no supervisory power or jurisdiction over public officials or public bodies, and only takes cognizance of actions against or concerning them when a case is made coming within one of the acknowledged heads of equity jurisdiction."

After numerous decisions of the court in which the Doolittle and Roosevelt cases are the most notable examples, the taxpayers' act of 1872 was passed to provide a remedy against the wrongful acts of officers and agents of municipal corporations. It is significant that although the act has been many times considered in the last forty years by the legislature as well as by the courts, it has not been extended to include the wrongful acts of officers and agents of the state.

In the recent case of Tamney v. Atkins, 209 N. Y. 202, 206, 102 N. E. 567, 568, the court says: "It is well settled that this proceeding [mandamus to require the recount of rejected ballots] may not be entertained by virtue of any inherent powers of the court, but must find authorization and support in the express provisions of the statute. . . . It is not difficult to appreciate the force of the argument made in behalf of the relator that there is no justice or logic in permitting a candidate for some inconsequential office to sue out such a writ as this and then to withhold such right from a person like the relator in the case of an election which may involve very substantial rights and interests for him. But this argument must be addressed to the legislature rather than to the courts. As has already been said, in such a case as this the right to the writ depends on legislative enactment, and if the legislature, as the result of fixed policy or inadvertent omission, fails to give such privilege, we have no power to supply the omission."

It is the settled law in this state that equity has no jurisdiction over contests for office even if the election is claimed to be void. Parties aggrieved are required to assert their rights in proceedings provided by statute or in actions at law. Hearst v. Woelper, 183 N. Y. 274, 76 N. E. 28; Metz v. Maddox, 189 N. Y. 460, 121 Am. St. Rep. 909, 82 N. E. 507; People ex rel. Brink v. Way, 179 N. Y. 174, 71 N. E. 756; Re Reynolds, 202 N. Y. 430, 441, 96 N. E. 87, 416; People ex rel. Corscadden v. Haswell, 177 N. Y. 499, 66 L.R.A. 604, 69 N. E. 1114; Bachman v. Harrington, 184 N. Y. 458, 77 N. E. 657; Re Sawyer, 124 U. S. 200, 31 L. ed. 402, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 482.

The plaintiff as an individual cannot sustain this action to determine the result of the election at which the question was submitted as to whether a constitutional convention should be held. It will not do to say that the courts should assert jurisdiction in cases of this kind to avoid public expense or prevent a wrong for which there is no other immediate remedy. Such a contingency should be provided against by the legislature or by the people in the Constitution.

The cases in this state where expressions are used that are claimed by the appellant to sustain his position are in actions at law or in proceedings such as applications for mandamus to compel a public officer to discharge a plain public duty, or they are otherwise explainable. It is asserted by the appellant that the case of Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 34 L.R.A. 408, 45 N. E. 15, involves precisely the same principle contended for by him in this case. That action was brought under the taxpayers' act. In the opinion written at the special term (court of appeals records, vol. 44, 1896) the court says: "We are thus brought to the consideration of the further point made by the defendants that the plaintiffs as taxpayers cannot maintain this action. That they could not in the absence of a statutory provision expressly authorizing it is clear. Indeed, prior to the enactment of chapter 161 of the Laws of 1872, it was repeatedly held that a taxpayer in his character as such, whose position was not different from that of the whole body of taxpayers, has no such interest as would entitle him to resort to a court of equity to revise, restrain, or set aside the action of town or municipal authorities upon an allegation that their acts were unauthorized and illegal, or that unless arrested they would subject the plaintiff to unjust or illegal taxation."

The questions involved have been considered in many of the other states of the Union, and the decisions are not uniform. A consideration of such decisions in this opinion would require elaborate statements to show the particular constitutional provisions and statutes on which they are based, as well as the tendency in some states to assert jurisdiction in the courts to review the acts of independent branches of government.

This court has not refrained and will not refrain from declaring a statute unconstitutional when it is asserted in a controversy where the question becomes a judicial one, but we repeat that the courts of this state have denied the right of a citizen and taxpayer to bring before the court for review the acts of another department of government simply because he is one of many such citizens and taxpayers.

Our conclusion, as stated, makes it unnecessary to consider any of the other questions presented on this appeal. But nothing contained in this opinion should be construed as an intimation that if the court had jurisdiction of the subject of the action it would deem the statute in question, or the special election held thereunder, to be invalid.

The order should be affirmed, with costs. The fourth question should be answered in the negative, and the other questions should not be answered.

(November 10, 1914.)

APPEAL by claimant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, affirming a judgment of the State Board of Claims disallowing his claim for the value of fixtures attached to a building on land taken by the state for barge canal purposes. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hickey, Thompson, & Gold, for appellant:

The conclusion of law by which the board of claims disallowed claimant's claim for the value of his machinery is not in accord with, or justified by, the facts found, and its judgment and that of the appellate division should be modified by awarding him the damage which the trial court should have awarded, or else the judgment below should be reversed with costs and a new trial ordered.

JACKSON v. STATE was cited in Re Willcox, 165 App. Div. 197, 151 N. Y. Supp. 141, where the court said (the facts as to fixtures not having been reported): "It is insisted, second, that no award should have been made to the tenant for the destruction of fixtures, for it is contended that 'these articles were all 'trade fixtures' and were personal property.' I think that these articles were within the scope of the compensation to be made. They are 'a part of the realty so long as they remain fixtures; and damages are recoverable if they are destroyed or injured in value.'"

In Edmonds v. Boston, 108 Mass. 535, where the facts as to fixtures are not reported, the court said: "It was rightly held that damages were not to be assessed for losses in respect of personal property. Fixtures are a part of the realty so long as they remain fixtures; and damages are recoverable if they are destroyed or injured in value. But we do not find from the report that due allowance for all injuries of that nature was not made."

court considering that the question was whether the machinery was a part of the realty or not.

In White v. Cincinnati, R. & M. R. Co. 34 Ind. App. 287, 71 N. E. 276, where the railway company was condemning a right of way by bridge over the owner's land, occupied by a paper mill, it was held that the owner's right to compensation as regards fixtures was not preserved by an instruction that if "there was machinery in such buildings, and attached thereto, and intended to be permanently used in connection therewith, and was attached in such a manner that it could not be detached and removed without material injury to such real estate or buildings, then such machinery became and was a part of the real estate to which it was so attached. This is a matter for the jury to determine from the evidence." The court considered that machinery permanent in its character, and essential to the purpose for which the buildings were used, was a fixture and realty, and that the attachment to the freehold might be real or constructive.

But in New York C. & H. R. R. Co. v. Albany Steam Trap Co. 161 App. Div. 329, 146 N. Y. Supp. 674, a decision by the same department of the court whose decision in Jackson v. State [160 App. Div. 110, 145 N. Y. Supp. 131] is now reversed in the principal case, the court, in holding machinery in a building, part of which building was taken, to be personal property, said: "It appears that the greater portion of the heavy machinery has been owned by the appellant for about twenty years, and has been twice moved as appellant changed its business location. The machinery has been carried upon appellant's inventory as personal property. It has been fastened and held in place by screws, and can be moved without injury to the real estate."

The fixtures are to be considered as part of the building, and its value with them is the amount to be paid. Allen v. Boston, 137 Mass. 319; Re Park Commr. 1 N. Y. Supp. 763; Re North River Water Front, 118 App. Div. 865, 103 N. Y. Supp. 908, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 508, 81 N. E. 1162; Re Avenue A, 66 Misc. 488, 122 N. Y. Supp. 321.

In Allen v. Boston, 137 Mass. 319, cited in JACKSON v. STATE, the appellate court applied L.R.A.1915D.

proved the decision of the trial court, where the building on the land in question had been fitted up, and was used at the time of the taking, for Turkish and other baths, with permanent fixtures, which had been taken with the building by the respondent, and there was evidence as to the worth of these fixtures for use in the business then carried on in said building. The court had refused to instruct the jury "that, in addition to the value of the building, the petitioners are entitled to recover the value of the fixtures taken with the building," but instructed them that, in their estimate of damages, the fixtures were to be taken into account as being a part of the building, and that allowance should be made for them so far, and only so far, as they enhanced the market value of the estate for any purpose for which it might be used.

Rule same as between vendor and vendee.

In determining whether a thing is a fixture and so a part of the realty, the rule to be applied is that between vendor and vendee, and not that between landlord and tenant. Re Post Office Site, 127 C. C. A. 382, 210 Fed. 832 (N. Y.); Re New York, 39 App. Div. 589, 57 N. Y. Supp. 657; Phipps v. State, 69 Misc. 295, 127 N. Y. Supp. 260.

In Re Post Office Site, supra, the United States, in taking property for a postoffice, was required to pay for the machinery of an engraving plant some of which rested on concrete pillars built up from the ground, and the rest was attached to or built into the floors or walls, the court considering that the rule to be applied was analogous to that between vendor and vendee, and not to that between landlord and tenant, and that the owners might conclude that they could not resume business in any other location with profit, and should not be left with a large amount of useless machinery on their hands.

In Re New York, supra, cited in JACKSON v. STATE, it was held that a city taking part of the land of a gas company must take and pay for such machinery in the buildings on the land taken as was a fixture, and that it could not claim that the gas company should move the machinery onto its adjoining land.

amounts. The board also found that the building contained machinery, shafting, elevators, and conveyers of the value of $4,353.20. The form in which these articles were annexed to the freehold, and the purpose of the annexation, were such that, as between the vendor and vendee, they would have constituted fixtures. For the enhancement of value due to the presence of these fixtures, the board of claims refused to award compensation to the claimant. The ruling has been affirmed at the appellate division on the ground that the state, after appropriating the warehouse, had the right to reject the fixtures and refuse to pay for them.

We think that the power of the state is not so great, nor the plight of the citizen so helpless. Condemnation is an enforced sale, and the state stands toward the owner as buyer toward seller. On that basis the rights and duties of each must be determined. It is intolerable that the state, after condemning a factory or warehouse, should surrender to the owner a stock of second-hand machinery and in so doing discharge the full measure of its duty. Severed from the building, such machinery commands only the prices of secondhand articles; attached to a going plant, it may produce an enhancement of value as great as it did when new. The law gives no sanction to so obvious an injustice as would result if the owner were held to forfeit all these elements of value. An appropriation of land, unless qualified when made, is an appropriation of all that is annexed to the land, whether classified as buildings or as fixtures, and so it has frequently been held. Re North River Water Front, 118 App. Div. 865, 103 N. Y. Supp. 908, affirmed in 189 N. Y. 508, 81 N. E. 1162; Re New York, 39 App. Div. 589, 57 N. Y. Supp. 657; Phipps v. State, 69 Misc. 295, 127 N. Y. Supp. 260; Allen v. Boston, 137 Mass. 319. We say "unless qualified when made," because we do not need at this time to decide whether

In Phipps v. State, supra (Ct. Claims), it was held that an engine and derrick in an engine house, used in connection with a factory for the manufacture of fertilizer, were fixtures, where the engine rested upon a foundation of concrete which was about 4½ feet thick, sunk in the earth, and was connected, by means of six ½ inch bolts, 4 feet, 6 inches long, with metal bars laid on the bottom of the concrete, the concrete covering the bottom flange of the engine base, and the derrick was set up in the earth and was supported by five metal guys, the lower end of each being anchored to a beam buried in the ground.

This rule is particularly illustrated in cases where there is a leasehold or tenancy. In such cases the fixtures are real estate although the tenant has the right to take them away. Re Park Comrs.; Re North River Water Front; and Re Avenue A, supra.

The tenant should be allowed for such of his buildings and fixtures as would be real estate if he were the owner, the property in the first place to be valued in its entirety. Re Park Comrs. supra.

The rule between landlord and tenant does not apply so that a beneficial use of the property is to be taken from the tenant without making him a fair compensation for the property as a whole. Re North River Water Front, supra, where it was held that on the condemnation of property the owners of the buildings and leasehold are entitled to be paid the fair market value of the buildings as they exist, together with such permanent machinery as has been built into the buildings and used in connection with the leasehold estate for business purposes. The court said: "Assuming that, if L.R.A.1015D.

the landlord elected to purchase the building under the provisions of the lease, it would not be required to pay for such property, and the tenant would be required to remove it, when the city condemns the property it takes from the tenant the building of which this machinery is a part, and it is only just that the tenant should be paid what the building as a whole is worth. What the tenant is entitled to is the fair market value of the property that is taken. That property is the value of the leasehold, which includes the probability of a renewal of the lease, which would result in his being allowed to continue as lessee and use all this property in connection with the building, and it seems to me, in view of this right that the tenant had in connection with his occupation of the property, that justice requires that the city should pay him for the property which is a part of the building, and which has little or no value separated from the property which the city takes for its own purposes." Partly quoted in Re Willcox, 142 App. Div. 680, 127 N. Y. Supp. 177.

In Re Avenue A, 66 Misc. 488, 122 N. Y. Supp. 321, the court said: "The city took the entire buildings as they stood, including the trade fixtures therein, and for purposes of this proceeding they must all be regarded as real property. That is as between the tenant and the city, the trade fixtures were real property and must be paid for by the city the same as a building, and the tenant was under no more obligation to remove them than he would be to remove a building if he were the owner. As between the tenant and the owner, however, the trade fixtures were personalty, and could be removed, and therefore any award made for them would go to the tenant."

While the question whether buildings are fixtures is without the scope of this note, the state, in giving notice of appropriation, may except fixtures that would retain, after severance from the soil, a substantial value as personalty, and thus restrict the payment to the difference between the value of the detached articles and the value added to the building when they were used in connection with it. Price v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 27 Wis. 98; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Getz, 113 Pa. 214, 6 Atl. 356. If that may be done in any case, it can only be when the purpose is made plain in the act of appropriation. The rights of the parties became fixed at that time, and must then be reciprocal. If the state has the right, under a general notice of appropriation, to insist that title to the fixtures has passed to it with the land, the owner has the correlative right to insist upon payment. The law does not leave the title in a state of suspense. The value of the fixtures ought therefore to have been considered in estimating the total value of the property appropriated by the state.

We have not ignored the suggestion in behalf of the respondent that some of the fixtures were afterwards removed by the claimant, and by common consent were treated as personal property. Tyson v. Post, 108 N. Y. 217, 2 Am. St. Rep. 409, 15 N. E. 316. No finding on this subject was either made or requested, and the evidence is too vague to enable use to ascertain the truth of the transaction. The claimant's position is that he did not remove anything, but acquired by purchase from a contractor some of the fixtures which the contractor had purchased from the state. Upon another hearing this element of the controversy may be more fully developed.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., and Hiscock, Chase, Collin, Hogan, and Miller, JJ., concur.

it may be noted that in Sheehan v. Fall River, 187 Mass. 356, 73 N. E. 544, where the petitioner was allowed for damages by change of grade to her building on land of which she was tenant at will, the court said: "We are of opinion that the words 'all damages sustained' in the statute under consideration, when applied to a change of grade in an established public way, should be held to cover compensation for injuries caused to a building located on the line of the street, and substantially annexed to the soil, though, as between the owner of the fee and the owner of the building, it is a tenant's fixture, which may be removed, and thus give the petitioner a remedy to recover the damages she has suffered."

Where there is a leasehold, the appropriating party should pay the entire value of the building and its fixtures, and the rights of the landlord and tenant can then be determined as between themselves. Cases cited supra.

But in this connection it may be noted that it has been held that a life tenant will not be allowed for any improvements or fixtures put in by him; if they are part of the realty they are included with it, and so included in the capital. Williams v. Com. 108 Mass. 364, 47 N. E. 115.

decrease in value when detached from the premises, and that it refers in this connection to the Price and Getz Cases, infra.

In Price v. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. 27 Wis. 98, where a railroad company crossed the plaintiff's premises, which he had fitted up as a water cure, putting in a well, pumps, reservoirs, boilers, etc., it was held that the company could not complain of instructions to the jury that, in considering the damages, they were not to allow anything to the plaintiff on the ground that taking the property by the company had destroyed or affected the residue of the premises for the use of a water cure, and that if they found that, before proceedings were taken by the railroad company to condemn the right of way, the plaintiff had put into and upon the premises certain fixtures and appurtenances necessary to them for a water cure, and that, by reason of the construction and use of the railroad across the premises the premises became unavailable and unfit for that use, then they were to allow in damages the difference between what these fixtures and appurtenances were worth in connection with the property as a water cure (not exceeding their reasonable cost), and what they would be worth to be removed from the premises and applied to other uses. The charter of the company required it to pay the price of the land taken and all consequential damages caused the landowner by constructing the road across his land.

In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Getz, 113 Pa. 214, 6 Atl. 356, where a railroad took a corner of a lot occupied as a marble mill, necessitating the removal of the business, the tenant, who was the owner of the machinery, was held entitled to the expense and damage of removing it, the testimony being that it was worth as much in another place. This seems to have been without regard to the question whether the machinery, was a fixture or not, and the other Pennsylvania cases do not seem to go into that question.

In James McMillin Printing Co. v. Pittsburgh, C. & W. R. Co. 216 Pa. 504, 65 Atl. 1091, the court said: "If, as was the case here, a tenant engaged in a business requiring the use of heavy machinery and appliances should secure a new place equally well adapted to his business, and at the same rent, he would still be at the expense of removal and at a loss because of the stoppage of his business. These are matters to be considered in connection with others, not as substantive elements of damage, but as tending to prove the value of the leasehold interest."

In Diamond Mills Emery Co. v. Philadelphia, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 9, where the city took for a park land on which was a mill and machinery, the court said: "The true theory would seem to be that the city took the whole property and was liable for the whole, but that its liability was abated to the extent of the value of the machinery taken by the plaintiff. The value to the plaintiff was the market value."

The general rule, however, is that an allowance is not to be made for the removal of personal property. See note to Blincoe v. Choctaw, O. & W. R. Co. 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 890.

Miscellaneous.

In Gibson v. Hammersmith & C. R. Co. 9 Jur. N. S. 221, 2 Drew & S. 803, 1 New Reports, 305, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 337, 8 L. T. N. S. 43, 11 Week. Rep. 299, the company, intending to take a small part of premises or buildings occupied by the plaintiff under a ninety-nine year lease, on which he carried on the business of manufacturing engineer, acquiesced in his demand that it should take the whole of the "manufactory" under § 92 of the statute, and it was held that it was bound to take not only the land and buildings and ordinary fixtures, but also the trade fixtures, consisting of fixed machinery, etc. The said statute, § 92, provided "that no party shall be required at any time to sell or convey to the promoters of the undertaking a part only of any house, or other building or manufactory, if such party be willing and able to sell and convey the whole thereof."

Where the government destroys the water power used by the claimant in his sawmill, he should be compensated for the machinery therein, as immovable under the statute. Lefebvre v. Reg. 1 Can. Exch. 121.

Re Public Parks, 53 Hun, 280, 6 N. Y. Supp. 750, is not very clearly reported. The court there states that the owner could not object "that no award was made for the difference in value between the machinery as in use and occupation upon the premises, and such machinery if moved to another manufactory," and says: "It is clear that the commissioners have made an allowance for the depreciation in value of the machinery by removal, and that they would have no authority whatever to make an award for L.R.A.1915D.

the machinery as such, it being personal property."

Schreiber v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 115 Ill. 340, 3 N. E. 427, is to obscurely reported to be of much value on the question; it seems to have been there held that where a tenant was allowed to remain after condemnation proceedings were begun until the end of his lease, he was not entitled to compensation for, nor to the cost of removal of, such of his buildings, machinery, etc., as were trade fixtures.

In Re New York, 101 App. Div. 527, 92 N. Y. Supp. 8, affirmed in 182 N. Y. 281, 74 N. E. 840, and in further proceedings in same matter in 192 N. Y. 295, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 423, 127 Am. St. Rep. 903, 84 N. E. 1105, modifying 122 App. Div. 890, 106 N. Y. Supp. 1117, the question was simply as to the division of fixtures or fixture value between landlord and tenant. B. B. B.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

W. A. ROBERSON et al.,

v.

C. MOORE, Appt.

(168 N. C. 388, 84 S. E. 351.)

Will — loan — rule in Shelley's Case.

Since in a will the word "lend" is equivalent to "give" or "devise," a loan in such an instrument of land to one for life, with a devise of it in fee to his heirs at his death passes the fee to him.

(February 24, 1915.)

Note. — Meaning and effect of term "lend" or "loan" employed in a deed or will.

I. Introductory, 496.

II. Deeds, 497.

III. Wills.

a. In general, 497.

b. Personal property, 498.

c. Real estate, 500.

I. Introductory.

In a deed or will the word "lend" and its derivatives have usually been held equivalent to give, grant, devise, or words of similar meaning; that is, it does not limit the estate to a mere lease, or one different from that which would be created if the words give, grant, devise, etc., had been used. The governing factor, however, in the interpretation of instruments in which this word is used, is the intention with which it was used; and if this requires a different construction, such construction will be given.

A statute in Georgia provides that the word "lend" when occurring in a will will be construed to mean "give" unless the context requires its restricted meaning. Britt v. Rawlings, 87 Ga. 146, 13 S. E. 336.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Martin County, in plaintiff's favor, upon submission of a controversy without action to determine whether the title tendered by plaintiffs under a land contract was good. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Clayton Moore for appellant.

Messrs. H. W. Stubbs and A. R. Dunning for appellees.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The immediate grantor of plaintiffs was

In Booth v. Terrell, 16 Ga. 20, an instruction that the loan of a slave by one person to another for the life of the borrower by a parol agreement that the slave should be returned to the lender or his heirs at the death of the borrower vested an absolute title in the borrower was held erroneous for the reason, as the appellate court said, that this was not a will, but a gift inter vivos; and the lender manifested no intention of parting with his property: (distinguishing on this ground a number of will cases in which the term was held equivalent to "give"), and therefore there was no attempt to create a remainder or even a reversion by parol.

While a majority of the cases included in this note involve the application of the rule in Shelley's Case, it is obvious that the distinctive question here considered is merely whether the use of the word "lend" will defeat the application of the rule, assuming that in the view of the court, at least, the rule would otherwise have been applicable. The general subject of the rule in Shelley's Case is discussed in a note in 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 963.

II. Deeds.

In accordance with the rule above stated, the word "lend" or "loan" used in a deed has been held equivalent to "give" where the grantor indicates an intention to part with the property mentioned. Jones v. Jones, 20 Ga. 699. It was accordingly held in this case that a deed of gift in which the grantor "loaned to his sister . . . one negro girl . . . during her natural life and then to her bodily heirs" did not create an estate tail in the grantee, so as to vest an absolute estate in her under a statute, but only an estate for her life. There was a gift over in case of the death of the first taker without issue to her brothers and sisters "that shall be alive at that time;" the words "at that time" were held to prevent the creation of an estate tail in the first taker.

In other cases no attention is given to the word used, but it is construed as though the word "give" or "grant" had been used.

A deed of gift of slaves, conveying the slaves as a loan to a husband and wife during their natural lifetime, and after their decease to their children lawfully begotten L.R.A.1915D.

James G. Taylor, devisee of the tract of land in question, under the will of his father, Jesse Erwin Taylor, and, on the facts agreed, the title offered was properly made to depend upon the construction of the will of said Jesse, in terms as follows:

"Item 5. I loan to James G. Taylor during the term of his natural life the following described tract of land, beginning at a gum in Bee branch, Moye P. Taylor's corner, and running along said Taylor's line 4 ²⁵/₁₀₀ chains; thence S. 55 W. to the line of the lands devised to my daughter, Mollie Smith, in Item 4; thence along said line between them, was held in Catterlin v. Hardy, 10 Ala. 511, to express a clear intention that the first takers should have only a life interest, and that the remainder after their death should go to the children lawfully begotten; that the remainder was vested in the children.

A deed containing the words "do lend to the said . . . during his natural life" a certain tract of land, and in the habendum "to have and to hold the same with the appurtenances thereunto belonging to the said . . . his natural life, and at the death of the said . . . unto the lawful heirs of the said . . . and their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns," under the rule in Shelley's Case conveys a fee-simple title to the grantee. Edgerton v. Aycock, 123 N. C. 134, 31 S. E. 382.

A conveyance, the granting words of which were "lease, let, rent and confirm" to the grantee and his heirs "for the full term of 1,000 years or as long as wood grows or water runs," was held to convey a fee in the use, in Stevens v. Dewing, 2 Vt. 411.

III. Wills.

a. In general.

The intention of the testator, which is the determining factor in the construction of wills, generally controls the construction to be placed upon the use of the word "lend" and its derivatives as used in a will.

On the question whether a will was wholly executed, so as to dispense with the necessity for the appointment of an administrator at the death of the life tenant, it was held in Burch v. Burch, 19 Ga. 174, that a provision in a will, viz., "I lend to my beloved wife . . . the whole of my estate, both real and personal, during her natural life or widowhood," did not pass any of the property out of the estate during the lifetime of the wife, who remained unmarried. The will in this case contained other provisions for the disposition of the property in case of the remarriage of the wife, and the testator carefully distinguished in the use of the words "lend" and "give." This was held to show that there was no unmeaning distinction with the testator in the use of these words, but, upon a careful review of the will, it was held and along Julian H. Purvis' line and Mrs. Ruth Taylor's line and N. P. Taylor's line to a dead elm in Bee branch; thence up said branch to the first station; containing 190 acres, more or less; and at the death of said James G. Taylor I give and devise the said land to his heirs at law in fee simple forever."

The case states that the James G. Taylor is now living and has two children, and defendant contends that, under said clause, the devisee took only a life estate.

It is established by repeated decisions of the court that the rule in Shelley's Case is still recognized in this jurisdiction, and, evident that the testator did not intend the title to any of his property to pass out of his estate, and therefore the will remained unexecuted.

The use of the word "lend" in the clause in a will, viz., "I lend unto my grandson . . . a tract of land; three negroes . . . Now if in case that the said [grandson] should live to arrive to manhood and beget heirs lawfully, the above property to him and his heirs forever; (if not) I give and bequeath the abovementioned property" over, was held to indicate an intention on the part of the testator to give the property to this grandson for life as a provision and maintenance, to be enlarged into a fee in the event of his having issue. Felton v. Billups, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 584. Consequently, upon his death without issue, the property went over.

A testamentary provision, viz., "I do lend to . . . all my estate, real and personal. And it is my will that my estate should be kept together until the said [one of the devisees] arrives to twenty-one years of age, and then equally divided share and share alike with the said four children to them and their heirs forever," conveys an absolute property in the several shares to the several legatees after the division takes place. Cox v. Marks, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) 361. It is stated that what the testator might have meant by the word "lend" in case any of the children had died before the time of division it is useless to inquire, because it is clear that he intended they should have in the first instance an absolute property in their several shares after the division should take place.

b. Personal property.

In gifts of personal property the word "lend" or "loan" is equivalent to the word "give" or "bequeath" where the testator indicates a clear intention to part with the entire dominion over the property bequeathed. Ewing v. Standefer, 18 Ala. 400; Bryan v. Duncan, 11 Ga. 67; Jones v. Jones, 20 Ga. 699; Pournell v. Harris, 29 Ga. 736.

It has been stated that the word "lend" is equivalent to "give" in the absence of anything to show that the testator intended where the same obtains, it does so as a rule of property without regard to the intent of the grantor or devisor. Jones v. Whichard, 163 N. C. page 243, 79 S. E. 504; Price v. Griffin, 150 N. C. page 523, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 935, 64 S. E. 372; Edgerton v. Aycock, 123 N. C. page 134, 31 S. E. 382; Chamblee v. Broughton, 120 N. C. page 170, 27 S. E. 111; Starnes v. Hill, 112 N. C. page 1, 22 L.R.A. 598, 16 S. E. 1011.

In Jones v. Whichard, a very accurate statement of the rule is given with approval from Preston on Estates, as follows: "When a person takes an estate of freehold, legally or equitably, under a deed, will, or other that the legal estate should not pass. Myers v. Pickett, 1 Hill, Eq. 35.

In Deane v. Hansford, 9 Leigh, 256, there is stated to be no sound distinction between a bequest of slaves in the language, "I . . . lend to my grandson," and a bequest by words imparting a gift.

A gift viz., "I lend my niece . . . one negro girl and her increase . . . during my niece's natural life and at her death to the lawful issue of her body," and in case of the niece dying without issue, over, creates, at least, a life estate in the niece. Bryan v. Duncan, 11 Ga. 67.

A testamentary provision, viz., "I loan to my daughter . . . during her natural life and then to her bodily heirs" certain negroes, naming them, creates an estate tail in the daughter, which, by statute, is converted into an absolute interest. Jones v. Jones, 20 Ga. 699. A similar holding appears in Pournell v. Harris, supra, where the testamentary provision was: "I lend to . . . during her natural life [certain slave] and at her decease I give the said slaves and their increase to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten."

So, a bequest as follows: "I lend to . . . L. S. during her natural life, five negroes . . . these five negroes, with all their increase I will to the lawful begotten heirs of L. S. to be equally divided among them at her death," vests an absolute estate in the first taker. Ewing v. Standefer, 18 Ala. 400.

A gift in a will in the following language, "I lend to my daughter . . . four negroes [followed by a bequest to another daughter] during their natural lives and then to the heirs of their bodies," conveys to the first taker an absolute estate. Myers v. Pickett, 1 Hill, Eq. 35.

The word "loan" was treated as equivalent to "give" in Hyman v. Williams, 34 N. C. (12 Ired. L.) 92, where a provision, "I loan to my wife . . . [certain property]," with gift over at her death, was held to convey a life estate to the wife in certain personal property, which was all that was in dispute.

In Robertson v. Hardy, 2 Va. Dec. 275, 23 S. E. 766, it is held that no restriction of the gift of personal property can be inferred from the use of the word "loan" in writing, and in the same instrument there is a limitation by way of remainder, either with or without interposition of another estate, of an interest of the same legal or equitable quality to his heirs, or heirs of his body, as a class of persons to take in succession, from generation to generation, the limitation to the heirs entitles the ancestor to the whole estate."

It is further held here and elsewhere that, in the construction of a will, the word "lend" will be taken to pass the property to which it applies, in the same manner as the words "give" and "devise," unless it is manifest that the testator intended otherwise. Sessoms v. Sessoms, 144 N. C. pages 121-124; 56 S. E. 687, citing Cox v. Marks, 27 N. C. (5 Ired. L.) page 361; King v. Utley, 85 N. C. page 59 and other cases.

Applying the principles as approved and stated in these cases, we think it clear that plaintiff's grantor, James G. Taylor, took a fee-simple estate; the devise giving him an estate in the property for life and then to his heirs general to take in succession forever.

There is no error, and the judgment below is affirmed.

a clause of the testator's will reading: "I do at my death loan the tract of land on which I at present reside and known as the 'dower tract' . . . to my beloved wife during her natural life, with all the property of whatever nature or kind soever it may be," etc.

It has been stated that where it is apparent that the testator intended some gift by the use of the word "loan," and not a mere loan and sufferance, the gift will be treated as absolute unless it is limited by the context of the will. Parker v. Wasley, 9 Gratt. 477. It was accordingly held in this case that a clause in the will, viz., "I loan to my daughter . . . a negro girl . . . and $200 in cash which is her full proportion of all my estate," which was subsequently modified by a codicil to the effect that "I loan to my daughter . . . $300 more in lieu of a negro girl . . . which I loaned her in my will," conveyed an absolute estate to the daughter. It was urged in this case that by using the word "loan" in this bequest, and in other bequests the word "give," an intention to convey a limited, and not an absolute, estate, is shown. In answer to this it is stated that the most that can be made of it is that the testator had some meaning in the use of the word "loan" in the bequest in which it was used different from that which he had in the use of the word "give" in other clauses of his will, but what the meaning was it is impossible from the record to ascertain. It is further stated that there is nothing in the will to limit the duration of the estate given to the legatee named in this clause, and therefore nothing to prevent her from taking an absolute estate.

A devise, viz., "All of my estate . . . I loan to my wife . . . during her natural life. My wish is that the property I have loaned to her, after her death . . . shall be sold" and the money divided between the testator's children, was construed the same as if the word "give" had been used, it being stated that the word was used as the equivalent of "give." Chapman v. Chapman, 90 Va. 409, 18 S. E. 913.

In certain cases in which the word "lend" is used, no special emphasis is placed upon the word.

A provision in a will, viz., "I loan to my sister . . . three negroes . . . also one third part of all my land lying in Anderson county, and at her death I give the above property to her lawful heirs of her body," was treated in Lloyd v. Rambo, 35 Ala. 709, as a gift to the sister, remainder to the lawful heirs of her body, and therefore to vest the first taker with the absolute property in the slaves, which were the only part of the gift in dispute.

No point is made of the use of the word "lend" in a bequest of slaves and personal property in Williamson v. Ledbetter, 2 Munf. 521, but it is interpreted as though the word "give" had been used. A similar decision appears in Wade v. Boxley, 5 Leigh, 442.

A clause in a will, viz., "I lend unto my granddaughter . . . one negro girl . . . during her natural life and at her death I give and bequeath the said negro girl . . . to the lawful issue of her body that may then be living," was sustained as not creating a limitation too remote, and was sustained also as against the argument that it created an estate tail which, under the statute, would vest the entire estate in the first taker, in Woodley v. Findley, 9 Ala. 716.

See Felton v. Billups, 21 N. C. (1 Dev. & B. Eq.) 584; Den ex dem. Harrell v. Hoskins, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 479, infra.

But a different construction has been placed upon the word "lend" in a will in Loving v. Hunter, 8 Yerg. 4. The provision in question was, "I lend unto my three daughters . . . to them during their natural lives and then given to the lawfully begotten heirs of their bodies." In holding that the daughters did not take an absolute estate under the rule in Shelley's Case, the court states: "The word 'lend' is here used, and not the word 'give,' and although the former word confers the use for life, it may for some purposes be construed to mean the same thing as though the latter word had been used; yet the use of the word 'lend' assists in determining what estate the testator intended his daughters should take. By the use of the words 'lend during their natural lives,' the intention of the testator is as certainly expressed and as well understood to confer on them only a life estate as it would have been by the use of any form of superadded words. This is more especially manifest by reference to the words which follow these. He says, after lending to the daughters for life 'and then given to the lawfully-begotten heirs of their bodies.' He uses here the word 'given' in contradistinction to the word 'lend,' the more conclusively to show that his purpose was that his grandchildren should take the absolute estate, the use of which was bestowed on their mother for life only."

In Glover v. Harris, 4 Rich. Eq. 25, the will provided: "I lend to my loving wife . . . during her natural life the use of one half of my land . . . and five negroes." The will contained a residuary clause in which "all the property which I possess and have not before bequeathed" was ordered to be sold and certain disposition made of the proceeds. The question in the case so far as the use of the word "lend" is concerned was whether the wife took an absolute estate in the slaves. In holding that the wife took only a life estate, the court states that the word "lend" used in such a connection as this is evidence of an intention to make a limited disposition; and the words "lend" and "use" and "for life" all harmonize in showing that there was no intention to give the property absolutely and forever to the wife.

c. Real estate.

As in gifts of personal property, so in gifts of real property, the word "lend" or "loan" has been held equivalent to "give," "bequeath," or "devise."

After holding that a gift in a will in the language, "I lend unto my grandson . . . to him and his lawful heirs of his body forever," conveyed an estate tail to the first taker, which by the statute was converted into a fee simple, the court in Sessoms v. Sessoms, 144 N. C. 121, 56 S. E. 687, states that this construction is not affected by the use of the word "lend." This word is not infrequently used in wills as synonymous with "give" or "bequeath" or "devise." It is further stated that there are instances where from the context or exceptional use of the word it has been allowed a different significance, but the general rule is that unless it is manifest that the testator did not intend an estate to pass, the word "lend" will pass the property to which it applies in the same manner as if the word "give" or "devise" had been used.

This language is approved in Faison v. Moore, 160 N. C. 148, 75 S. E. 993, where it is held that a will containing the following language: "I give to . . . all my real estate . . . during her natural life and if she marries and leaves heirs from such marriage, to such heirs in fee simple. . . . If she dies and leaves no heirs from such marriage, all the real estate loaned her to be divided" between certain named devisees, conveyed a life estate to the first taker, re- L.R.A.1915D.

mainder to her children, and in case she died without children or issue of her marriage then living, all the real estate loaned to her went to the other devisee named.

A devise in the following language: "I lend to my daughter Sarah during her natural life, and at her decease to be equally divided between the heirs of her body," was held to create an estate of freehold in the daughter, remainder over to her heirs, so as to bring the devise within the rule in Shelley's Case. Holt v. Pickett, 111 Ala. 362, 20 So. 432. See ROBERSON v. MOORE.

A devise of land as follows: "I lend to my son . . . tract of land . . . during his natural life," was held to vest in the son a life estate, in Callis v. Kemp, 11 Gratt. 78. It is stated that whether the word "lend" or "give" is used, an estate for life is vested in the first taker.

See Chapman v. Chapman, 90 Va. 409, 18 S. E. 913, supra, where both real and personal property were involved.

A similar interpretation has been placed upon clauses containing this word without any discussion of the word.

Thus, a gift in a will, viz., "I lend unto . . . all the lands I own . . . during his natural life, and after his death I give the above-mentioned land to his heirs lawfully begotten, to them and to their heirs forever," was held to convey an absolute estate in the first taker under the rule in Shelley's Case without any discussion as to the effect of the word "lend." Den ex dem. Folk v. Whitley, 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 133.

Without any discussion of the meaning of the word "loan," a "loan" to the daughter of the testator for her natural life, and after her death to her heirs forever, was treated under the rule in Shelley's Case as conveying a fee simple in the first taker. King v. Utley, 85 N. C. 69.

A devise in the following language, viz.: "The two houses situated on 14th street, is a lifetime lease it cannot be taken from you nor you cannot spend it, but it is held to insure you something to live on during your lifetime. Fifth:—and at your decease if you have lawful heirs then all will fall to them but if not then my present residence to be sold the money to be distributed as follows," was held to convey to the devisee therein named a fee-simple estate. McCann v. Barclay, 204 Pa. 214, 53 Atl. 767.

A disposition of land was made in Robertson v. Hardy, 2 Va. Dec. 275, 23 S. E. 766, as follows: "I do at my death loan the tract of land on which I at present reside . . . to my beloved wife during her natural life." The court states that under this clause the land was expressly given to the wife for life.

A will in which the word "lend" was used by the testator in making a gift of land and personal property was construed without reference to the use of this word, in Den ex dem. Harrell v. Hoskins, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 479.

A clause reading, "I lend to my daughter," etc., was construed as if there had been a gift, devise, or bequest, in Moon v. Stone, 19 Gratt. 130.

But the intention of the testator is the determining factor. When the word "lend" is used in the same clause with "give," this may be an indication of an intention to distinguish between the words.

A testamentary provision, viz.: "I lend unto my beloved wife, . . . all the lands which I may die possessed of . . . in . . . during her natural life for her to support herself and my children which may remain with her on the land, and after the death of my wife, this land to be equally divided between all my sons or their children, . . . this [land] I give to my sons above, over and above their distributive share of my estate as hereafter bequeathed to them," followed by items in which reference is made to the land mentioned as being given to the sons, indicated an intention on the part of the testator that the family, such of them as remained on the farm, should be supported upon it until the widow's death, with her, and if none remained on it with her, then the use of it should be hers until her death, with the possession and right of possession in her until her death. Hudgens v. Wilkins, 77 Ga. 555.

A gift in the words: "I also loan to my said wife all that portion of my land embracing my homestead, etc.," found in a paragraph of the will in which the testator gave and bequeathed certain personal property to his wife absolutely, was held in Britt v. Rawlings, 87 Ga. 146, 13 S. E. 336, to convey the land to the wife only for life. "It is difficult to conceive," says the court, "why he should have used these different expressions in relation to the several kinds of property disposed of by this item unless he intended that his wife should have the slaves and other personalty absolutely and the land only for life."

STATE OF OHIO EX REL. TIMOTHY S.
HOGAN, Attorney General.

(— Ohio St. —, 107 N. E. 758.)

Insurance — burial contracts — statutory regulations.

A contract by an individual engaged in the undertaking business, to furnish burial in consideration of payment of interest during life on notes of varying amounts according to age and service to be rendered, is within the operation of the statute governing the transaction of insurance business.

(June 26, 1914.)

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Franklin County to review a decree ousting respondent from carrying on the business of insurance without first securing a license. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Axline, Betts, & Kerns, for plaintiff in error:

Not only the right of contract to bury, but also the right to insure, is a common-law right, and not dependent upon any franchise or permit; hence, until the individual's common-law right is taken away or abridged by some statutory enactment, the right to so contract remains.

State ex rel. Richards v. Ackerman, 51 Ohio St. 163, 24 L.R.A. 298, 37 N. E. 828.

To construe insurance laws as prohibiting the individual from engaging in the insurance business would make them unconstitutional.

Messrs. Charles J. Pretzman and Frank Davis, Jr., with Mr. Timothy S. Hogan, Attorney General, for defendant in error:

The mutual note is a contract of insurance; and the agreed statement of facts shows that respondent is engaged in the insurance business.

It is not lawful for an individual to engage in the insurance business in the state of Ohio.

Per Curiam:

In February of 1913, the relator, Timothy S. Hogan, attorney general of Ohio, filed his petition in quo warranto in the court of appeals of Franklin county against John Renschler, resident of Hancock county, Ohio, charging the respondent with unlawfully exercising the franchise and privilege of writing life insurance.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts set forth in the record that the respondent, Renschler, was, at the time of the institution of this action and at the time of making the contracts hereinafter mentioned, engaged as an individual in the undertaking business in the city of Findlay, Hancock county, Ohio; that in connection with such business, and to further its volume, Renschler, during the last two years, not acting as a corporation, partnership, firm, or association, or as the agent or member of any such, but wholly in his individual capacity as a natural person, entered into certain written contracts with certain other parties, of the following nature: The contract was termed a mutual note, whereby the party of first part promised to pay to respondent during the natural life of first party the sum of 15 cents (termed "interest") on or before the 10th of each month in advance. The face value of the note varied from $50 to $100. The contract or note provides that, if the said first party be not in default at time of his or her death, the second party, Renschler, agrees to furnish funeral for said first party.

There are many stipulations in the so-called mutual note, among which are these provisions: (1) That any person in good health from one to sixty years of age can purchase one note as follows: One to ten years of age shall pay 8 cents interest per month on a $50-note contract; ten to sixty years of age shall pay 15 cents interest per month on a $100-note contract. (2) The object of the note is to provide the holder with a respectable burial; such funeral to be furnished and conducted by the respondent, his heirs or assigns, only. (3) After period of one year's payments has been completed, the holder may discontinue payments and will receive a credit slip, which slip may be applied on his or her funeral expenses, provided the funeral be conducted by respondent. (4) Note not payable in cash, and redeemable for its face in such goods as handled by the respondent, to be selected by his or her heirs or friends making funeral arrangements. (5) If holder of note was not in good health at time of issue, or if obtained through fraud, it shall be deemed void.

It further appears from the agreed statement of facts that the respondent has entered into a number of such contracts, all, however, confined to the territory within L.R.A.1915D.

which he operates as undertaker; that he is receiving monthly payments, termed "interest," on mutual notes from many parties, both young and old, and has been ready, able, and willing to comply with the terms of the contract, and as an individual undertaker has in fact complied with the terms thereof on the death of any holder of such mutual note, and is now furnishing funeral outfits whenever any of the holders of such notes decessed. It is also made to appear that the respondent has never applied for or received any license or permission to transact any insurance business, from the superintendent of insurance of Ohio, or from any other officer or branch of the state government; nor has he made any report of the nature or extent of his business to the said insurance department.

In February, 1914, the court of appeals of Franklin county, on the foregoing agreed facts, entered its decree of ouster against the respondent, and error was thereupon prosecuted by respondent to this court. Held, the so-called mutual note is clearly insurance. By all the tests to which the contract may be subjected, it unerringly leads one to the conclusion that the intention of the parties was on the one hand to receive and on the other to provide a fund to pay the burial expenses of the insured.

The contract being naked insurance and nothing else, it is subject to regulation by the insurance department. State ex rel. Coleman v. Wichita Mut. Burial Asso. 73 Kan. 181, 84 Pac. 757; Fikes v. State, 87 Miss. 251, 39 So. 783; State v. Willett, 171 Ind. 296, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 197, 86 N. E. 68; Guenther, Ins. § 191; 1 May, Ins. 4th ed. § 27; Robbins v. Hennessey, 86 Ohio St. 181, 99 N. E. 319.

Even if individuals, acting as purely natural persons, can carry on the business of insurance and exercise the functions of such, they must comply with all of the laws of Ohio on the subject of life insurance. Section 670, General Code, reading: "The provisions herein relating to the superintendent of insurance shall apply to all persons, companies and associations, whether incorporated or not, engaged in the business of insurance."

It may well be questioned whether a franchise of this character, which by its very nature presupposes perpetuity, could be granted to an individual. See Robbins v. Hennessey, supra; State ex rel. Richards v. Ackerman, 51 Ohio St. 163, 24 L.R.A. 298, 37 N. E. 828. But if it be granted that § 670, General Code, above quoted, would authorize the issuing of such a franchise to an individual, such individual would be bound by all the restrictions and requirements of an incorporated company. To hold otherwise would work a far-reaching hardship on that part of our population most needful of the protection of the state, and lead to a recrudescence of the old wild-cat insurance days, now happily a thing of the past.

Judgment affirmed.

Generally, as to statements made some time after accident as res gestæ, see note to Walters v. Spokane International R. Co. 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 917.

A search has revealed but little authority upon the precise question passed upon in HOBBS v. GREAT NORTHERN R. Co., as to the admissibility of statements or exclamations by an injured person after the accident tending to explain the reason for his presence at the scene of the accident. In the HOBBS CASE, it will be observed that the declarations in question were not mere verbal acts, but were offered for their testimonial value, and their admission would have involved a real exception to the hearsay rule. In some of the cases cited in the note, it is not entirely clear whether the statements or exclamations were admitted as verbal acts, or because of their testimonial value.

The statement of a passenger who was injured on alighting from a train on a dark night by falling into a pile of wood, to the effect that the conductor made him get off where he fell, made within a few minutes of the accident, while he was still uttering groans and exclamations of pain, was held admissible in *International & G. of the res gestæ in an action for his killing at another point by a train closely following that from which he was ejected. "It is all a part of the history of the case," the court said. Such cases, however, are not considered as in point in this note, as they tend more to consider the cause of the injury than to explain why the person injured was at the place of injury.

Testimony that when defendant's master mechanic ordered an employee into a mine where he was suffocated by gas, he said it was perfectly safe, was held admissible as part of the res gestæ of decedent's going into the mine, and of the order given him to go into it, in Alabama Consol. Coal & I. Co. v. Heald, 168 Ala. 626, 53 So. 182, an action based upon the negligence of the master mechanic in giving the order.

The court said: "Though the testimony so objected to is in the nature of hearsay evidence, the statements were believed by the plaintiff, who, acting thereon, left his work and assisted in the manner indicated, and, as such declarations were made at the time he obeyed the command, they formed a part of the res gestæ, and as such were admissible in evidence."

v. Starrat, 79 Mich. 204, 44 N. W. 594. Such instructions immediately preceded the act to be done and were what moved him to do the act.

A case not in point in this note, but worthy of notice in this connection, is Chicago Terminal Transfer R. Co. v. Stone, 55 C. C. A. 187, 118 Fed. 19. In that case the action was for the death of a car repairer by the alleged negligence of a roundhouse "hostler" sent out in charge of a switch engine without a fireman. On cross-examination the witness was questioned as to who sent him out without a fireman. This question was objected to on the ground that there was no charge that the injury resulted from negligence in not furnishing a fireman. The appellate court, sustaining the ruling of the trial judge, held that the question and answer to the effect that the roundhouse foreman sent him were admissible as a part of the res gestæ, on the issue of negligence on the part of the "hostler."

That one killed at a station by a railroad train intended to take passage on one of defendant's trains is a material fact in an action against the railroad company for his death, and his declarations concerning such intent are admissible in evidence when part of the res gestæ. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Chancellor, 165 Ill. 438, 46 N. E. 269, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 408.

But to be admissible as res gestæ such declarations of the party must be connected with the act of departure. Ibid.

So, a remark made by deceased to a neighbor about an hour before her death, while performing her ordinary household duties, that she intended taking passage that morning on one of defendant's trains, is not admissible as res gestæ, to show relation as passenger. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Chancellor, supra. The court said: "The evidence of Mrs. Stangnan, above cited, as to the acts and declarations of decedent an hour before the accident, was practically all that was relied on by appellee to show her relation as a passenger. To controvert this, it was shown by the only persons in charge of appellant's ticket office, that she purchased J.L.R.A.1915D.

Messrs. F. V. Brown and F. G. Dorety, for appellant:

An employee cannot recover for injuries received while at work, without any evidence that he was at the time engaged in the performance of work within the scope of his employment, or in fulfilling directions of his employer, and without proof that his duty called him to the place where he received his injury, or that the defendant knew, or or had any reason to anticipate, that he would be in such a position.

no ticket that morning; and after her death those who took immediate charge of her effects found no ticket and only a few pennies in money in her purse; also, that during the thirty minutes she had been at appellant's station one regular passenger train had departed for Chicago, and one in the other direction. The question for consideration is whether this evidence was part of the res gestæ. If so, it was properly admitted by the trial court, and if not, it was error. Courts have not always found it without some difficulty of determination as to whether or not particular acts or declarations were so nearly contemporaneous or coincident with the act itself as to become part of the res gestæ. The rule is thus laid down by Greenleaf: 'Declarations, to become a part of the res gestæ, must have been made at the time of the act done which they are supposed to characterize, and have been well calculated to unfold the nature and quality of the facts which they were intended to explain, and so to harmonize with them as obviously to constitute one transaction.' Greenl. § 108, note 1. One of the cases relied on to support the contention of appellee that this evidence was admissible as part of the res gestæ is Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Herrick, 49 Ohio St. 25, 29 N. E. 1052, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 8. In that case a witness was permitted to testify that on the morning defendant in error left his hotel, he said to witness, who was a clerk, that he was going to Collins. He was injured while on his way to the train that ran to Collins. In its opinion the court says: 'Was his declaration that he was going to Collins competent evidence of that fact? That depends on whether the declaration was contemporaneous with and explanatory of the act of departure. One departing from home may have in view any conceivable place or any conceivable purpose as his destination or object. The act of departure is thus in itself of the most ambiguous character. It does not afford the slightest clue to the object of the journey. It is natural and usual, according to the natural experience of mankind, that the party should say something respecting his departure of an explanatory character. Declarations thus made are part of the act itself. Where the evidence shows the party is about to start on a journey, from common experience we know it is usual and natural that something is said by the party relating to the departure, and of a character indicative or explanatory. For such declarations to be admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ, they must be made in connection with an act proven, as in the case above cited. The rule is that the res gestæ generally remains with the locus in quo, and it does not follow the parties after the principal act is completed. The authorities to which we are cited in argument are principally those in which the declarations sought to be considered were made after the act or injury with which they are attempted to be connected. The rule is, in determining whether or not declarations made before or after the principal act are to be considered as part of the res gestæ, lapse of time is taken into consideration, and such declarations made after the principal act will not be considered as part of the res gestæ if there is any change from the place of occurrence of the principal act or in the condition of the parties. The evident reason of the rule is that in such event an opportunity for fabrication might be given, or testimony might be manufactured by interested parties. Whether or not such act or declarations will be so considered must depend upon the circumstances of each case. The real test is whether the principal act and the declarations sought to be considered as part of the res gestæ are separated from each other by such a lapse of time as to render it probable that the parties are speaking from designing purposes rather than instinctive impulse. It can be stated as the general rule, that anything said or done before the principal act occurred, or was within the contemplation of the parties, cannot be regarded as part of the res gestæ, although only separated by the least possible span of time, unless it tends to explain and unfold the principal act by the undesigned act or declaration of the party, for the reason that such declaration or act could not be said to throw any light upon the motives of the parties. A person desiring to commit suicide might, an hour before the act, declare that he intended to become a passenger upon a train, when, as a matter of fact, no such intention existed in his mind, but the only intention there existing might be to go to a passenger station where trains were passing, for the purpose of taking his own life. Such declaration, therefore, made an hour, or any other space of time, previous to the act of departure itself would afford no light upon his intention, and could not be considered as evidence unless immediately connected with the act of departure. In the case of Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Herrick, supra, the declaration was connected with the act of leaving the hotel. The declaration was not made in connection with an preparation for a space of time previous to the act of departure for the train, but was immediately connected with the act of departure itself. In the case at bar, at the time the declarations which were sought to be admitted as evidence were made, the decedent was getting her children ready for school and performing her ordinary household duties, and while so doing she declared an intention of going to the city of Chicago. This declaration was not connected with the act of departure itself, and was not admissible. To admit such declaration as constituting a part of the res gestæ would, on the same principle, hold admissible a like declaration made the day or a week before. Such a declaration, therefore, made to the witness Stangan, was not competent as part of the res gestæ, and it was error to admit it."

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Respondent brought her action under the Federal employers' liability act, to recover for the death of her minor son, who was a hostler's helper in appellant's employ in its Interbay yards, Seattle. The accident resulting in the death of the minor, Charles Hargraves, happened about 7 A. M., November 16, 1912. The deceased was a member of the night crew, and had been assisting in preparing the engines to go out upon the road, by providing them with fuel, oil, sand, and water. His work was ended at 7 o'clock, when the day crew came on duty. The last work he was engaged in concerning which there was no dispute was putting sand in an engine which then stood at the sand house. There is some dispute as to whether the sand was being placed in the dome of the engine or behind the fire box door, but this is immaterial, as it is apparent that, whether the sand was being placed in the dome or in the rear of the cab, it would not call for deceased's presence at the place where he was when he received his injury. At this time engine 960 was standing on the roundhouse track, and a switch engine was standing on a storehouse track connecting with the roundhouse track, so close to the frog that it was not in the journey, or to go to a particular place, explanatory of the object he has in view in so setting out, is res gestæ evidence, and may be proven; and the jury may give it such weight as they think it entitled to."

And declarations of deceased made just before he boarded defendant's train and immediately preceding the occurrence of the accident causing his death, touching his purpose in going on the train, were held admissible as part of the res gestæ in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State, 81 Md. 371, 32 Atl. 201. In this case the declarations of deceased expressed his intention of going to Washington. The court said: "Such declarations of the decedent, made at the very moment of time immediately preceding the act of the defendant company by which he lost his life, form part of the res gestæ, and were properly admissible. In support of this view, Mr. Greenleaf in his work on Evidence, vol. 1, § 108, pointedly observes that the affairs of men consist of a complication of circumstances so intimately interwoven as to be hardly separable from each other. Each owes its birth to some preceding circumstances, and in its turn becomes the prolific parent of others: and each, during its existence, has its inseparable attributes and its kindred facts materially affecting its character, and essential to L.R.A.1915B.

be known in order to a right understanding of its nature. These surrounding circumstances, constituting parts of the res gestæ, may always be shown to the jury along with the principal fact; and their admissibility is determined by the judge according to the degree of their relation to that fact, and in the exercise of his sound discretion, it being extremely difficult, if not impossible, to bring this class of cases within the limits of a more particular description.' The plaintiff was entitled to this testimony as having an important bearing upon the right of the decedent to be upon the defendant's property, and pass over a customary way to the ticket office of the defendant, for the purpose of purchasing a ticket over its road to Washington."

And in Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Spencer, 25 Colo. 9, 52 Pac. 211, for the purpose of showing that deceased was upon the depot grounds of defendant at the time the accident occurred, to meet his daughter-in-law, who was expected to arrive on defendant's train, witnesses were permitted to testify over defendant's objection that they heard him make arrangement to that effect with her a few days previously. It was insisted that this testimony was mere hearsay, and therefore inadmissible. But, sustaining its admissibility as res gestæ, the clear. Engine 960 was being prepared for passenger service, and at the proper time was supposed to back down to the depot, when the switch engine was to take its place and obtain its supply of sand and water. For some reason, upon which the evidence is in conflict, engine 960 moved forward a short distance until its pilot collided with the footboard at the rear of the switching engine. At the time of the collision, Hargraves was standing on the pilot of engine 960, and received injuries resulting in his death. It seems to be admitted that, because of the amount of steam from the engines, Hargraves's position upon the pilot of 960 could not be seen by the crew of either engine, and there is no contention that the engineer or the fireman of either engine knew he was on the pilot. As above stated, the last work of the deceased, prior to his getting upon the pilot, was assisting in filling up the sand box. The only positive testimony is that, after completing this work, Hargraves pulled a plank which connected the sand house platform with the running board of the engine upon which they were at work, back to the platform, and was standing on the platform, while another hostler's helper who had been assisting him went to the water tank near by to perform other duties. The next appearance of Hargraves was on the ground near to the pilot of engine 960. How he got there or what he was doing there no one seems to know. He was then seen to step upon the pilot of engine 960 as it moved forward, facing the rear and then turning around towards the roundhouse. No one knows why he stepped upon the pilot, nor do any of those who saw him testify that he was doing anything when the engine moved forward. Some of those standing near saw the probability of a collision with the switch engine and shouted a warning, to which he paid no attention, either not hearing or not heeding it. So far as we can discover from this record, Hargraves had no duties to perform which would take him upon the pilot of the engine at this time, and the reason for his presence there is a matter of conjecture. It is shown that there was a rule posted in the roundhouse forbidding employees to ride on engine pilots, and that in addition to this rule Hargraves, who had been in the employ of the company for only about a month, had on two occasions been told by the hostler not to ride on the pilot. If the deceased was at work at the time he received his injury, in the performance of some required duty, this verdict must be sustained. With that view we have carefully examined the record to ascertain, if possible, what the deceased was doing upon the pilot, or what he purposed to do when he went there; and we can find nothing which refutes the positive testimony that he had no duties to perform which would take him there, or of those eyewitnesses to his position on the pilot that he was not performing any at the time. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff gives it as his opinion, or, as he court said: "The conversation testified to was explanatory of, and so connected with, the act of deceased in going to the depot grounds on that particular occasion, as to become a part of the res gestæ, and admissible as illustrative of that act. The circumstances under which the declaration was made exclude the idea that it was designed to serve any other than the purpose indicated, and we think clearly comes within the following definition of res gestæ as given by Mr. Wharton: "The res gestæ may be therefore defined as those circumstances which are automatic and undesigned incidents of a particular litigated act, and which are admissible when illustrative of such act. These incidents may be separated from the act by a lapse of time more or less appreciable; they may consist, as we will see, of sayings and doings of anyone absorbed in the event, whether participant or bystander; they may comprise things left undone, as well as things done; their sole distinguishing feature is that they must be the automatic and necessary incidents of the litigated act,—necessary in this sense, that they are part of the immediate preparation for, or emanations of, such act, and are not produced by the calculated policy of the actors." Wharton, Ev. § 259. We think this testimony was properly admitted."

This was the law on this phase of the case on a second appeal, 27 Colo. 313, 51 L.R.A. 121, 61 Pac. 606, where it was also held that a third person was competent to testify as to such conversation between the deceased and the relative mentioned.

And upon the issue whether deceased was a passenger on a steam railroad at the time he was killed, his statement, upon leaving the house in a hurry, after having looked according to his custom to see if the electric cars upon which he usually traveled were running, that he was going to take the train as there were no electric cars running, was held admissible in Inness v. Boston, R. B. & L. R. Co. 168 Mass. 433, 47 N. E. 193, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 42, to show the state of his mind, within the established exception to the rule against hearsay.

A person who was present when others started out upon a drive, during which they came into collision with a railroad train upon a railroad crossing and were injured, may be permitted to testify as to what was said when they were about to depart as to where they were going, such testimony being a part of the res gestæ, and not mere hearsay. Cincinnati, I. St. L. & C. R. Co. v. Howard, 124 Ind. 280, 8 L.R.A. 593, 19 Am. St. Rep. 96, 24 N. E. 892. W. W. A.

puts it, "my idea," that after the plank used in filling the sand box was taken down, Hargraves walked along the running board to the front of the engine and then stepped down to the pilot, supporting his theory by saying he did not have the time to get down to the ground and walk around to the front end of the engine. But this is only speculation, and is refuted by the testimony of a number of witnesses who saw him step from the ground to the pilot as the engine moved forward. Another theory offered by respondent is that deceased was on the pilot for the purpose of oiling a relief valve. Neither of these theories is supported by any testimony. They are nothing more than conjectures as to what he might have been doing. On the other hand, the testimony of all those who saw Hargraves just before he received his injury is, not only that he was standing on the ground when engine 960 started to move, and that he stepped upon the pilot from the ground, but that he had no oil can or other appliance in his hand. This is supported by testimony that it was no part of his duty, or of the hostler's crew, to oil the relief valve, and that he had no access to the lubricating oil. If there was any conflicting testimony upon this point, the jury might have disregarded this testimony as we have referred to it, and found otherwise. But respondent offers no conflicting testimony; she contents herself with testimony that is purely speculative, and points out only what he might have been doing. We do not think the jury, without supporting testimony, should be permitted to speculate as to what Hargraves might have been doing, when the testimony of all the eyewitnesses points clearly to what he was doing; nor that they should theorize as to how he reached his position on the pilot, when there is no conflict on that point. Long v. McCabe & Hamilton, 52 Wash. 422, 100 Pac. 1016; Scarpelli v. Washington Water Power Co. 63 Wash. 18, 114 Pac. 870.

Appellant also offers testimony to the effect that it would be impossible to oil a relief valve of the type on engine 960 from the place where deceased stood, or with the engine standing still. The deceased was 5 feet 8 inches tall. The relief valve upon the engine was 8 feet from where he stood. Appellant's testimony is all to the effect that the relief valve could not be reached by Hargraves from the position in which he stood. This is not only the evidence of appellant, but a locomotive engineer introduced by respondent for the purpose of giving expert testimony admits that the relief valve on this engine could not be reached by a person standing in the position of Hargraves. The only testimony we can find as to oiling relief valves from the pilot is that of one witness, who says it could be done by standing on the pilot beam and leaning over and holding onto a brace. But the evidence shows that Hargraves was standing on the footboard, and not on the pilot beam. Had he been on the pilot beam, he would not have been injured, as the impact of the collision was very slight, resulting in no appreciable damage to either engine. Another witness testified that this type of valve could be oiled with the engine standing still, by taking a wrench and turning the valve up, putting a stick under the cap of the steam chest, pushing the plunger down, and pouring in oil. This testimony is all speculative so far as it furnishes any guide to what Hargraves was doing, and is in direct conflict with the testimony of all those who were present at the time and testified to what he was actually doing at the time. It might have been done in the manner described by this witness, but there is no evidence that Hargraves was making any such attempt. He had neither oil can, wrench, nor stick, and in addition had changed his position so that his back was toward the relief valve. Counsel for respondent in his argument asks, "If he was not oiling the engine, why was he there?" As we view the law, it is incumbent upon respondent to show what Hargraves was doing, and that at the time of his injury he was in the performance of some duty owing to the appellant, and not for appellant to make some affirmative showing to relieve it from liability. From the record, the only possible answer to the question is that he was not oiling the relief valve, and his purpose in stepping upon the pilot is a pure guess.

After the injury to Hargraves he was taken to the hospital, where his mother arrived about 10:30, shortly before his death. She was interrogated as to his condition while she was there, and the record of her testimony is in part as follows:

Q. Was he fully conscious when you got there?

A. No, he was only semiconscious. At the same time, if I spoke to him I was able to kind of bring him to for a minute. He seemed to know me, but immediately he was gone again. He raved continually, about his work principally.

Q. Did he seem to be fully conscious?

A. I believed he was when I spoke to him first.

Q. What did he say to you when you got there, Mrs. Hobbs? (Counsel for appellant here made an objection which, after some discussion on the part of respective counsel, was overruled, and the question was renewed.)

Q. Just state what your son said to you, Mrs. Hobbs, as to what he was doing at the time he was injured.

A. He told me that he was applying oil to the relief valve.

Q. What did he say in regard to its being the last work that he had to do?

A. He said, "Mamma, I was just finishing. I was applying oil to the relief valve, and then I was through."

The admission of this testimony is now urged as error. If admissible at all, it can only be upon the theory that it was part of the res gestæ, since dying declarations are admissible as such only in cases of felonious homicide. It is difficult to define the doctrine of res gestæ so as to fit every case in which it is sought to be applied. The distinguishing feature of statements or declarations admissible under this rule is that they should be the necessary incidents of the litigated act; necessary in this sense, that they are part of the immediate preparation for or emanations of such act. Such incidents, whether acts or declarations, become in this way evidence of the character of the main act as illustrating or explaining that act. Jones, Ev. § 344.

In Henry v. Seattle Electric Co. 55 Wash. 444, 104 Pac. 776, we laid down this rule: "In order to be a part of the res gestæ, the subsequent declaration must explain or in some way characterize the main fact. It must not be the narration of a past event, nor the expression of an opinion."

What was the "main fact" or "things done" in this case? The only possible answer is the coming together of these two engines and the consequent injury to Hargraves. This was the litigated fact upon which it was sought to establish the cause of action. The declaration of Hargraves did not explain nor characterize this main fact. It offered no explanation of the reason why the engines came together. It in no way characterizes what happened when they did come together. It illustrated neither cause nor effect. It can only be characterized as a statement of what Hargraves was doing just prior to the accident, in no way connected with it; and as such it was a narration of a past event. The mere fact that, if Hargraves had survived his injuries and sought recovery against appellant, it would have been competent for him to testify to what he was doing at the time, does not establish its admissibility as a part of the res gestæ. The admissibility L.R.A.1916D.

of evidence is not to be determined by such a test, for witnesses oftentimes testify to facts which those to whom they have related them may not testify to without violating the rule against hearsay evidence. For these reasons we are of the opinion that this evidence was improperly admitted, and that it cannot be considered in determining the question submitted by this appeal.

One of the leading cases upon this point, cited as authoritative by the courts and text writers, is Waldele v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 274, 47 Am. Rep. 41, where a deaf mute was fatally injured by one of defendant's trains. About thirty minutes after the accident he made certain statements to his brother, to which, over objection, the brother testified as follows: "John said he got hit. John said there was a long train; that he stood waiting for it to go, and an engine followed and struck him."

The admission was held error, and the declaration on part of the res gestæ; the court giving as its reason for the holding that the res gestæ was the accident; that the declarations were not part of that, did not characterize it, nor throw any light upon it, but were purely narrative, giving an account of a transaction wholly past, and depending for their truth wholly upon the accuracy and reliability of the deceased and the verity of the witness who testified to it. The court then enters upon a discussion of the rule, reviewing many cases supporting these declarations. If the declaration in that case was the narration of a past event and not admissible as part of the res gestæ, how can we otherwise characterize the declaration in this case? There the declaration was as to what happened just prior to the accident, but not explaining it; here the declaration is of the same nature. In that case the deceased stated that he was waiting for a long train to pass, and was struck by an engine following; here the declaration was that he was applying oil to the relief valve and then he was through. Each case narrates a past event which must be covered by the same rule. If there is any distinction between the two cases in respondent's favor, it is to be found in the cited case, because of the fact that the declaration there is stronger in favor of her contention in that it contained a statement that the deceased was struck by an engine following the long train, and to that extent might be said to state the cause of the injury, were it not narrative in character. But the case before us is that much weaker, in that it does not purport to explain the accident nor il-illustrate it. Many authorities might be cited, but the following are sufficient to illustrate the rule here applicable. Steinhofel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 92 Wis. 123, 65 N. W. 852; Johnston v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 23 Or. 94, 31 Pac. 283; Tennis v. Inter-State Consol. Rapid Transit R. Co. 45 Kan. 503, 25 Pac. 876; Corder v. Talbott, 14 W. Va. 277; Wagner v. H. Clausen & Son Brewing Co. 146 App. Div. 70, 130 N. Y. Supp. 584; Gebus v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 22 N. D. 29, 132 N. W. 227; Kehan v. Washington R. & Electric Co. 28 App. D. C. 108; Jones, Ev. § 345; note to Walters v. Spokane International R. Co. 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 918.

Respondent cites the following cases from this court as sustaining the admissibility of this declaration: Roberts v. Port Blakeley Mill Co. 30 Wash. 25, 70 Pac. 111, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 372; Starr v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 41 Wash. 199, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 636, 83 Pac. 113; Walters v. Spokane International R. Co. 58 Wash. 203, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 917, 108 Pac. 593; Riggs v. Northern P. R. Co. 60 Wash. 292, 111 Pac. 162. In each of these cases the statement admitted in some way explained the accident and cause of the injury, and was for this reason held to be within the rule. This declaration makes no attempt to explain the accident causing the injury, and hence the same reasoning would not apply.

One of the questions in the case is whether the deceased was injured while acting within the scope of his employment. Respondent contends that, this action being under the Federal employers' liability act, the statute renders such question immaterial, and that the only test is, Was the employee injured while employed by a carrier engaged in interstate commerce? The Federal act does not give a cause of action to the employee for injuries not occasioned by negligence, and no recovery can be had under this act by simply showing the injury, and that at the time the injured servant was engaged in interstate commerce. The rule of liability against a railway company engaged in interstate commerce is predicated upon the duty of the company to furnish its servant with a reasonably safe place in which to perform the work it requires of him, or while he is about those places which are incident to his work, and this duty is incident to all places where the employee must necessarily be in connection with his employment. But that duty is not incident to places where a servant is not required to be, nor expected to be, in the performance of his work. Nor does it cover the servant when he is not within the scope of his employment, or doing some act which is not incidental to his employment. This rule is sustained by all the authorities, and the Federal act in nowise attempts to change it. Unless the evidence in this case shows that the deceased was upon the pilot of this engine in the discharge of some duty required by the railway company, then the railway company owed him no duty except to avoid injuring him after it discovered his perilous position. Such is so clearly the law that it will not be doubted, and no authorities need be cited to sustain it. There is no evidence in this record that the deceased was required to do any act which would place him upon the pilot of the engine. All the evidence on this subject is to the contrary. So far as we can find, whatever it was that caused him to step upon the pilot, it was his own purpose, not in any way connected with his work as a hostler's helper. If it was his purpose to engage in any task, so far as this record goes, in so doing he was a volunteer without appellant's direction or knowledge, and so far as the law is concerned the result is the same. If we could find anything in the evidence which would justify a different conclusion, however meager it might be, we would submit to the verdict as determinative of the fact. But we cannot find it, and, such being the case, however unfortunate or distressing the circumstances may be, it is our duty to so hold.

The lower court should have sustained appellant's challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence and given judgment in its favor. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment in favor of appellant.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT OF APPEALS.

GEORGE R. ROBINSON, Appt.,
v.

BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

(40 App. D. C. 169.)

Master and servant — Federal employers' liability act — Pullman porter.

1. A Pullman porter is not an employee of the railroad hauling the car on which he is employed, so as to come within the provision of the Federal employers' liability act invalidating contracts by which carriers attempt to exempt themselves from the liability to their employees created by that act.

Same — contract for indemnity — relinquishment of right of action.

2. One who, when employed as a Pullman porter, agrees to protect the Pullman Company in its contracts by which it undertakes to indemnify railroad companies against liability for injuries to Pullman employees, deprives himself of the right to maintain an action against the railroad company for injuries received in the course of his employment.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Supreme Court in favor of defendant, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while engaged in the performance of his duties as a Pullman porter. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alexander Wolf and Levi H. David for appellant.

Messrs. George E. Hamilton, John J. Hamilton, and John W. Yerkes, for appellee:

Plaintiff, at the time of the injury, was not, as a matter of law or fact, an employee of the railroad company, and therefore none of the provisions of the employers' liability act can be invoked and enforced in his behalf.

Mr. Justice Van Orsdel delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by appellant, George R. Robinson, in the supreme court of the District of Columbia against defendant, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, to recover damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff on April 10, 1910, while engaged in the performance of his duties as a Pullman porter. At the time of the accident he was the porter in charge of a car belonging to the Pullman Company which formed part of a train of defendant company operating in interstate commerce between Washington, District of Columbia, and Wheeling, West Virginia. On the trial below, when the testimony on behalf of plaintiff had been given, the court, on motion of counsel for defendant, instructed the jury to return a verdict for defendant. From the judgment thereon, the case comes here on appeal.

It appears that on August 21, 1905, plaintiff made written application to the Pullman Company for employment as a Pullman-car porter. In the following November, he was taken into the service of the Pullman Company, signing a written contract as a condition of his employment, the material provisions of which are as follows:

"Fourth. I assume all risks of accidents or casualties by railway travel or otherwise, incident to such employment and service, and hereby, for myself, my heirs, executors, administrators or legal representatives, forever release, acquit, and discharge the Pullman Company, and its officers and employees, from any and all claims for liability of any nature or character whatsoever on account of any personal injury or death to me in such employment or service.

"Fifth. I am aware that said the Pullman Company secures the operation of its cars upon lines of railroad, and hence my opportunity for employment, by means of contracts, wherein said the Pullman Company agrees to indemnify the corporations or persons owning or controlling such lines of railroad against liability on their part to the employees of said the Pullman Company in cases provided for in such contracts, and I do hereby ratify all such contracts,

road company from liability for negligent injury to sleeping car employees or others sustaining a similar relation to the company, see notes to Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Whan, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 432, and Coleman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 60 L.R.A.(N.S.) 432.

made or to be made by said the Pullman Company, and do agree to protect, indemnify, and hold harmless said the Pullman Company with respect to any and all sums of money it may be compelled to pay or liability it may be subject to, under any such contract, in consequence of any injury or death happening to me, and this agreement may be assigned to any such corporation or person and used in its defense.

"Sixth. I will obey all rules and regulations made or to be made for the government of their own employees by the corporations or persons over whose lines of railroad the cars of said the Pullman Company may be operated while I am traveling over said lines in the employment or service of said the Pullman Company; and I expressly declare that while so traveling I shall not have the rights of a passenger with respect to such corporations or persons, which rights I do expressly renounce; and I hereby, for myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, or legal representatives, forever release, acquit, and discharge any and all such corporations and persons from all claims for liability of any nature or character whatsoever on account of any personal injury or death to me while in said employment or service."

This appeal turns upon two questions:

First: Was plaintiff, at the time of the injury, an employee of defendant railroad company, and, as such, entitled to maintain his action under the provisions of the employers' liability act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. 65, chap. 149, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 8657)?

Second: Does the contract of employment between plaintiff and the Pullman Company constitute a bar to recovery against the railroad company?

Section 1 of the act of 1908 provides: "That every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several states or territories, or between any of the several states and territories, or between the District of Columbia, and any of the states or territories, . . . shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, . . . resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, road-bed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment." It is unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the rules of construction applicable to this act. While it is in derogation of the common law, it should be construed so as to give effect to the evident intent of Congress. Johnson v. Southern P. Co. 196 U. S. 1, 49 L. ed. 363, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 412. It applies broadly to any employee of a railroad company injured while engaged in interstate commerce. Of course, if plaintiff was in the employ of defendant at the time of the accident, he would be entitled to maintain his action under § 5 of the act of 1908, irrespective of the contract of employment. Hence, the case turns solely upon the nature of plaintiff's employment.

The contract between the Pullman Company and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, whereby the latter company agreed to operate parlor and sleeping cars, was substantially a contract on the part of the railroad company to haul the cars of the Pullman Company. The material stipulations of the agreement were that the Pullman Company should "furnish sleeping and parlor cars properly equipped and acceptable to the railroad company sufficient . . . to meet the requirements of travel over" the railroad company's lines; that the Pullman Company should keep its cars in good order and repair; that it should "have the right to collect from the occupants of Pullman cars, for the use of seats and berths therein, such fares as are customary on competing lines of railroad," and that the Pullman Company should "furnish agents or inspectors to supervise the conduct of employees, cleanliness of cars, etc., while enroute, and the railroad company will transport free over its own lines the employees, agents, or inspectors" of the Pullman Company. The railroad company agreed that its ticket agents, at such offices as should be agreed upon, should "sell tickets for seats and berths in such cars without charge to the Pullman Company;" that "the railroad company shall haul the cars furnished by the Pullman Company under this agreement on its passenger trains in such manner as may be necessary to meet the requirements of travel," and "shall not be entitled to receive compensation from the Pullman Company for the movement of cars furnished under this agreement."

The Pullman Company employed plaintiff in the capacity of porter, and he was acting as such in one of the company's cars at the time he was injured. The car was not operated nor controlled by defendant. Defendant, under its agreement with the Pullman Company, was simply hauling the car. True, it was hauled for the accommodation of the passengers traveling upon defendant's train; but the railroad company assumed no responsibility for the management of the car or its equipment. The Pullman Company sold passengers the tickets which entitled them to the privileges of its car. The proceeds went to the Pullman Company. Its conductor and porter looked after the accommodation of the passengers while in and about the car. In fact, so far as the control of the car was concerned, it was as complete as if the entire train had been operated by the Pullman Company. The railroad company in its contract with its passengers did nothing that limited the Pullman Company's control of its cars. The duty which the railroad company assumed to carry its passengers safely, whether in its cars or in the cars of the Pullman Company, arose from its contract in the sale of tickets entitling them to transportation, and not from their purchase from the Pullman Company of tickets entitling them to the additional privilege of riding in its cars.

Plaintiff insists that at the time of the accident he stood in the relation of an employee of defendant company, and bases his contention chiefly upon a suggestion in the decision in the case of Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Voigt, 176 U. S. 498, 44 L. ed. 560, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 385. In that case, an express messenger had been injured through the alleged negligence of the railroad company. As a condition of his employment by the express company he had executed a release exempting the railroad company from liability for injuries he might sustain as an express messenger on the railroad. The release was held to constitute a bar to recovery against the railroad company. Importance is attached, however, to the following statement of the court: "The relation of an express messenger to the transportation company, in cases like the present one, seems to us to more nearly resemble that of an employee than that of a passenger. His position is one created by an agreement between the express company and the railroad company, adjusting the terms of a joint business,—the transportation and delivery of express matter. His duties of personal control and custody of the goods and packages, if not performed by an express messenger, would have to be performed by one in the immediate service of the railroad company. And, of course, if his position was that of a common employee of both companies, he could not recover for injuries caused, as would appear to have been the present case, by the negligence of fellow servants."

It will be observed that the court did not say that the express messenger was an employee of the railroad company. In distinguishing his position from a passenger it said it seemed to "more nearly resemble that of an employee than that of a passenger." The same distinction was made as to a Pullman porter by this court in Hughson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 2 App. D. C. 98, where it was held that a Pullman porter was not an employee of the railroad company. The court, speaking through Chief Justice Alvey, said: "But though the plaintiff was not a servant of the railroad company, and therefore not a coservant with the employees of that company, and consequently not subject to the principle of nonliability of the master for the negligence of his servant producing an injury to a fellow servant, yet the plaintiff was not a passenger in any such sense as to require of the railroad company the highest degree of skill and care in the construction and maintenance of its roadway and machinery, and the operation of its road and the running of its trains, such as are required in the case of a passenger."

In their relation to the railroad company, we think there is a marked distinction between an express messenger and a Pullman porter. As was suggested in the Voigt Case, the express messenger occupied a position created by agreement between the express company and the railroad company. He performed duties which, if not performed by him, would have to be performed by the railroad employees. Express matter, when received by the railroad company under its contract with the express company, like freight, has to be handled and cared for. If not looked after by the agents of the express company, the duty would devolve upon the employees of the railroad company. Not so with a Pullman car. It is a vehicle of a common carrier independent of the railroad company. The mere fact that the Pullman Company employs the railroad company to haul its cars does not affect its relation to the public. The railroad company is not under obligation to haul Pullman cars, as it is at common law to carry passengers and freight. Russell v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 157 Ind. 305, 55 L.R.A. 253, 87 Am. St. Rep. 214, 61 N. E. 678. Passengers occupy Pullman cars under contract with the Pullman Company, and not the railroad company. The service rendered by the porter forms no part of the contractual duty of the railroad company to its passengers. "It is no part of the contract or obligation of a common carrier of passengers to furnish berths, or the services of a porter to make up beds or perform other services for passengers. The passenger pays the Pullman Company for the services performed by it, and not the railroad company, and if one desires such services as are rendered by the Pullman Company and its porter he must contract with that company for them." Chi-ago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler, 215 Ill. 525, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 674, 106 Am. St. Rep. 187, 74 N. E. 705, 1 Ann. Cas. 42. On the other hand, the porter performs no service connected with the operation of the train by the railroad company. In fact, when a passenger purchases a berth in a Pullman car he must look entirely to the Pullman Company for the services of a porter. In 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 994, the rule is laid down that, "where a palace car is run as part of a train under a contract between the palace car company and the railroad company, the employees of the two companies are not, it has been held, fellow servants," citing Hughson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. supra. This rule has been followed in McDermon v. Southern P. Co. 122 Fed. 669, Russell v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. and Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Hamler, supra; Denver & R. G. R. Co. v. Whan, 39 Colo. 230, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 432, 89 Pac. 39, 12 Ann. Cas. 732.

Counsel for plaintiff place strong reliance upon the decision in the case of Oliver v. Northern P. R. Co. 196 Fed. 432. In that case the railroad company and the Pullman Company were the joint owners of the Pullman car in which Oliver, the porter, was killed. The car was owned by the two companies under a contract which, among other things, provided: "The cars owned jointly by the railroad company and the Pullman Company shall be known as association cars, the Pullman Company having the management thereof; and all obligations of the Pullman Company with respect to the operation of said cars shall be assumed and borne by the Association. . . . The Association shall furnish with each of such sleeping cars, one or more employees, as may be required, whose duties shall be to collect fares from passengers occupying such cars, for the use of seats or berths, and generally to wait upon and provide for the comfort of passengers therein; such employees at all times to be subject to the rules of the railroad company governing its own employees. The Association shall also furnish employees who shall have charge of all the sleeping cars used under this contract." Distinguishing that case from the cases of the class to which the one at bar belongs, the court said: "The relations existing between the railway company and the Pullman Company in this case, and consequently the relations existing between the railway company and the porter on the Pullman car, differ widely from those disclosed in the numerous cases cited in argument, where it was held that a porter on a Pullman car was not an employee of the railroad company over whose tracks the Pullman car was operated." After discussing the contract by which the Association, consisting of the Pullman Company and the railway company, had been formed, the court further said: "It will thus be seen that the railway company was the owner of a half interest in the Pullman car upon which the deceased porter was employed, and that the deceased was employed by an Association of which the railway company was a part. True, the Pullman Company was the manager for the Association, but in that respect it was simply an agent for the railway company. Stripped of matters of mere form, the railway company and the Pullman Company operated this car jointly for their joint benefit, and employed the porter jointly." It thus appears that there is no such analogy between the two cases as will afford any relief to plaintiff.

This brings us to the contract of employment. It is not in conflict with § 5 of the act of 1908, which provides: "That any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void." This provision must be construed in relation to the act which relates alone to railroad employees engaged in interstate commerce. Plaintiff, not occupying that relation to defendant, cannot avail himself of it to defeat his contract of employment. Stripped, therefore, of all connection with the act of 1908, the contract of employment furnishes a complete bar to plaintiff's right to recover in this action. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Voigt, 176 U. S. 498, 44 L. ed. 560, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 385.

There is no importance to be attached to the mere fact that after the execution of the contract of employment plaintiff's salary was increased, and he was assigned the additional duty of occasionally collecting railroad tickets. This did not relieve him from the obligations of his contract. It did not affect his waiver of right to maintain this action against defendant company. He was originally employed as a Pullman porter, and at the time of the alleged accident still retained that position.

The other errors assigned are of no importance, and will not be considered. The judgment is affirmed with costs.

A print, or package of butter shall contain 16 ounces avoirdupois, and when a print or package of butter containing less than 16 ounces avoirdupois shall be sold its net weight shall be disclosed by the seller to the buyer, or a statement of the net weight be made upon a label attached thereto.

"Sec. 15. A person who, by himself or by his servant or agent, or as the servant or the agent of another, uses a weight, measure, balance or measuring device that is false and does not conform to the authorized standard for determining the quantity of any commodity or article of merchandise, or sells or exposes for sale less than the quantity which he represents, or sells or offers for sale commodities in a manner contrary to law, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in a sum of not less than $5 nor more than $100, or by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than ninety days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. He shall also be liable to the injured party in double the amount of the property wrongfully taken or not given, and $10 in addition thereto, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction. The selling and delivery of any commodity or article of merchandise shall be prima facie evidence of representations on the part of the vendor that the quantity sold and delivered was the quantity bought by the vendee. There shall be taken into consideration the usual and ordinary leakage, evaporation or waste that there may be from the time the package is filled by the vendor until the selling of the same; a slight variation from the stated weight, measure or quantity for individual packages is permissible, provided this variation is as often above as below the weight, measure or quantity stated."

The first count of the amended complaint reads: "A. E. Ice, being duly sworn according to law, on oath says: That the said defendant on or about the 3d day of September, 1909, in the said county of Saline and state of Kansas, then and there did unlawfully expose for sale and sell and deliver to D. W. Witwer and J. C. Stevens, partners doing business under the firm name and style of Witwer & Stevens, one certain print and package of butter, which said print and package of butter, after taking into consideration the usual and ordinary leakage, evaporation, and waste from the time the same was filled until it was sold and exposed for sale as aforesaid, did not then and there weigh 16 ounces avoirdupois, and which said print and package of butter did not then and there have a label attached thereto with the net weight thereon, and the said defendant did not then and there disclose the net weight of said print and package of butter so sold and exposed for sale as aforesaid to the buyer thereof, and that the said defendant, the Belle Springs Creamery Company, is a corporation duly organized and doing business under the laws of the state of Kansas; contrary to the statutes in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas." Each of the other counts of the complaint is similar to the first count, except that other and different sales are alleged in each count from that specified in the first count.

In order to show that the state is exercising its police power in a reasonable and constitutional manner, the complaint should state the facts. It should state the weight of the package sold, and it would then be a question of law whether, assuming the statements of facts to be true, the statute has been violated.

Mr. Z. C. Millikin also for appellee.

Smith, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A number of objections made to the complaint are argued in the briefs together, and are, in substance, that the complaint is not sufficiently definite and certain as to the facts constituting the alleged offense herein charged. It is especially urged that the statute establishes a certain weight for a print or package of butter, and that the complaint does not inform the accused whether it was a print or a package which is alleged to have been sold short of such weight. It is a matter of common knowledge that formerly butter was retailed in prints of about 1 pound weight each; that more recently, for cleanliness and attractiveness, butter has been put up and sold in packages of about the same weight; and that at and before the passage of the act both (print and package) were generally understood as a measure of the same amount in weight—1 pound. The legislature, in passing the act of which the quoted sections are a part, is presumed to have used the terms in accordance with common usage. In fact, in the latter part of § 15 the word "package" is used in lieu of "print or package," and the word "packages" in lieu of "prints or packages." The act is entitled, "An Act Concerning Weights and Measures and the Regulation Thereof." Laws 1909, chap. 264. Section 14 establishes the size of a measure of butter, L.R.A.1915D.

whether the measure be called a print or a package. The words are used synonymously as to the quantity designated thereby. One measure was established under two well-recognized names. As in the sale of potatoes by measure, an abuse had arisen by the use of a measure of smaller content than was indicated to the public by the name of the measure used. To correct this abuse the statute in question was enacted. The objection is based upon the assumption that two different measures are designated by the act. The objection therefore is not tenable.

Several objections were urged which appear to be criticisms of the language of the complaint even where it follows the exact language of the statute in defining the crime. These objections we will not discuss seriatim. Suffice it to say that the statute is not susceptible of some of the constructions attempted to be placed upon it, and, while probably the crime is not defined therein as clearly as it might be, yet the definition seems to be intelligible, and the complaint follows closely the language thereof. It does not negative the proviso or exception in the last sentence of the section, of which we will speak later.

The objection that the complaint is bad for duplicity is completely answered in the case of State v. Sherman, 81 Kan. 874, 135 Am. St. Rep. 403, 107 Pac. 33. The exposing for sale and selling, as charged, appears to have been simultaneous and each as a part of one act.

Again, it is contended that even if the statute recites facts which constitute the offense, and if (as has been repeatedly held by this court) the complaint is sufficient so far as it follows the language of the statute in describing the offense, still this complaint is bad in that it does not negative the exception or provision contained in the last sentence of § 15, which reads: "A slight variation from the stated weight, measure or quantity for individual packages is permissible, provided this variation is as often above as below the weight, measure or quantity stated." Laws 1909, chap. 264, Gen. Stat. 1909, § 9752. This is in fact an independent sentence, although as punctuated in the statute it is separated only by a semicolon from the preceding sentence. It forms no part of the definition of the offense charged, but is a proviso, or, at most, an exception thereto. The provision simply excepts sales where the variation in weight is slight, and is as frequently above as below the weight expressly stated, or the weight implied in the absence of the required label. In such case it is not necessary to negative the exception. See State v. Thompson, 2 Kan. 432; Kansas City v. Garnier, 57 Kan. 412, 46 Pac. 707; State v. Thurman, 65 Kan. 90, 68 Pac. 1081; State v. Buis, 83 Kan. 273, 111 Pac. 189.

The more serious contentions in this case are: (1) That the statute in question is not in terms made applicable to corporations. (2) If intended to apply to corporations, it is in violation of § 17, art. 2, of the Constitution of Kansas for the reason that it cannot have a uniform operation throughout the state; the penalty prescribed being a fine or imprisonment in jail, or both, in the discretion of the court. (3) That the sections of the act in question are repugnant to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States in depriving persons of liberty and property without due process of law, etc.; the defendant being a resident of Kansas and of the United States.

As to the first objection, it is practically conceded by the defendant that if the statute in question had expressly or by clear intendment been made applicable to corporations, and had provided for a fine only, it would have been valid; also, that it devolves upon this court to determine what was the intention of the legislature in enacting the law as to whether or not it was to apply to corporations. It was formerly held that a corporation could only be indicted for a failure to perform some duty, and not for malfeasance; but it is now generally held that corporations may be indicted for malfeasance or misfeasance, and may be civilly held responsible for the acts of their officers and agents. In some of the states this is as far as the law has progressed. In some other states it is held that a corporation may be held criminally responsible for an act denounced by the statute, which does not include, as a necessary ingredient, wrongful intent; it being in some cases remarked that a corporation, having no soul, cannot have a criminal intent. As early as 1854 Justice Bigelow, in the opinion in the case of Com. v. New Bedford Bridge, 2 Gray, 339, said: "The indictment in the present case is for a nuisance. The defendants contend that it cannot be maintained against them, on the ground that a corporation, although liable to indictment for nonfeasance, or an omission to perform a legal duty or obligation, is not amenable in this form of prosecution for a misfeasance, or the doing of any act unlawful in itself and injurious to the rights of others. There are dicta in some of the early cases which sanction this broad doctrine, and it has been thence copied into text writers, and adopted to its full extent in a few modern decisions. But, if it ever had any foundation, it has L.R.A.1915D.

its origin at a time when corporations were few in number, and limited in their powers and in the purposes for which they were created. Experience has shown the necessity of essentially modifying it; and the tendency of the more recent cases in courts of the highest authority has been to extend the application of all legal remedies to corporations, and assimilate them, as far as possible, in their legal duties and responsibilities, to individuals. To a certain extent, the rule contended for is founded in good sense and sound principle. Corporations cannot be indicted for offenses which derive their criminality from evil intention, or which consist in a violation of those social duties which appertain to men and subjects. They cannot be guilty of treason or felony; of perjury or offenses against the person. But, beyond this, there is no good reason for their exemption from the consequences of unlawful and wrongful acts committed by their agents in pursuance of authority derived from them. Such a rule would, in many cases, preclude all adequate remedy, and render reparation for an injury committed by a corporation impossible; because it would leave the only means of redress to be sought against irresponsible servants, instead of against those who truly committed the wrongful act by commanding it to be done. There is no principle of law which would thus furnish immunity to a corporation. If they commit a trespass on private property, or obstruct a way, to the special injury and damage of an individual, no one can doubt their liability therefor. In like manner, and for the same reason, if they do similar acts to the inconvenience and annoyance of the public, they are responsible in the form and mode appropriate to the prosecution and punishment for such offenses. . . . If, therefore, the defendants have been guilty of a nuisance, by obstructing unlawfully a navigable stream, an indictment may well be maintained against them." (pp. 345, 346.)

Since the decision in that case the law has rapidly developed in favor of holding corporations criminally responsible for the commission of acts denounced as criminal by statutes, especially where a specific intent is not an essential ingredient of the crime. This has been held in several Federal decisions and by decisions in the courts of last resort in several of the states. In United States v. New York Herald Co. (C. C.) 159 Fed. 296, it is held: "A corporation has capacity to commit the crime of mailing obscene, nonmailable matter, prohibited by Rev. Stat. § 3893, as amended, p. 2658." (Syllabus.) A demurrer to the indictment in that case was overruled, although the penalty prescribed by the statute was a fine or imprisonment at hard labor, or both. It is further held in that case: "Rev. Stat. § 3893, as amended, describes certain nonmailable matter, and provides that any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, anything declared by the section to be nonmailable, shall for each offense be fined, on conviction, or imprisoned at hard labor, or both, etc. Held, that such section was applicable to a corporation organized for the purpose of publishing a newspaper, and that proof of the mailing by such corporation of its newspaper, containing obnoxious matter, was sufficient to show that the corporation had knowledge thereof." (Syllabus.)

It is said in People v. Palermo Land & Water Co. 4 Cal. App. 717, 89 Pac. 723: "There is no reasonable foundation in the nature of things or such intrinsic difference between corporations and natural persons of which I am aware that requires the application of a measure of jurisdiction over an offense committed by a corporation different from that to be invoked where an individual is charged with the same or similar crime."

It is said in Southern Exp. Co. v. State, 1 Ga. App. 700, 58 S. E. 87: "The responsibility of corporations for violation of penal laws, though developed by gradual evolution, is well settled and necessary. A corporation can be guilty of the offense of furnishing liquors to a minor, if such liquors be delivered to a minor by the agent of the corporation in the course of its business, or if such agent knowingly permits such delivery by another." (Syllabus.)

Among the states upholding the doctrine that a corporation may be indicted for misfeasance and for a violation of acts prohibited by statute, cited in 12 Century Dig. § 2138, are Illinois, Kentucky, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, and Tennessee. Other states, notably Indiana and Maryland, hold to the ancient doctrines that a corporation cannot be indicted for misfeasance. In several of the states cited there is a statutory provision that the word "person," where used in the criminal statute, includes corporations. There is no such provision in this state, and we do not find any decision in this state which so holds, although in the case of State v. Williams, 74 Kan. 180, 85 Pac. 938, it was said that the word "person" used in § 314 of crimes and punishments (Gen. Stat. 1909, § 2814), referring to the person libeled, includes a corporation. The question may well be asked, if the word "person" used to designate one libeled, includes a corporation, why it should not also include the corporation if the same word were used to designate the one guilty or supposed to be guilty of the libel. The statute in question (§ 15) by its language, "a person who, by himself, or his servant or agent, or as the servant or agent of another, uses," etc., seems almost to suggest that the word "person" here was intended to include a corporation. The statute was enacted to prevent a particular abuse, and it is a matter of common knowledge in the state that large corporations as well as individuals were practising the abuse of selling butter by print and package containing less weight than is required by the act, and, it may be said, of less weight than the public generally understood such prints or packages to contain. That the individual who, after the passage of the act, should expose for sale or sell a print or package of less than the prescribed weight, should be guilty of a crime; and that a corporation might conduct the practice with impunity, seems revolting to all ideas of justice, and we hold, in accordance with the general trend and development of the law, that the word "person," being the second word in Laws 1909, chap. 264, § 15, as there used, includes a corporation.

As to the second objection that the statute, if applied to corporations, cannot have uniform operation in the state, the question was involved in the New York Herald Case, supra, but seems not to have been considered of sufficient importance to merit discussion. In W. H. Small & Co. v. Com. 134 Ky. 272, 120 S. W. 361, it is said: "That an individual guilty of an offense may be both fined and imprisoned, and a corporation likewise guilty only fined, does not affect the validity of the statute. The apparent discrimination grows out of conditions that cannot be avoided, and the corporation that is favored by the discrimination cannot complain." It is true only the penalty of a fine can be applied to a corporation; whether the additional penalty of imprisonment in the jail should ever be applied to an individual is a matter that rests in the discretion of the court. There are many other instances where the same question will be raised; for instance, a corporation may be guilty of contempt of court and can only be fined, while an individual may be fined and imprisoned. 1 Clark & M. Priv. Corp. § 257; Telegram Newspaper Co. v. Com. 172 Mass. 294, 44 L.R.A. 159, 70 Am. St. Rep. 280, 52 N. E. 445.

The third contention that §§ 14 and 15 in question are void because in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, is likewise untenable.

They are upheld as police regulations, and such regulations of weights and measures have stood upon the statute books of this state practically during the entire existence of the state, and likewise in other states of the Union.

We conclude that the motion to quash the complaint should not have been sustained.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the case is remanded, with instructions to overrule the motion and proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

MERCHANTS' LEGAL STAMP COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM H. MURPHY et al.

Monopoly — trading stamp — contract.

Contracts by which one issues trading stamps to merchants, which, for the purpose of suppressing competition, prohibit them from using the stamps of others, and which enable him to control nearly 90 per cent of the trading stamp business in the locality, are within the operation of a statute declaring unlawful and void every agreement in violation of common law, if thereby a monopoly in the production or sale of any article or commodity tends to be created.

(March 1, 1915.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County, dismissing a bill filed to restrain defendants from soliciting the custom of plaintiff's customers as users of trading stamps, from soliciting trading stamps from customers of such customers, and from inducing or attempting to induce any of its customers to break its contracts with it. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Charles Connor and Lothrop Withington, with Messrs. Whipple, Sears, & Ogden, for appellant:

Contracts in restraint of trade are not invalid and void unless unreasonable or prohibited by statute.

MURPHY, the court basing its decision upon the MURPHY CASE, holding that the nature of plaintiff's contract was monopolistic in its tendency and therefore void, refused to grant relief against defendant, who was obtaining stamps in exchange for goods from customers of plaintiff who came into his store to trade, instead of buying them from the plaintiff.

In Sperry & H. Co. v. Fenster, 219 Fed. 755 (a decision of a Federal district court), L.R.A.1915D.

it appeared that the defendant had obtained plaintiff's trading stamps under conditions equivalent to a purchase from the subscribers for these stamps, and was giving them to his own customers and advertising to do so as an inducement to trade with him, which action plaintiff sought to enjoin, the injunction being resisted by defendant on the ground that plaintiff's practice of seeking to enjoin, or even in some jurisdictions to punish by prosecution, dealers who were using such trading stamps as an inducement to their customers to transact business with them without having subscribed for the right to do so, and without having obtained the stamps by payment therefor to the company issuing them, was contrary to the provisions of the laws forbidding monopoly. The court, in granting a temporary injunction, said that the intent and acts of persons taking the stamps and seeking to redeem them for a certain premium, and also the resultant benefits to that person, are entirely different, and are based upon substantially different, rights from those of a party who is seeking to attract customers and to build up him own trade through the privilege of dealing, as it were, in trading stamps, without payment for that privilege, and with no intention of getting the goods for which the stamps are redeemable; that the right to redeem the stamps is a property right transferable by possession, while the license to use them for advertising purposes is not transferable without compensation to the person granting that right. Referring to the Clayton law, approved by the President upon the 15th of October, 1914, which provides in § 3 against the making of a contract or fixing of a price for merchandise on condition that the lessee or purchaser shall not use or deal in the merchandise of a competitor, if the effect of this contract would be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly,—the court observed that the statute forbids the converse of the acts complained of in the present case: and that it had nothing to do with what might happen if the trading stamp people were seeking to forbid the use by its subscribers of any other kind of trading stamps; that that might or might not be a restriction upon competition or tend to effect a monopoly. It will be observed that the question which the court thus expressly refrained from passing upon is the one involved and decided in MERCHANTS' LEGAL STAMP CO. v. MURPHY.

In support of the distinction above made, the opinion in the Fenster Case referred to a decision by Judge Thomas in Sperry & H. Co. v. Benjamin, 221 Fed. 512, which is disposed of by a mere statement that an injunction was demanded both by reason and authority, and that the objection of multifariousness had been waived, without any discussion of the merits or even statement of the facts upon which the preliminary injunction was granted.

Various other phases of the subject of monopolies are treated in notes referred to in the Index to L.R.A. Notes under the title "Monopoly and Combinations."

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal, if not the sole, business of the plaintiff is the issuing of trading stamps to merchants at a fixed price, who give them to their customers for cash purchases usually on the basis of one stamp for every 10 cents of the price of the article bought, and after a number of stamps have been thus collected the merchant or collector presents them to the plaintiff for redemption at a fixed rate. By this arrangement the stamp or coupon operates as a discount in cash for every purchase made. Com. v. Sisson, 178 Mass. 578, 60 N. E. 385. The books containing the contract are described by the master as ruled off into spaces similar to stamp albums, into which the collectors, who are also the purchasers, paste the stamps, and the plaintiff redeems them at a lower price; the difference measures the company's profits. It is plain that the plaintiff is a trading stamp company, giving premiums or a valuable consideration for stamps furnished to purchasers of goods as an inducement for payment in cash. The master's report shows that under the operation of this system the plaintiff controls nearly 90 per cent of the actual business conducted in this form by the merchants of Boston and vicinity. By the provisions of the contract designed for this territory, the company retains title to the book and stamps with an agreement by the authorized merchant or customer not to part with them except in the specified course of trade, and to return the book with the stamps attached, which may have been presented to him by purchasers. If this is not done all rights under the contract cease or are forfeited. We said in O'Keeffe v. Somerville, 190 Mass. 110, 112 Am. St. Rep. 316, 76 N. E. 457, 5 Ann. Cas. 684, that trading stamps not being a commodity within the meaning of our Constitution, they were not subject to an excise tax, although no attempt was made to classify them. Nor is it necessary now to determine whether the contract is strictly a bailment (Hunt v. Wyman, 100 Mass. 198; Springfield Engine Stop Co. v. Sharp, 184 Mass. 266, 68 N. E. 224; Isaacs v. MacDonald, 214 Mass. 487, 102 N. E. 81), or whether the stamps are choses in action, (Sperry & H. Co. v. Hertzberg, 69 N. J. Eq. 264, 60 Atl. 368). The transaction is to be determined from its inherent character or purpose. If not goods, wares, or merchandise as those terms ordinarily are used, or the title did not vest in the purchaser, but he had only a limited use, they do represent and were intended to represent a mode of doing business which under modern mercantile conditions is in itself a business potentially affecting and largely controlling certain well recognized lines of trade. The books and stamps, when viewed in the light of their manufacture and use by the plaintiff, coupled with its contract treating them not as symbols, but as chattels of value, which are the subject of sale or of bailment, are to be deemed articles within the meaning of the Statute of 1908, chap. 454, § 1. It is expressly found that the plaintiff declines to supply stamps to merchants unless they stipulate not to use trading stamps issued by other companies or individuals, and that the insertion of this provision in the contract is to suppress all competition. The direct tendency of the plaintiff's system of business under all the findings results in such concentration as to substantially control prices for a form of service, or of supposed profits to purchasers, demanded by the public. Com. v. Strauss, 188 Mass. 229, 231, 74 N. E. 308. The scheme the plaintiff has so carefully elaborated and built up is in reality a devise whose predominant purpose, as shown by its practical and successful operation, tends to drive all competitors from the field. New York Bank Note Co. v. Kidder Press Mfg. Co. 192 Mass. 391, 403, 78 N. E. 463; United Shoe Machinery Co. v. La Chapelle, 212 Mass. 467, 480, 99 N. E. 289, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 715. The monopoly it seeks to establish may not be complete, but it has gone far enough to eliminate any effective rivalry. The restriction is not confined to the sale or transfer to a business rival of the plaintiff, but the merchant or collector cannot dispose of book or stamps to anyone, even if their retention unused must result in pecuniary loss. Indeed, this is an essential and controlling feature of the contract, which differs materially from the contract in Gagnon v. Sperry & H. Co. 206 Mass. 547, 92 N. E. 761. While we do not go so far as to say that trading stamps are an absolute public necessity, yet they enter into the merchant's business, and are an essential element of a form of bargain and sale which a very appreciable portion of the public demands.

Beechley v. Mulville, 102 Iowa, 602, 63 Am. St. Rep. 479, 70 N. W. 107, 71 N. W. 428. The direct and intended effect of the methods employed being to restrain or prevent the pursuit by the defendants or of others of a similar enterprise in a lawful manner, the plaintiff is within the prohibition of the Statute of 1908, chap. 454, § 1, which declares that such an arrangement or agreement, whatever form it may assume, or however carefully the constituent parts may be assembled, is "against public policy and illegal and void." The exceptions to the report not having been argued need not be considered, and the master having found that the defendants have not as to the plaintiff's customers used or propose to use any information obtained from it while the defendant Murphy was in its employment, the defendants are not shown to have violated any enforceable rights of the plaintiff. Stat. 1908, chap. 454, § 2. White v. Buss, 3 Cush. 448; Gibney v. Olivette, 196 Mass. 294, 295, 82 N. E. 41; Kennedy v. Welch, 196 Mass. 592, 83 N. E. 11. The decree dismissing the bill is therefore affirmed with costs.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bay County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries to his wife which were alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Ostrander, J.:

It is the claim of plaintiff that because of the negligence of defendant his wife sustained personal injuries. He sued to recover damages for his resulting injury. In his declaration he describes her injuries as "injuries to her back, spine, digestive organs, intestines, kidneys, and bladder, and to her uterus and its organs, resulting in appendicitis and a displacement of such uterus and its said organs, all occasioning nervousness, sleeplessness, loss of consciousness, and sexual power, dizziness, and fainting spells."

As a result, he says: "Plaintiff has been compelled to lay out and expend large sums of money for medical and surgical care and attention, medicine, care, and nursing in an endeavor to cure her of such injuries, hindrance, and incapacity, and to restore such sexual power and consortium, and it will always continue to be necessary for him to expend large sums of money for medical and surgical treatment, care, and nursing that would have been wholly unnecessary to expend had she not received said injuries and been hindered and incapacitated as aforesaid, and by reason of such injuries he has lost the value of her earning capacity, services, and consortium, and the large sums which she otherwise would have been able to earn for and save to him in and about her duties, as such housekeeper, and in and about similar labor, and in the future he will continue to lose large sums from her said earning capacity being so impaired and by reason thereof and the several losses so sustained by him, including the value of such services and consortium."

Testimony introduced on the part of plaintiff tended to prove that upon an occasion in April, 1912, when his wife, accompanied by two daughters, was shopping in defendant's store, they undertook to use the elevator, in stepping into which, at the invitation of an employee, she fell because the floor of the elevator was below the level of the floor of the store, a condition of things which on account of semidarkness in the elevator and the invitation aforesaid she did not discover. Issues of fact were raised by the testimony about the negligence of defendant, the negligence of the wife, the nature and effects of the injuries she sustained, and connected with the last, her previous physical condition. These issues, and others concerning the result to plaintiff, were submitted to a jury, and a verdict for $1,550.40 was returned. Judgment was entered on the verdict, and a new trial was refused.

Over objection that it did not tend to establish a basis for estimating plaintiff's damages, the plaintiff's wife was permitted to testify as follows:

Q. Prior to your injury what was your relation with your husband with reference to the relation between a wife and husband on occasions?

A. I was perfectly well on that occasion.

S. W. 280, the court said: "The husband's right of consortium at common law included the right of the services of the wife to be rendered to the husband, together with the right of her society and the comfort incident to the association and her companionship. Such are the rights which, it is asserted here, defendant has invaded and of which plaintiff has been deprived by his wrongful act. See Stout v. Kansas City Terminal R. Co. 172 Mo. App. 113, 157 S. W. 1019; Marri v. Stamford Street R. Co. 84 Conn. 9, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1042, 78 Atl. 582, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1120. In such cases it would be difficult, indeed, to ascertain in dollars and cents the value of the consortium of either spouse to the other. The relation and the right are rather of a sacred character than of a valuable monetary interest or right. In this view, our supreme court has determined that it is not essential to introduce evidence tending to prove the value of the society and companionship of the wife. Obviously the principle supporting this view goes to the effect that the law never requires pecuniary proof with reference to a nonpecuniary loss. Such is the thought of an eminent author on the subject. See Watson on Damages, p. 403. Therefore, in a suit by the husband for the loss of the wife's companionship and society as a result of personal injuries sustained by her through the negligence of another, there need be no direct proof of the value of such society, comfort, and companionship. The very nature of the subject does not admit of such proof. This being true, the assessment of reasonable compensation therefor must, it is said, necessarily be committed to the sound discretion and judgment of the triers of the fact. See Furnish v. Missouri P. R. Co. 102 Mo. 669, 22 Am. St. Rep. 800, 15 S. W. 315; Watson, Damages, pp. 403, 404; 4 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 1252. As the right to the society, comfort, and companionship of the wife is but parcel of the common-law right of consortium, it would seem the same rule should apply to the loss of her services as well: for, indeed, after all, the right to the society and companionship is included within that of the husband to the wife's unimpaired services. L.R.A.1915D.

It is certain that the husband is entitled to recover for the loss of the services of his wife of which he is deprived by the negligent act of another, even though the parties are in such circumstances that she is not accustomed or desired to do physical labor, or the husband may not have realized anything from her services before she was injured. See 4 Sutherland, Damages, 3d ed. § 1252. Therefore, the courts declare, in the cases of the character of this one, that there need be no direct or express evidence of the value of the wife's services either by the day, week, month, or of any other period of time, or of any aggregate sum touching the matter, for it is sufficient to show her disability from performing service if it were desired, or she chose to do so. It is said when the loss of a wife's services resulting from a personal injury is to be compensated for to her husband, she is not to be treated as an ordinary servant or as a mere hireling. On the contrary, she is to be regarded as sustaining to her husband and his household a relation special and peculiar in itself, for the deprivation of which, even for a short time, compensation for services may not be accurately ascertained and given in evidence in dollars and cents. Therefore the actual facts and circumstances of each case, together with the experience and judgment of the jurors, are to furnish the guide in determining the amount of the recovery, and this, too, without evidence of value."

And in Indianapolis & M. Rapid Transit Co. v. Reeder, 51 Ind. App. 533, 100 N. E. 101, it was said: "Under the law the pecuniary value of the 'wifely services or consortium' of decedent during the period intervening between her injury and her death was a part of the damages to be ascertained and assessed. See [opinion on former appeal], 42 Ind. App. 520, 85 N. E. 1042, and cases there cited. These services may, and often do, include such services as might be rendered by hired servants, which have a fixed or market value; but they also include such services as a wife alone can render the husband, viz., such as she may extend to him by way of her society and counsel, her pervading superintendence and care over his household, her nurture, guid-

Q. Had there ever been anything that interfered physically with the acts of intercourse between a wife and husband?

A. No, sir.

A physician was permitted over objection to answer this question:

Q. During that time, what was her capacity as to discharging the functions of a wife so far as intercourse with a husband is concerned?

A. I would not think that would be possible.

ance, and training of his children; and these services are not the subject of market value, but their value must depend on what the evidence shows to have been the home life and its surroundings and conditions, and the part the wife had to do with its making and keeping, in each case. See 42 Ind. App. supra, and cases cited. See also Selleck v. Janesville (1899) 104 Wis. 570, 47 L.R.A. 691, 76 Am. St. Rep. 892, 80 N. W. 944, and cases cited. The disposition, temperament, character, and attainments of the wife, her interest manifested in her home and family and in the comfort, happiness, education, and general welfare of the members of the family, and many other elements, if developed by the evidence, may be taken into account; and, finally, on a consideration of all the elements entering into such services, their value must be expressed in dollars and cents. The best method of ascertaining such values known to the law is to obtain the consensus of opinion of twelve jurors; and it is only where the record discloses that in arriving at such value such jurors took into account some item or element not authorized by the law, or that their judgment had been improperly influenced or obtained, that the appellate tribunal should by a remittitur substitute its judgment for theirs. No such showing is made by the record in this case." In this case the wife finally went insane, and a verdict for $4,200 was sustained.

And May v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 157 N. C. 416, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 912, 72 S. E. 1059, holds that a man may recover damages from one who trespasses upon his property and frightens his wife to her injury, for the expenses imposed upon him and the deprivation of society and services of the wife because of the trespass.

The rule announced in the earlier note on this question, to the effect that in the majority of jurisdictions the married women's acts have not changed the common-law right of the husband to recover for loss of consortium, is sustained by Little Rock Gas & Fuel Co. v. Coppedge, — Ark. —, 172 S. W. 885.

And § 6287 of Kirby's Digest, giving a husband the right to recover for the services and society of his wife where death resulted to her by wrongful act or negligence of another person, did not take away L.R.A.1915D.

Other medical testimony upon the subject was admitted, and the plaintiff on direct examination gave the following:

Q. Is the companionability, the sociability in your home the same now that it was before her injury?

A. No, sir, it is not. It is less.

On cross-examination, he testified:

Q. What do you mean by less? Your wife is there all the time as before?

A. She is there, yes.

Q. Then why is her companionship less than it was before, if she is there with you as much as ever; you can talk and visit his common-law right to recover for her services and companionship from injuries sustained by her from the negligent act of another, where death did not ensue. Little Rock Gas & Fuel Co. v. Coppedge, supra.

The word "consortium" includes aid, society, companionship, assistance, and affection, and the law does not attempt to separate these elements of damages; so it was held in Little Rock Gas & Fuel Co. v. Coppedge, supra, where the husband spent more than $1,400 for medical services for his wife after she was injured, that a verdict for $7,500 damages was not excessive.

Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. — Mich. —, 147 N. W. 614, was an action of trespass on the case "to recover damages against the defendant . . . for expenses incurred by him for medical attendance upon, and for loss of the services, comfort, fellowship, and society of, his wife, by reason of the negligence of an employee of the defendant;" and but for what is said concerning it in BLAIR V. SEITNER DRY GOODS CO. might be regarded as some authority contra to the rule announced in that case, which, it seems, is against the weight of authority.

But the doubt expressed in the earlier note as to the law in Massachusetts on this question has been settled in Whitcomb v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 215 Mass. 440, 102 N. E. 663, following Bolger v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 420, 91 N. E. 389, holding that when a married woman has recovered full compensation from a railroad company in an action for personal injuries, her husband is not entitled to recover for loss of consortium.

Where a wife's libel against a steamship company for personal injuries falls, her husband cannot maintain a libel for expenses on account of the wife's injuries and for loss of consortium. Savage v. New York, N. & H. S. S. Co. 107 C. C. A. 648, 185 Fed. 778.

And see Garrison v. Sun Printing & Pub. Asso. 207 N. Y. 1, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 766, 100 N. E. 430, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 288, holding that a man may recover for loss of society and services of his wife resulting from mental distress caused by the wilful and malicious publication concerning her of defamatory words actionable per se.

with her and associate with her just as well now as before, can you not?

A. Sometimes, not all the time. The woman is in pain all the time, and when a person is in pain they don't feel much like talking and laughing and joking, nor anything of that kind. They feel more like going and hiding themselves sometimes.

Q. Then does it simmer down to this, that she is not at times in as cheerful a mood or condition now as she used to be?

A. No, sir.

Q. Is that what you complain of?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Is there anything else in that connection that you complain of?

A. No, not in particular.

The jury was instructed: "By consortium as used by me is meant the right of plaintiff as husband to the fellowship of his wife, to her company, co-operation, and aid in every marriage relationship that ordinarily arises and exists as between husband and wife, including the care of his home, attention to household affairs, and such other reasonable discharge of ordinary domestic duties as she was accustomed to render him as his wife, and as is usual as between husband and wife situate as they were."

Also, in stating for what injuries plaintiff's damages should be determined: "Third, for any and all loss sustained by plaintiff, if any, by the impairment of her ability and power to render such domestic services and perform such work as she, as his wife, was accustomed to render to plaintiff in his household prior to such injuries, including such loss of consortium as I have explained, and such of said services as she would have continued to render but for these injuries, and in determining the amount which you will allow plaintiff, if any, under this third subdivision you will deduct therefrom such sum as you may allow the plaintiff, if any, for any and all expenditures for help in his home for which you may have made him an allowance under the second subdivision last above."

The contributory negligence of plaintiff's wife is established, it is claimed, as matter of law, for which reason the court should have directed a verdict, and, failing this, should have granted a new trial. The results of the injury to plaintiff's wife claimed by the plaintiff are not, it is said, made out; they are plainly conjectural.

In plaintiff's bill of the particulars of his damages is an item for "expenses in connection with medical and surgical care and attention, medicine, care, and nursing of Louise Blair, wife of plaintiff, heretofore incurred and to be hereafter incurred $500," L.R.A.1915D.

and one for "loss of consortium of Louise Blair, as wife, heretofore incurred and to be hereafter incurred $2,000."

These, with a claim of $2,500 for loss of her earning capacity and services as wife, make up the $5,000 demand, to recover which the suit is brought.

The testimony of the plaintiff tended to prove that as she stepped into the elevator she fell, striking with the lower part of her abdomen a stool which was in the elevator, causing a displacement of the uterus and a condition which developed appendicitis. A surgical operation was resorted to some two and one-half months after the injury was received, the cost of which is an item of plaintiff's demand. Whether this operation was made necessary by the injuries received by plaintiff's wife in defendant's store, or whether her condition, relieved or attempted to be relieved by the surgical operation, was of long standing and due to other causes, was a subject which received considerable attention at the trial. Upon this subject the defendant preferred the following request, which was refused: "There is no evidence tending to show there was anything wrong with any of Mrs. Blair's organs excepting the appendix and uterus, and there is no evidence tending to show that her appendix and uterus were injured by the fall which it is claimed in this case she sustained in defendant's elevator, and there is no evidence tending to show that the surgical operation performed by Dr. Ballard became necessary because of any injury sustained by her in the accident complained of, and therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and I charge you to render a verdict in favor of the defendant."

Defendant offered in evidence the files and records in the suit of Louise Blair (plaintiff's wife) against this defendant, in which she recovered $1,000 damages for the injury in question here, which judgment was paid. They were excluded. They show that in that suit she alleged as damages expenses for medical and surgical care, medicine, and nursing already incurred and to be incurred, and loss of earning capacity, and large sums which she would have been able to earn as housekeeper, etc. The right of the husband in a case of this nature to recover damages for the loss of the services of his wife was and is questioned.

Messrs. Stoddard & McMillan, for appellant:

The verdict of a jury should not rest upon conjecture or guess work. The negligence alleged, and the injuries for which damages are claimed, must bear the relation of cause and effect; and without proof that the injury is the rational and proximate result of the negligence alleged, there can be no recovery.

Ostrander, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the brief for appellant argument is addressed to the alleged positive character of the evidence establishing the negligence of plaintiff's wife, the uncertainty of the evidence to establish the injuries claimed to have been received by her, the rulings of the court, and the charge upon the subject of plaintiff's loss of consortium, the alleged excessive recovery, and the verdict of the jury, which is, it is claimed, opposed to the weight of evidence. These are the subjects of principal discussion and will be considered.

1. It is not clear whether plaintiff's wife did or did not exercise a proper degree of care in entering the elevator under the circumstances she says existed there. The question was for the jury.

2. The nature and extent of the injuries sustained by plaintiff's wife are uncertain. The opinions of the medical men go no further than this,—that her condition at the time of the operation and before and after it is not in doubt, and, with certain exceptions, might have been the result of the injury. These witnesses relate also other causes for such a condition as existed, and it is plaintiff's claim that by his testimony he has eliminated these other possible causes from consideration, for which reason the proximate cause of her condition is not conjectural. On the other hand, it is the contention of defendant that the testimony is equally convincing that her troubles, relieved by the surgeons, were of long standing. It is very doubtful whether, exercising themselves wholly outside the domain of conjecture and wholly within that of proper and reasonable deduction from such testimony as they believed, the jury could have reached either material conclusion. As was true in Farrell v. Haze, 157 Mich. 374, 391, 392, 122 N. W. 197, a final condition of the patient was made certain by expert testimony. In the Farrell Case it was admitted that the cause of the condition was matter for expert determination. In the case at bar the accident (in the Farrell Case the treatment) might have produced the known condition. But in this, as in that, case, the testimony seems to fall short of showing that it is more probable the conditions, relieved by the surgical operation, were caused by the accident. So much plaintiff was bound to prove. Otherwise recovery depends upon attributing to a particular cause an injury which may as well be attributed to another cause.

3. Consortium has been defined as the person's affection, society, or aid; the right to the conjugal fellowship of the wife, to her company, co-operation, and aid in every conjugal relation. 8 Cyc. 614. See Jacobsen v. Siddal, 12 Or. 284, 53 Am. Rep. 360, 7 Pac. 108; 21 Cyc. 1525; Bouvier's Law Dict. 402.

"The right of consortium is a right growing out of the marital relation, which the husband and wife have, respectively, to enjoy the society and companionship and affection of each other in their life together." Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 89 N. E. 436.

"Per quod consortium amisit" (by which he has lost the companionship) was the phrase used when at the common law plaintiff declared for any bodily injury done to his wife by a third person. 3 Bl. Com. 140. Appellant says: "We insist that for loss or diminution of his wife's 'marriage fellowship,' of her 'company and co-operation,' that even if her society and companionship is less satisfactory than formerly, that in his association and intercourse with her he finds less comfort, pleasure, or happiness, L.R.A.1915D.

all of which are matters of sentiment affecting the mind and heart, and not the pocket, he cannot recover damages therefor. In this case no evil motive or wilful misconduct on the part of the defendant is claimed. . . . This is unlike an action on the case for seduction, or alienation of the wife's affections, which stand upon peculiar reasons."

At common law when a married woman was injured in her person she was joined with her husband in an action for the injury, and in such action nothing could be recovered for loss of her services or for the expenses to which the husband had been put in taking care of and curing her. There was no allowance for her loss of ability to earn wages, render services, and be helpful to others, because these elements of damage, so far as recoverable at all, belonged to the husband. For such loss of services and such expenses the husband alone could sue. 1 Chitty, Pl. 84. The common law gave the husband the right to the labor, services, and earnings of his wife.

It is not now an answer to the wife's suit to recover damages for injuries to her person that her husband is not joined as plaintiff. The legislature has relieved her of certain disabilities so-called, and has denied to her husband the right to her earnings and the profits of any business she may carry on. It has not, however, put her domestic duties and labor, performed in and about her home for her family upon a pecuniary basis, nor meant to classify such duties as services, nor to permit her to recover damages for loss of ability to perform them. Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. — Mich. —, 147 N. W. 614. Where there is no intentional wrong, the ordinary rule of damages in every case goes no further than to allow pecuniary compensation for the impairment or injury directly done. If a husband is injured and recovers his damages, his wife cannot usually recover damages. The husband has usually, as a result of his action, been compensated for his pain and suffering, past and future, for loss of time, for diminution of capacity to earn money. The minor children of an injured father and those of an injured mother may suffer on account of the injury, but it has never been considered that they had an action therefor. The negligent defendant is supposed to have made full pecuniary compensation to the injured parent. Their loss is regarded, not as direct, but consequential and remote.

If a husband may recover for loss of consortium resulting from physical injury to the wife occasioned by negligent conduct of the defendant, the wife may recover for loss of consortium of the husband under similar, conditions. The right affected, if it may be properly called a right, is mutual. No reasoning will now support a recovery by one which will deny it to the other spouse.

"No case has been brought to our attention, and after an extended examination we have found none, in which an action for a loss of consortium alone has been maintained merely because of an injury to a person of the other spouse, for which the other has recovered, or is entitled to recover, full compensation in his own name, when the only effect upon the plaintiff's right of consortium is that, through the physical or mental disability of the other, the companionship is less satisfactory and valuable than before the injury." Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 203 Mass. 278, 280, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024, 133 Am. St. Rep. 291, 89 N. E. 436.

If plaintiff has in fact, on account of his wife's injury, lost a service which she habitually rendered, then, as service, and according to the pecuniary value of it, he ought to be permitted to recover. Recovery should be according to the fact. For loss of consortium, of the undefined and indefinable influence of either spouse in the family relation, and the pleasure of the relationship, neither may recover. The Massachusetts decision in Kelley v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 168 Mass. 308, 38 L.R.A. 631, 60 Am. St. Rep. 397, 46 N. E. 1063, relied upon in Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. supra, and often cited in text-books and opinions of judges, has been distinctly overruled as to the point now being considered. Feneff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. supra; Bolger v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 420, 91 N. E. 389. While our own former decisions do not distinctly rule the point, still Bowdle v. Detroit Street R. Co. 103 Mich. 272, 50 Am. St. Rep. 366, 61 N. W. 529, 4 Am. Neg. Cas. 180, is plainly not opposed to it. Nor do I think Gregory v. Oakland Motor Car Co. wrongly decided; no specific claim having been made that the damages were excessive, and the objection being that the husband could not recover at all for loss of services of his wife. As to the elements which may be considered by a jury in fixing the pecuniary loss of the husband, the charge delivered in that case was in some respects opposed to the conclusion I have reached (although to that portion of the charge no objection appears to have been made), and some of the decisions of other courts quoted with approval permit a jury to consider what I now think they should not be permitted to consider in estimating the value of the wife's services.

The testimony referred to should not have been received; the court erred in his instruction. L.R.A.1915D.

tions upon the subject of loss of consortium, and, more doubtful, but nevertheless tangible, plaintiff did not fairly sustain the burden of proving that the probable cause of the wife's injuries, relieved by a surgical operation at the cost of the husband, was the injury for which defendant was held responsible.

The judgment is reversed and a new trial granted.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI, Appt.,

v.

T. J. PHILLIPS.

(— Miss. —, 67 So. 651.)

Constitutional law — equal protection — keeping liquor at social club.

1. A state does not unconstitutionally deprive one of equal protection of the laws by forbidding the keeping of intoxicating liquor in any locker or other place in any social club, or carrying it to such club, although a property right in such liquors is recognized by the law.

Statute — title — scope.

2. A provision prohibiting the carrying of intoxicating liquors into a club room is within a title indicating that the statute is to prohibit the sale of such liquors.

(March 1, 1915.)

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Leflore County sustaining a demurrer to an affidavit charging defendant with unlawfully carrying intoxicating liquor into a social club. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George H. Ethridge, Assistant Attorney General, for the State:

The statute forbidding the keeping of intoxicating liquor in any locker or other place in any social club, or carrying it to such club, is not unconstitutional.

Cook, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee was convicted by a justice of the peace upon an affidavit charging that he "on or before the 23d day of November, 1914, unlawfully did then and there carry to the club of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, the same then and there being a social club and organization, for the use therein as a beverage, vinous, spirituous, L.R.A.1915D.

malt, alcoholic, and intoxicating liquor, to wit, one bottle of whisky then and there containing more than one half of 1 per cent of alcohol."

Appellee appealed to the circuit court and there demurred to the affidavit, which demurrer was sustained. From the judgment of the circuit court sustaining appellant's demurrer, the state prosecuted this appeal.

This prosecution was founded upon § 4, chap. 127, Miss. Laws 1914, which read thus: "That no intoxicating liquor within the meaning of this act shall be kept in any locker or other place in any social club or organization for use therein, and all persons carrying such liquor to such club or locker for use therein or keeping the same for such use, shall be guilty of a violation of this act."

The demurrer of defendant below was sustained upon the theory that said section is unconstitutional because it contravenes the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as well as article 3, § 14, of our state Constitution.

It was also urged below, and here, that chapter 127, Laws 1914, is void because it violates § 71 of the state Constitution, referring to the title of bills introduced in the state legislature.

The position of appellant, briefly stated, is that the statute under review recognizes that intoxicating liquors are property, and that one may lawfully own, possess, and use the same, and that the limitation upon this right imposed by the statute bears no reasonable relation to the policy of the state to suppress the sale of intoxicants, and also that the statute is discriminatory and denies to the persons involved equal protection of the laws. For these reasons, it is claimed that the statute violates the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and article 3, § 14, of our own state Constitution. To support his contention appellee cites the following cases, viz.: Eidge v. Bessemer, 164 Ala. 599, 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 394, 51 So. 246; State v. Gilman, 33 W. Va. 146, 6 L.R.A. 847, 10 S. E. 283; Ex parte Brown, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 295, 70 Am. St. Rep. 743, 42 S. W. 554; State v. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179, 6 L.R.A. 621, 25 Am. St. Rep. 863, 10 S. E. 285; State v. Williams, 146 N. C. 618, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 299, 61 S. E. 61, 14 Ann. Cas. 562; Com. v. Campbell, 133 Ky. 50, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 117 S. W. 383, 19 Ann. Cas. 159; Ex parte Mon Luck, 29 Or. 421, 32 L.R.A. 738, 54 Am. St. Rep. 804, 44 Pac. 693; Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1064, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487.

Eidge v. Bessemer, supra, decided by the supreme court of Alabama, it seems to us, is the strongest case decided by any court in favor of appellee's view of the law. In other words, this case carries the sanctity of the right to possess and use property much further than has any other court of last resort. This case was decided by a divided court; and, with the utmost deference to the opinion of the majority, we think the dissenting opinions are more convincing than the opinion of the court. The court in that case had under consideration an ordinance of the city of Bessemer, the 1st section of which is in these words, viz.: "Be it enacted by the city council of Bessemer as follows: That it shall be unlawful and constitute a violation of this ordinance, if any person, firm, or corporation in the city of Bessemer, have or keep on storage or deposit, or have therein, any vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors, or intoxicating beverages [or any beverage], which is a product of maltace or gencase as a substantial ingredient, in or at any place where any drinks or beverages are sold or kept for sale."

The 2d section of the ordinance provided that the above section should not apply to druggists of the class described thereby.

As we interpret the opinion of the court, the gist of the court's reasoning may be found in the following words of the opinion, viz.: "It can be justified only, if at all, on the ground that it sustains some reasonable relation to the prohibition law in the way of preventing evasions of that law by trick, artifice, or subterfuge, under guise of which that law is violated. But it has no such relation. It undertakes to prohibit the keeping, in any quantity and for any purpose, however innocent, of intoxicating liquors and beverages in places which are innocent in themselves."

It seems clear to us that the court entirely underestimated the ability and cunning of the average illicit dealer in intoxicating beverages. The city council was much wiser, in our opinion, to the devious ways of this class of criminals. Given a "pop stand" or a soda fountain the blind tiger is practically immune from prosecution under any laws against the sale of intoxicating liquors. It would seem clear to us that violators of the law would have filed a dissenting opinion in that case, and could have pointed out with precision wherein the court erred, when it said that this ordinance sustains no reasonable relation to the prohibition law.

The dissenting opinion, by Judge McClellan, points out the reasonable relation of the ordinance to the prohibition law in a much clearer way than we can hope to do, and we refer to his opinion and adopt the same as our own.

In State v. Gilman, 33 W. Va. 146, 6 L.R.A. 847, 10 S. E. 283, the supreme court of West Virginia was passing upon the validity of a statute of that state which denounced as a misdemeanor the keeping in possession of spirituous liquors of another by any person not the owner, who had not obtained a license therefor. The decision went off upon the court's interpretation of the state Constitution, which declared "laws may be passed regulating or prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors." The court invoked the maxim, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, holding that, the statute not having reference to the prohibition or sale of liquors, the legislature was without power to pass the statute. The court also held that the statute could not be upheld as coming within the police power of the state. We do not consider this decision of much value in this case, because the statute there reviewed is radically and substantially different from the statute we are considering, and besides, the question before that court was complicated by the Constitution of West Virginia.

Ex parte Brown, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 295, 70 Am. St. Rep. 743, 42 S. W. 554, a Texas case, does not seem to be pertinent to this case. In that case the Texas court was construing a statute in the light of the state Constitution, referring directly to the question of the prohibition of the sale of intoxicants in local option territory. Referring to the constitutional provision, the court said: "It occurs to us that this expression of the will of the people on the subject is exclusive of any other method to be pursued by the legislature. Whatever may be said as to the power of the legislatures of other states, with no express provisions of their Constitutions on this subject, to legislate in regard to the liquor traffic under the general police power, the same does not apply with us. We have an express provision on the subject, and that provision was intended to prescribe a method of dealing with the question, and to exclude any other rule or method; at least, so far as local-option territory is concerned."

The court then quoted in full the opinion of the supreme court of West Virginia in State v. Gilman, supra, adopted and endorsing the same. The two courts were in accord, because of the similarity of their state Constitutions. It will be seen that the Texas case is expressly confined to provisions of the Constitution of Texas, and what would have been the decision of that court had there been no such constitutional provision it is, of course, impossible to conjecture.

State v. Goodwill, 33 W. Va. 179, 6 L.R.A. 621, 25 Am. St. Rep. 863, 10 S. E. 285, we do not believe has any application here, except as a general statement of the principle requiring classification of persons or corporations to be affected by the statute to be reasonable, and not discriminatory, which principle we will discuss later.

State v. Williams, 146 N. C. 618, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 299, 61 S. E. 61, 14 Ann. Cas. 562, a North Carolina case, we here copy the syllabus, which indicates the question decided, viz.: "Spirituuous, malt, or vinous liquors are property within the meaning of the Constitution, when its manufacture or sale is lawfully prohibited by statute; and when the legislature makes it an indictable offense to carry more than a certain quantity into a specified county, within a limited time, prohibiting its sale and not prohibiting its use, but authorizing its use for certain purposes, it is unconstitutional, for that it is a taking of property without due process of law, and not within the police power of a state."

This case was also decided by a divided court. We mention this fact for the purpose of showing that decisions along this line have usually found some judge of the court who dissents. We think the dissenting opinion in this case propounds a question hard to answer, and we quote the same, because, in our opinion it demonstrates the fallacy of the court's reasoning, viz.: "In limiting each person to a half gallon per day for his own use (for the law permits no sale) the legislature was not niggardly. Besides, if the manufacture, though exclusively for one's own use and out of one's own apples and peaches, in the county, can be forbidden by statute without breaking the Constitution, why cannot the importation of the same article across the county line, in a greater quantity than a half gallon per day, even for one's own use, be prohibited by the same power? The truth is that, the legislature having jurisdiction of the subject, the limitations upon its exercise rest in the wisdom and sound judgment of the legislature, subject only to review by the people, not by the courts."

Com. v. Campbell, 133 Ky. 50, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 117 S. W. 383, 19 Ann. Cas. 159, a Kentucky case, the charge against the defendant was bringing intoxicating liquors into a town, upon his person or as his personal baggage, exceeding a quart in quantity. This prosecution was based upon a town ordinance making it unlawful to bring into the town intoxicating liquors exceeding one quart in quantity. This case involved the construction of the state Constitution, and the court held that, inasmuch as the Constitution formulated a system by which the sale of intoxicating liquors throughout the state was to be regulated by general laws, it could not be contended, with any show of reason, that the framers of the Constitution intended to leave the question of the retailing of liquor in a given district to a vote of a majority of the voters, and yet leave it in the power of the legislature upon its own motion to prohibit the possession of liquor by the citizen. True, the court said much more than this. The court discussed the natural and inalienable rights of man, but after they reached the conclusion that the legislation was in violation of the state Constitution, referring to the particular power under review, there was nothing more to be said.

It is claimed by all the cases wherein the precise point now before this court was involved the power to enact legislation of this character was denied. We have endeavored to analyze the cases relied on to sustain this claim, and we believe no court (except possibly the Alabama and North Carolina courts), has gone so far as to condemn the legislation challenged in the present case.

Justice Holmes in Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S. 104, 55 L. ed. 112, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1064, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 186, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 487, thus defines police power: "It may be said in a general way that the police power extends to all the great public needs. . . . It may be put forth in aid of what is sanctioned by usage, or held by the prevailing morality or strong and preponderant opinion to be greatly and immediately necessary to the public welfare."

The Supreme Court of the United States has uniformly held that the adoption of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution did not have the effect of denying to the state power to prescribe "regulations to promote the peace, health, morals, education and good order of the people."

It may be said that the presence and use of intoxicating liquors at a place where a number of people gather for the enjoyment of social intercourse would have a tendency to disturb the peace and quiet of the people there assembled. It is not a stretch of the imagination to assume that one intoxicated man may, and indeed frequently does, annoy, disgust, and offend the moral sense of a large number of other people engaged in the discussion of serious and important social questions. The affectionate or the bellicose inebriate can do much to arouse the ire and invite the active resentment of his victims. And so the legislature deemed it wise to protect the members of social clubs, and thus promote the public peace, by preventing the carrying of intoxicants into the club rooms,—to be kept or used there,—to the discomfort of sober members and to the peril of the public peace. This thought was no doubt in the legislative mind, in so far, at least, as the statute might apply to the class of social clubs organized and conducted for the encouragement of social intercourse, and for the improvement and enjoyment of their fortunate members.

There was another thought which probably prompted the legislation in question. It is well known to those familiar with the enforcement of the laws against the sale of intoxicants that many schemes, artifices, and devices have been originated for the purpose of evading the law. Clubs and lodges have been organized for no other purpose than to sell intoxicating liquors. The conscienceless promoters often select names for their club or lodge which suggest to the uninitiated that these organizations have no purpose other than to assist the moral and religious element of the community in every movement having for its purpose the moral welfare of the community.

To check the pernicious and cunning activities of the professional criminal,—the man who, once a blind tiger, is always a blind tiger,—the legislature adopted a broad classification to cover any and all social clubs. This was necessary to make the statute at all efficient. In this statute the limitation upon the use of liquor is confined to social clubs. The owner may carry it anywhere else and use it to any extent. There is no attempt to destroy the personal liberty of the owner to enjoy the seductive influence of liquor, or even to get drunk. So far as this statute is concerned one may own any amount of liquor, use it as he sees fit, and even carry it anywhere except to a social club or organization. Therefore it is said the statute denies the owner, as a club member, the equal protection of the laws.

There was a time, not long ago, when many intelligent and virtuous citizens of this state resented any interference by the legislature whereby it undertook to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors. Even laws submitting to the people of towns or counties the option of prohibiting the sale in any given town or county were indignantly denounced as efforts to deprive the dissenters of their natural and inalienable rights. There was a time, perhaps, when this sentiment represented the "prevailing morality" of many communities. We have traveled far since, until now it may be safely said that the "preponderant opinion," as well as "the prevailing morality," is willing and anxious to prohibit even the possession of alcoholic liquors as a crime against peace, morality, and good government. We do not think we yield to a clam-orous and unreasoning mob when we indorse a law as within the police power of the state, when the Supreme Court of the United States says this power exists whenever the "preponderant opinion and prevailing morality" believes this law necessary to the public welfare.

We quote the words of an unknown writer as fairly representative of the present "prevailing morality" of the people of this state: "Whisky is a good thing in its place. There is nothing like it for preserving a man when he is dead. If you want to keep a dead man, put him in whisky; if you want to kill a live man, put whisky in him."

Is the writer a wag or a philosopher? This question will be answered by "dyed in the wool 'individualists'" but one way, but we apprehend that their answer would not be approved in a state-wide primary.

There is abundant authority, we think, for our view. We will now cite some of the cases which are in line with our ideas of the law. These cases are collated by the annotator of Eidge v. Bessemer, reported in 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 395 et seq.: "Thus, in Selma v. Brewer, 9 Cal. App. 70, 98 Pac. 61, the court said that it was of opinion that a municipal ordinance declaring it unlawful for any person, firm, corporation, company, club, or association to 'have, keep, possess, provide, or store' any spirituous, etc., liquors within a town, but permitting a licensed pharmacist to sell the same, taken as a whole, is consistent with the provisions of the Constitution authorizing any city to make and enforce police regulations not in conflict with general laws, and represents only a proper exercise of the power expressly vested by that instrument in cities, counties, towns, and townships.

"And an ordinance prohibiting the owner or keeper of a retail grocery store, where meat, grain, fruit, provisions, or other articles are exposed for sale, from keeping therein, or in any inner room adjacent thereto, or on the premises connected therewith, any spirituous, etc., liquors, unless licensed by the city to retail the same, is warranted by charter authority to pass any by-law or requirement that shall appear requisite for the city, or for preserving peace, order, and good government. Heisembrittle v. Charleston, 2 McMull. L. 233. The court said that there could be no question that the restraints imposed by such ordinance were within the ordinary powers of legislation, there being nothing in the restrictions imposed by the Constitution of the state or United States restraining the legislature from passing a general law like that under consideration, or from granting power to do so to municipal corporations.

"So an ordinance providing that no intoxicating liquors shall be used or kept in any refreshment saloon or restaurant for any purpose whatever is valid, notwithstanding such liquors are not kept for sale, and the keeping thereof elsewhere is not restricted. State v. Clark, 28 N. H. 176, 61 Am. Dec. 611. See the quotation from this case in the dissenting opinion of McClellan, J., in Eidge v. Bessemer.

"And it was held in Cohen v. State, 7 Ga. App. 5, 65 S. E. 1096 (one justice, however, dissenting), that on a prosecution for the violation of a law declaring it unlawful for anyone to keep on hand at his place of business any intoxicating liquor, evidence as to the respondent's purpose in keeping it was properly excluded as irrelevant and immaterial.

"Thus it was held in Easley v. Pegg, 63 S. C. 98, 41 S. E. 18, that a municipal ordinance enacted under the general welfare clause of a municipal charter, prohibiting the storing or keeping possession of spirituous, etc., liquors, except as provided by the state dispensary law, was valid, it not being necessary that such liquor should be kept for an unlawful purpose; the offense being complete if there is a storing or keeping of liquor, which is contraband under the dispensary law.

"And in Wright v. Macon, 5 Ga. App. 750, 64 S. E. 807, where a municipal ordinance, declaring it unlawful for any club, corporation, or association of persons, or number of persons, whether incorporated or otherwise, to keep, or permit to be kept, in any room or place, or in any place connected directly or indirectly therewith, in which members of such club, corporation, association of persons, or number of persons, assembled, any alcoholic, spirituous, etc., liquors, under which it was sought to prosecute one who kept liquor owned by him and intended for his own personal use, in a locker of a club connected with lodge rooms of a fraternal society to which he belonged, was held void, solely on the ground that the state had already regulated and licensed such clubs, the court said that 'but for the passage of the license tax by the state, there could be no question in our minds that . . . [such ordinance could have been adopted under the general welfare clause of its charter]. It is evident that the general policy of the state in the passage of the general prohibition act of 1907 was to stop, or at least to decrease, the drinking of intoxicating liquor, and, the ordinance . . . now before us being in aid of that general policy, we think it could be extended to preventing the assembling of liquors at a place where drinking, instead of being decreased, would be increased, although the possession and property right in such liquors was legal, and the place at which such liquors were assembled was not a public place; and, although it is always to be borne in mind that delegated powers are to be strictly construed and reasonably exercised, we think the passage of the ordinance in question . . . is not an unreasonable exercise of the police power, and is fully warranted by the general welfare clause.'

We do not think that this act deprives members of social organizations of the equal protection of the law. It seems to us that the classification of the organizations which would come under the regulations adopted by the legislature is entirely reasonable. It may be said that business, benevolent, and other organizations which might be mentioned, were not put under the statutory regulations, for the reason that ordinarily liquors are not carried into the places where such organizations assemble. There being no public necessity for prohibiting members of the organizations not mentioned in the statutes from carrying liquors to the meeting places, the legislature did not attempt to remedy a nonexistent evil.

Before leaving this subject, we venture to say that "social clubs," by this statute, are selected as the special favorites rather than as the victims of the law. While primarily the statute was enacted in the interest of the public welfare and to effectuate the purpose of the legislature to make the sale of intoxicating liquors more difficult, yet it is conceivable that the immediate and direct result of the enforcement of the statute will be of special benefit to social clubs.

Lastly, it is contended that the act in question is unconstitutional because it contravenes § 71 of our Constitution. All questions of this kind are foreclosed by the decision in Jackson v. State, 102 Miss. 663, 59 So. 873, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1213. If the object of prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors is not to prevent, as far as may be, the drinking of such liquors, then it is difficult to justify the laws prohibiting the sale. Of course, the typical public saloon is demoralizing, but there would be no practical difficulties in the way of so regulating the saloon as to minimize all of the evils which flow from the saloon, except the evils which flow from the drinking of intoxicating beverages. If it is not a menace to the health, morals, welfare, and peace of the public for men and women to drink alcoholic liquors, it would seem that the public could have no interest in prohibiting the sale. The ultimate purpose and end of prohibition is to prevent the use of liquor as a beverage. This ultimate end is approached step by step, and when the preponderant and prevailing morality of the nation believes that the public welfare demands the final step, the way will be found to accomplish the end.

The judgment of the trial court sustaining the demurrer to the affidavit is reversed, and the cause remanded for trial on its merits.

HERMAN ZIGMAN, Admr., etc., of Philip Zigman, Deceased,

v.

BEEBE & RUNYAN FURNITURE COMPANY, Appt.

(97 Neb. 689, 151 N. W. 166.)

Highway — negligent driving — coupling wagons.

1. The act of coupling two wagons together, and thus driving them on the street, does not of itself constitute negligence on the part of the owner of the wagons, so as to render him liable in damages for the death of a child who climbed on the connecting pole.

Negligence — attractive nuisance.

2. The doctrine of the "turntable cases" is not applicable to the facts in this case.

(February 12, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Douglas County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McGilton, Gaines, & Smith, for appellant:

The court should have directed a verdict for the defendant because there was no evidence of negligence in the manner of driving the team, or in the use of the street.

Letton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for the wrongful killing of plaintiff's intestate. Verdict and judgment for $3,000. Defendant appeals.

The facts that seem to be established by the evidence are substantially as follows: The defendant is a wholesale dealer in furniture. On the afternoon of October 19, 1909, a driver in its employ was driving at a walk along Twentieth street in Omaha with two covered furniture wagons, connected together, on his way to the railroad station. The first wagon, to which three horses were attached, was heavily loaded with outgoing furniture; the other was empty and was to be loaded with incoming furniture. Both wagons were of the same size and character. The pole or tongue of the rear wagon was tied to the axle of the front one. An eye witness testified that as the wagons came past his drug store, near which he was standing, Philip Zigman, the deceased, a little boy between four and five years old, with another little boy of about the same age, were lying across the pole of the second wagon with their backs toward him and their faces down. The driver was seated in front of the first wagon with his view to the rear obstructed by the load of furniture. The witness stood about 5 feet from the wagons as they passed. Within a minute afterwards he was told by two school boys that the deceased, who was then sitting upon the curbing about 60 or 65 feet away, had been run over. The boy had been run over across the body, and he died in a very few minutes. The street is usually busy at that point with heavy traffic. Street cars pass every 10 minutes, but few automobiles use it. The Zigman home is a block west from where the accident happened.

The driver testified that the tongue was about 2½ feet from the ground; that there were about 8 feet between the box part of the front wagon and that of the rear one; that there was no one on the rear wagon; that this was the customary way of hauling the empty wagons; that he did not see any boys as he passed the drug store; and that he knew nothing about the accident until he was called back to the spot where it happened. The mother testified that the boy went to the drug store to buy some candy, and that it was only five minutes from the time he left the house until he was brought back dead.

At the conclusion of the evidence for plaintiff, defendant moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor for the reasons that it is not shown that defendant was guilty of any negligence in using the streets or in the manner of using the wagons; and that the injury to the child was due to the carelessness of the parent and plaintiff. The motion was overruled, and the questions as to the negligence of the defendant in connecting the wagons, and in using them on the street as connected, was submitted to the jury under instructions based upon the doctrine of the "Turntable Cases."

Defendant makes the same contention here as in the district court. The crucial question is whether the coupling of the wagons together in the manner described, and driving the team on the street without a guard or outlook on or about the rear wagon in order to warn children who might attempt to climb thereon, can be said, as a matter of law, not to constitute negligence. The jury has found that the act was negligent. Unless, when legal principles are applied to the facts presented, the defendant must be held to have been acting within its legal rights and was without fault, the verdict must stand, because otherwise the question was for the jury. The plaintiff relies upon the doctrine of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, 4 Perry & D. 672, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 73, 5 Jur. 797, that one who negligently leaves dangerous machinery or appliances of such a nature as to be attractive to children, within their reach, unguarded, or in such a situation that it may be easily put in motion by children, may, if injury to a child results, be guilty of actionable negligence. This is the rule of the "turntable cases" and is the law in this state. Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Kravenbuhl, 65 Neb. 889, 59 L.R.A. 920, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 300, 91 N. W. 880. Can this principle be applied to the passage of vehicles along the streets of a city? In the diversity of vehicles which traverse the streets there may be many forms attractive to children, and in many instances the attractive part of the vehicle is not within the view of the driver. Omnibuses are often used which are entered by steps at the rear with no conductor or guard, and the door to which is held closed by a cord or strap, reaching to the driver's seat. Would a child who climbed upon the rear steps while the omnibus was passing along the streets of a city be entitled to recover for injuries sustained by falling off the steps? Hebard v. Mabie, 98 Ill. App. 543, holds to the contrary, even in a case where the driver knew the child was there. It is not uncommon to see automobiles with trunk platforms or tire holders projecting from the rear, upon which a child might easily climb and be beyond the view of the driver. Could negligence be imputed to the owner of the machine if an accident occurred by reason of a child having seated himself upon the rear projection without the driver's knowledge? Wagons of certain types are constructed so that children can easily climb upon them. Those used for hauling stone, or to remove growing trees, or to carry iron girders, are of this class. Is it incumbent upon the owner of such a vehicle to send a guard as well as a driver every time he uses the streets for the transportation of his goods? These inquiries are suggested by the facts in this case. If the nature of a vehicle used on the streets is such as to be attractive to children, and they may easily climb thereon, then, if the principle contended for by the plaintiff is sound, no owner of such a vehicle can relieve himself from liability for negligence unless it is accompanied by a special guard, for the attention of the driver in a busy street must necessarily be directed to the front in order to control his team or his automobile. The question would be different if the driver was aware that children were congregating on and about it, and were liable to be injured if not warned away, and this is the principle upon which some cases have been decided. The following cases establish the principle that under the circumstances of this case no negligence has been shown. Bishop v. Union R. Co. 14 R. I. 314, 51 Am. Rep. 386, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 394; Hestonville Pass. R. Co. v. Connell, 88 Pa. 520, 32 Am. Rep. 472; Rice v. Buffalo Steel House Co. 17 App. Div. 462, 45 N. Y. Supp. 277, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 251; Foster-Herbert Cut Stone Co. v. Pugh, 115 Tenn. 688, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 804, 112 Am. St. Rep. 881, 91 S. W. 199, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 553; Emerson v. Peteler, 35 Minn. 481, 59 Am. Rep. 337, 29 N. W. 311. In the California case of Skinner v. Knickrehm, 10 Cal. App. 596, 102 Pac. 949, upon which the plaintiff places much stress, the facts were that a house with a wagon attached at the rear was being slowly moved along the streets of Los Angeles. The driver was unable to see the wagon from his position in front of the house, and none of the other employees were in a position that they could see the wagon. "These children were permitted to, or at least were not by anyone forbidden to, play upon the wagon, and did so for a long space of time while the house was being moved for a large portion of a block." Under these circumstances, the court held it was for the jury to determine whether the defendant was guilty of negligence. This case is not applicable here because in the present case the driver was unaware of the presence of the child. If the proof had shown his knowledge, a different question would be presented.

The other cases relied upon by plaintiff where dangerous machines such as iron rollers, wheel scrapers, or the like were left unguarded upon, or where lumber or building material was piled in a dangerous condition close by, a public street, come within the doctrine of Lynch v. Nurdin, supra, L.R.A.1915D.

and the "turntable cases," and are likewise inapplicable.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Resp.,

v.

HECTOR GRISWOLD, Appt.

(213 N. Y. 92, 100 N. E. 929.)

Dentist — educational qualification — reasonableness.

1. Requiring from applicants for license to practise dentistry an educational qualification equivalent to a four-year high-school course and graduation from a registered dental school is not unreasonable.

Same — discrimination against practitioner in another state.

2. A provision in a statute for the licensing of dentists preserving the rights of those licensed and registered at the time of its passage does not affect the constitutional rights of one licensed at the time in another state, who, under the statute, must comply with its terms to secure a license to practise in the state after the passage of the statute.

Same — increased educational requirement — constitutional right.

3. No constitutional right of a dentist who has practised many years in one state

Note. — Validity of statute or regulations affecting right to practise dentistry of one who has practised in another state.

As to validity of statute or regulations affecting right to practise medicine or surgery of one who has practised in another state, see note to Thomas v. State Bd. of Health, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 150.

The state has the right to prescribe such reasonable conditions upon the right to practise dentistry as will exclude from the practice those who are unfitted for it, for the protection of the public.

In accord with PEOPLE v. GRISWOLD, it seems to be quite generally held that the state may require all persons desiring to practise to secure a license, and may refuse to recognize a license granted by another state; and when no more is required of one having practised in another state than is required of all other citizens of the United States proposing to begin the practice within the state, he has no cause to complain.

is infringed by requiring him, upon seeking a license in another state, to comply with educational qualifications much higher than were required when he first began to practise.

Constitutional law—conferring special privilege on corporation.

4. A provision authorizing the granting of a license to practise dentistry to persons holding a license in other states, granted by a state board of dental examiners "indorsed by the dental society of the state" passing the statute, is not unconstitutional as granting an exclusive privilege or franchise to a private corporation, since the grant is not a privilege, but a duty to determine the standard exacted by other states for dental licenses.

(November 10, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Court of Special Sessions of the City of New York, convicting him of practising dentistry without a license, in violation of law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Solomon Hanford, with Mr. Max J. Kohler, for appellant:

The statute is unconstitutional and void,

A statute prohibiting the practice of dentistry without having obtained a certificate of registration as a licensed dentist from the state board of dental examiners does not violate the due process of law provision of either the state or Federal Constitution as to one who had practised dentistry in another state, where he was a registered dentist, and who desired to practise in this state without complying with the statute of the state providing for the registration and licensing of dentists in the state, as the practice of his profession in a state where he was duly registered gave him no vested right to practise his profession in another state without complying with its laws. State v. Crombie, 107 Minn. 171, 119 N. W. 660.

To the same effect is Medical Examiners v. Fowler, 50 La. Ann. 1358, 24 So. 809, which involved a statute regulating the practice of medicine.

A statute requiring all persons to pass a satisfactory examination as to their qualifications to practise dentistry before being permitted to practise dentistry in the state is not obnoxious to the provisions of the state or Federal Constitutions against depriving persons of property without due process of law as to one practising before the passage of the statute, or as to one practising in another state, who desires to practise in this state. State ex rel. Grant v. Rosenkrans, 30 R. I. 374, 75 Atl. 491, 19 Ann. Cas. 824.

Nor is such statute obnoxious to the provision of the Federal Constitution which declares that the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, and that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, because it requires one who is duly licensed and registered to practise in other states to submit to an examination as to his qualifications to practise dentistry before he is permitted to practise in the state. Ibid.

Nor is such statute obnoxious to the provisions of the Federal Constitution requiring full faith and credit to be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings in every other state, assuming L.R.A.1915D.

that the certificates of registration granted by the dentistry boards of other states are within the class of public records comprehended by the Constitution, since the statute does not prevent the certificates from being accepted in the state as evidence that the person to whom they were granted is duly registered in the state in which they were issued, which is all that is required to be given such records; as no state has such extraterritorial jurisdiction that it can, by its certificate, confer upon the person named therein the right to practise his profession in another state. Ibid.

A statute regulating the practice of dentistry, declaring it unlawful to practise without having a diploma from some reputable school of dentistry, which excepts from its requirements persons engaged in practice within the state at the time of the passage of the statute, does not violate the provisions of the Federal Constitution as to equal privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states and citizens of the United States. State v. Creditor, 44 Kan. 565, 21 Am. St. Rep. 306, 24 Pac. 346.

Likewise in State v. Vandersluis, 42 Minn. 129, 6 L.R.A. 119, 43 N. W. 789, a statute containing a similar provision was upheld. See also the numerous cases presented in note in 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 153, sustaining this view in case of statutes involving regulations of practice of medicine and surgery.

But in State v. Hinman, 65 N. H. 103, 23 Am. St. Rep. 22, 18 Atl. 194, it was held that a statute prohibiting a person from practising dentistry unless he has received a dental degree from some school authorized to confer the same, or a license from the New Hampshire Dental Society, which excepted from its provisions persons who had practised their profession in the place of their present residence for a certain time, and also persons residing out of the state, who are called on to attend patients within it, is unconstitutional because it discriminates between persons engaged in the same business or profession "by an arbitrary test, having no reference to skill, learning, or fitness for the practice of the profession." To the same effect is State v. Pennoyer, 65 N. H. 113, 5 L.R.A. 709, 18 Atl. 878 (physician).

and violates the "due process of law" provisions of the state and Federal Constitutions, because the underlying classification is illegal and unreasonable.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ellis, 165 U. S. 150, 155, 41 L. ed. 666, 668, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255; Cotting v. Kansas City Stock Yards Co. (Cotting v. Godard) 183 U. The statute is also unconstitutional because it contravenes § 2 of article IV. of the Federal Constitution, providing that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several states," and the 14th Amendment, providing that no "state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law."

The acts involved are unconstitutional as against defendant, a licensed dentist from another state, because of the powers conferred on, and grants to, the state dental society, a private corporation.

Fox v. Mohawk & H. River Humane Soc. 165 N. Y. 517, 51 L.R.A. 681, 80 Am. St. Rep. 767, 59 N. E. 353; Mahon v. Board of Education, 171 N. Y. 263, 89 Am. St. Rep. 810, 63 N. S. 45, 64, 49 L. ed. 937, 944, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539, 3 Ann. Cas. 1133.

Moreover, the statute is also violative of the state and Federal constitutional provisions against deprivation of liberty and property without due process of law, because arbitrary, undefined power to withhold "indorsement of licenses" is conferred on the state dental society.

Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064; State ex rel. Baldwin v. Prendergast, 8 Ohio C. C. 401, 6 Ohio C. D. 807; Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. The New York dental act is unconstitutional as against defendant under the "due process of law" provisions of the state and Federal Constitutions, because unreasonable and unduly complicated.

Miller, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant became a resident of this state three years before his conviction. He had theretofore practised dentistry in other states since 1881, and had been licensed to practise in the states of Kansas and Utah. He was convicted of a violation of § 169d of chapter 215 of the Laws of 1901 (now § 203 of the public health law, chapter 49 of the Laws of 1909; Consol. Laws, chap. 45). The constitutional validity of the said act is challenged, and it is necessary to state the substance of the provisions complained of. Section 164 (now 194) provides that only two classes of persons shall be deemed licensed to practise dentistry: (1) Those duly licensed and registered as dentists in this state prior to August 1, 1895; and (2) those duly licensed and registered thereafter pursuant to the provisions of said act. Section 166 (now 196) prescribed the qualifications of applicants for examination by the regents, which, as far as material, L.R.A.1915D.

are that the applicant must have had a preliminary education equivalent to graduation from a four-year high-school course registered by the regents, or an education accepted by the regents as fully equivalent, and subsequently to receiving such preliminary education he must either have been graduated in course with a dental degree from a registered dental school, or else, having been graduated in course from a registered medical school with a degree of doctor of medicine, have pursued thereafter a course of special study of dentistry for at least two years in a registered dental school, and received therefrom its degree of doctor of dental surgery, or else he must hold a diploma or license conferring full right to practise dentistry in some foreign country and granted by some registered authority. The section also contains a proviso with respect to students under private preceptorship, not now important. Section 168 (now 198) provides for the granting of licenses by the regents: (1) To candidates who have passed the examination on certification by the board of dental examiners; (2) on recommendation of the board of dental examiners without examination to applicants who either have been duly graduated from a registered dental school and have been thereafter lawfully and reputably engaged in the practice of dentistry for six years next preceding their application, or hold a license to practise dentistry in any other of the United States, granted by a state board of dental examiners, indorsed by the Dental Society of the State of New York, provided that in either case their preliminary and professional education shall have been not less than that required in this state. Section 169d (now 203, subd. E) prescribes the penalties imposed for a violation of the statute, and that "all fines, penalties and forfeitures of bail imposed or collected on account of violations of the laws regulating the practice of dentistry must be paid to the state dental society."

The appellant complains that the door of the examination room has been closed to him regardless of his actual qualifications, his long experience in other states, and of the fact that when he began the study and practice of dentistry no such preliminary and professional requirements were imposed, and he asserts that he is thus precluded from following a lawful calling by an unreasonable, arbitrary, and discriminatory statute in violation of various provisions of the state and Federal Constitutions.

The decision of the appellate division was unanimous. All of the facts necessary to the people's case must therefore be deemed established. If the statutory provisions, which prescribe the qualifications with respect to preliminary and professional education are void, it would seem that the appellant might have applied to the regents to be admitted to examination, and, upon refusal, have successfully invoked the aid of the courts by mandamus to compel his admission, and that he was not at liberty to ignore the statute altogether, and practise dentistry without being licensed. However, as the point is not raised, we shall assume, without deciding, that if the appellant's objections to the statute are well taken, he was not subject to a criminal prosecution for violating it.

The general power of the state to exact proper skill and learning of those who follow pursuits involving the public health, safety, and welfare, and to prescribe appropriate tests therefor, cannot at this day be questioned. It has been exercised from time immemorial, and has been sustained by repeated decisions of the courts. See Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173, 54 L. ed. 987, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644; Collins v. Texas, 223 U. S. 288, 56 L. ed. 439, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 286; Hewitt v. Charier, 16 Pick. 353; State v. Vanderluis, 42 Minn. 129, 6 L.R.A. 119, 43 N. W. 789.

In determining whether statutory requirements are arbitrary, unreasonable, or discriminatory, it must be borne in mind that the choice of measures is for the legislature, who are presumed to have investigated the subject and to have acted with reason, not from caprice. Legislation passed in the exercise of the police power must be reasonable in the sense that it must be based on reason as distinct from being wholly arbitrary or capricious; but when the legislature has power to legislate on a subject, the courts may only look into its enactment far enough to see whether it is in any view adapted to the end intended. If it is, the court must give it effect, however unwise they may regard it, or however much they might, if given the choice, prefer some other measure as more fit and appropriate.

Coming, then, to the particular provisions of the act in question, the requirement as to preliminary and professional education is not, in and of itself, either arbitrary or unreasonable. A preliminary education equivalent to a four-year high-school course registered by the regents and a professional education in a registered dental or medical school, or both, are certainly appropriate to fit one to pursue the calling of dentistry, and with the wisdom of that requirement we have nothing to do.

The appellant has no grievance from the provision that those duly licensed and registered as dentists in this state prior to the L.R.A.1915D.

1st day of August, 1895, are deemed licensed to practise. It is the rule for such acts to preserve the status of those lawfully engaged in the pursuit regulated. As said by the United States Supreme Court: "The 14th Amendment does not forbid statutes and statutory changes to have a beginning, and thus to discriminate between the rights of an earlier and later time." Sperry & H. Co. v. Rhodes, 220 U. S. 502, 55 L. ed. 561, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 490.

That there is no objection on constitutional ground to such exceptions has many times been decided. See Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231; Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173, 54 L. ed. 987, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644; Williams v. Walsh, 222 U. S. 415, 56 L. ed. 253, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 137. There is nothing discriminatory in the said provision. All persons in the same class, i. e., those licensed and registered in this state on a given date, are treated alike.

But it is said that the act prefers aliens to citizens of other states. As a matter of fact the contrary is the case. A person holding a diploma or license to practise dentistry in some foreign country, and granted by some registered authority, and having the prescribed preliminary education, may be admitted to examination pursuant to said § 166, whereas under § 168, a person having the prescribed preliminary and professional education, who holds a license to practise dentistry in any other of the United States, granted by a state board of dental examiners, indorsed by the Dental Society of the State of New York, may be licensed on the recommendation of the dental examiners without any examination at all.

It may seem hard that the defendant, who has practised dentistry for many years in other states, cannot be licensed here, or even permitted to take an examination to test his qualifications, until he first acquires the requisite preliminary and professional education; but it is difficult, if not impossible, to make a classification which will not in particular instances seem unjust. All in the same case as the defendant are treated alike. His fundamental error consists in the assumption that a license to practise dentistry in one state confers the like right in all other states, whereas such license is recognized, if at all, only on principles of comity. When the appellant came into this state he fell into the class of those who had never been licensed, unless the legislature saw fit to recognize the previous experience of those in the like case.

We find nothing in the statute which can fairly be said to discriminate in any way against the citizens of other states. The privileges and immunities secured to citizens of each state in the several states by the Federal Constitution are the privileges and immunities enjoyed by the citizens in the latter states, and are not the special privileges enjoyed by the citizens in their own states. Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. 168, 19 L. ed. 357; Lemmon v. People, 20 N. Y. 562. As a citizen of the United States, the defendant is not privileged to practise dentistry in this state without a license so to do.

Of the many cases cited by the appellant, the two bearing the most resemblance to this case are State v. Hinman, 65 N. H. 103, 23 Am. St. Rep. 22, 18 Atl. 194, and State v. Pennoyer, 65 N. H. 113, 5 L.R.A. 709, 18 Atl. 878. In those cases a statute of the state of New Hampshire, regulating the practice of dentistry and medicine, was held invalid because of a provision excepting those who had resided and practised their profession in the town or city of their present address during all the time since January 1, 1875,—a test which was held to be wholly arbitrary, and one having no reference to skill, learning, or fitness. The learned counsel for the appellant, on oral argument, placed great reliance on the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court in Smith v. Texas, 233 U. S. 630, 58 L. ed. 1129, L.R.A. —, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681. In that case a statute of the state of Texas prohibiting any person from acting as a conductor on a railroad train without having for two years prior thereto worked as a brakeman or a conductor of a freight train, and prescribing no other qualifications, was held to be invalid for arbitrarily excluding experienced and competent men from obtaining employment as conductors, and for arbitrarily limiting the class who could secure such employment to those who had served two years as a brakeman or a conductor on a freight train, regardless of their fitness.

It is urged that the provision of § 168 for licensing without examination those who hold a license to practise dentistry in any other state, granted by a state board of dental examiners, indorsed by the Dental Society of the State of New York, is void for granting to a private corporation, association, or individual an "exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise" in violation of article 3, § 18, of the state Constitution. In the first place, the act is general and is not a private or local bill. In the next place, the statute should be construed as imposing a duty, rather than as conferring a privilege, upon the dental society. It was the purpose of the statute to prescribe a standard and to provide methods to determine whether the qualifications of candidates came up to that standard. The only exception made is in favor of those already licensed in this state. All others must have the required preliminary and professional education, or its equivalent, and, unless licensed in some other state, must pass an examination. A diploma or license granted by some registered authority in a foreign country was evidently deemed the equivalent of a dental degree from a registered dental school in this country, but the possessor is required to show that he has the requisite preliminary education and to pass an examination. Licenses granted by boards of examiners in other states are recognized as sufficient evidence of the licensees' qualifications to be licensed in this state without examination, provided as high a standard is exacted in such other states as in this; in other words, provided the preliminary and professional education of such licensees has not been less than that required in this state. The power to determine the standard exacted in other states had to be lodged in some body, board, or officer. The act is not to be condemned on the assumption that the dental society will selfishly exercise the power conferred upon it to exclude eligible licensees of other states from practising in this. Of course, that power is not to be exercised capriciously or arbitrarily. It is certainly no greater than that conferred for many years in this state on county medical societies. See People ex rel. Dunnel v. Medical Soc. 3 Wend. 426.

It is unnecessary to determine whether the provision that fines, penalties, and forfeitures be paid to the State Dental Society is valid, because the appellant is in no way concerned with that question.

The judgment of conviction should be affirmed.

ERROR to the Court of Appeals for Cuyahoga County to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the court of Common Pleas in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to enjoin defendant from constructing a two-family or double house on her property. Reversed.

Statement by Newman, J.:

This was an action for an injunction brought by defendant in error on the 28th day of July, 1913, in the court of common pleas of Cuyahoga county. He sought to enjoin the plaintiff in error, Carrie E. Hunt, and one A. T. Sebek, a contractor, from any and all further work toward the construction of a two-family or double house on the real estate of said Carrie E. Hunt. He based his right of action on a certain clause of restriction contained in the deed of purchase of the real estate owned by said Carrie E. Hunt. The matter was heard in the court of common pleas on the motion of Carrie E. Hunt to dissolve a restraining order theretofore allowed, and was submitted to the court upon the petition, the answer of Carrie E. Hunt, the reply thereto, and an agreed statement of facts. The motion to dissolve was sustained, an injunction denied, and the petition dismissed at the costs of defendant in error. Defendant in error thereupon appealed the case to the court of appeals, and it was there heard upon the pleadings, the evidence, and agreed statement of facts.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that the defendant in error, Francis Held, was the owner of the easterly 25 feet of subplot 160 and the westerly 10 feet of subplot 161 in John W. Taylor & Company's Douglas Park subdivision, and that plaintiff in error, Carrie E. Hunt, was the owner of the easterly 30 feet of subplot 161 and the westerly 5 feet of subplot 162 in said subdivision; that both Francis Held and Carrie E. Hunt received their conveyances directly from the allotment company, and in each of the deeds there was the following covenant of restriction: "This property is sold for residence purposes only." It further appears that said plaintiff in error, Carrie E. Hunt, would construct on her property, unless enjoined, a two-family or double house, and that at the time the restraining order was allowed the excavation for said house had been made and a part of the easterly foundation constructed. The court of appeals found in favor of the defendant in error, and Carrie E. Hunt was perpetually enjoined from constructing or continuing the erection of any two-family or double house on her property, and judgment was rendered against her for costs.

Messrs. Thompson, Hine, & Flory, for plaintiff in error:

The restriction that property is sold "for residence purposes only" is not violated by the erection of a double or two-family dwelling house.

Newman, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In addition to the claim that the erection of a double or two-family house is not in violation of the clause of restriction contained in her deed, plaintiff in error contended that, if the erection of such a house did violate the restriction, it has been lost to defendant in error through his own acts or those of the common grantor. These acts are pleaded in the answer and are referred to at length in the agreed statement of facts. In arriving at a decision of this case, however, we have found it necessary to consider only the meaning of the clause of restriction contained in the deed.

It is the claim of counsel for defendant in error that in the erection of a double or two-family house on her property plaintiff in error would violate the restriction clause in her deed, and that, when the words, "this property is sold for residence purposes only," were inserted in the deeds, the sellers of the property clearly intended that single houses only should be built thereon, and that the language used excluded the idea of a number of residences under the same roof or in the same house. They concede that the use of a double or two-family house is a use for residence purposes in one sense, but that it is not a use for residence purposes "only," and say that therein lies the distinction. We are unable to see the distinction they would make. The word "only" in our opinion does not change the meaning of the words "residence purposes."

If there is any doubt as to the meaning of the words employed, the doubt should be resolved in favor of the free use of the property by plaintiff in error for any lawful purpose and against restrictions, for it is a well-settled rule that, in construing deeds and instruments containing restrictions and prohibitions as to the use of property conveyed, all doubts should be resolved in favor of the free use thereof for lawful purposes in the hands of the owners of the fee. Ewertsen v. Gerstenberg, 186 Ill. 344, 51 L.R.A. 310, 57 N. E. 1051. And again defendant in error acquired no greater rights under the restriction clause than his grantor had, and the rule that a deed is to be construed most strongly against the grantor applies here.

But is there any doubt as to the meaning of the words? The word "residence," as we view it, is equivalent to "residential" and was used in contradistinction to "business." If a building is used as a place of abode and no business carried on, it would be used for residence purposes only, whether occupied by one family or a number of families. Counsel say that the words were intended to describe a type of building. We think not. The word "residence" has reference to the use or mode of occupancy to which the building may be put. If it had been intended that the building was to be for the use of one family only, words indicating such an intention would have been used, as is frequently done, such as "a single residence," "a private residence," "a single dwelling house." And it is to be noted that the common grantor here, in his deed to another lot owner in the subdivision, used the expression: "This property is sold for single residence purposes only."

In Rose v. King, 49 Ohio St. 213, 15 L.R.A. 160, 30 N. E. 267, the court defines a tenement house as a building the different rooms or parts of which are let for residence purposes. The word "residence" as used in the clause of restriction here is, we think, used in the same sense.

Counsel have cited a number of cases decided by courts in other jurisdictions, but an examination of them will disclose the fact that in those cases there was under consideration language in restriction clauses materially different from that in the case at bar.

In Round Lake Asso. v. Kellogg, 141 N. Y. 348, 36 N. E. 326, there was a restriction against the use of the property for business purposes, and "residence purposes" does not appear. In Skillman v. Smatheurst, 57 N. J. Eq. 1, 40 Atl. 855, this language was used: "Any building other than for the use or purpose of a private dwelling." In Schadt v. Brill, 173 Mich. 647, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 139 N. W. 878, "other than a dwelling house with the usual appurtenances" was under consideration. But the supreme court of Michigan in Tillotson v. Gregory, 161 Mich. 132, 114 N. W. 1025, had made a distinction between the words "residence purposes" and "dwelling house," and held that while the latter words meant a single dwelling house, the words "residence purposes" would not bear such construction.

But it is claimed that the question has been clearly decided in this state. In support of this, they cite Rose v. King, supra, and Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, 63 Ohio St. 183, 58 N. E. 576. In the former case the question was not before the court, and in the latter the court was interpreting a provision in a lease that required the lessee to use the premises "for the purpose of a private dwelling or residence." On page 200 of 63 Ohio St., the court say: "The plain provision of the covenant is that the leased premises shall be used for the purposes of a dwelling or residence L.R.A.1915D.

only, not for a number of dwellings. More than that, they are restricted to the use of it for a private dwelling or residence; and that is not a private dwelling or residence which is used in the business of renting rooms to lodgers or tenants."

The court seems to have laid stress on the use of the words "a" and "private," these words appearing in the report italicized.

The only reported case to which our attention has been called where the language "for residence purposes only" is given the meaning claimed for it by defendant in error is Burton v. Stapely, 4 Ohio N. P. N. S. 65, and the case is discussed at length by counsel here. The common pleas judge, it seems, based his ruling on the language used by this court in Linwood Park Co. v. Van Dusen, quoted above. The language under consideration in the Van Dusen Case was entirely different from that before the court in Burton v. Stapely, and the holding of the court in the former case was not, we think, an authority for the position taken by the court in the latter, nor does it sustain the opinion of the court. In the Burton Case the common pleas court granted an injunction in favor of the plaintiff, and the case was appealed to the circuit court. There the injunction was denied. Error was prosecuted to this court, and the judgment of the circuit court was reversed and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in error on facts found by the circuit court. Burton v. Stapely, 74 Ohio St. 461, 78 N. E. 1120. In that case plaintiff had asked for an injunction upon the ground that there had been a violation of two restrictions in the conveyance, and this court may have found that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction on account of the violation of the restriction in the conveyance other than the one restricting the use of the property for residence purposes only, for the circuit court found as a fact that there had been a violation of the restriction in reference to the location of the building on the lot. The reversal of the judgment of the circuit court does not signify necessarily that this court approved the holding of the court of common pleas as to the meaning of the clause restricting the use of the property for residence purposes only.

In Brown v. Huber, 80 Ohio St. 183, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 705, 88 N. E. 322, in the covenant in the deed it was provided: "That the only buildings put upon said lot shall be a residence and the necessary attachments, and that it shall be used for no other purpose than that of a family residence, and shall cost not less than $5,000 for the residence alone."

The owner of the lot had constructed two dwelling houses and planned and purposed to construct two more. This the court said was prohibited by the restriction clause in the deed.

That the erection of a double or two-family house is not in violation of a restriction that the property is to be used "for residence purposes only" is the holding in Tillotson v. Gregory, 151 Mich. 132, 114 N. W. 1025; McDonald v. Spang, 55 Misc. 332, 105 N. Y. Supp. 617; McMurtry v. Phillips Invest. Co. 10% Ky. 308, 40 L.R.A. 489, 45 S. W. 96. In the latter case the language used was: "The property herein conveyed shall be used for residence purposes only, and that, in erecting a residence therein, it shall be built of brick or stone." The court say: "It is contended that the language of the restriction conveys the idea of a single residence for a single family, or at any rate excludes the idea of a number of residences under the same roof or in the same house. We think, however, that to give the language used this meaning would be to extend its scope beyond the express intention of the parties. The purposes for which the houses to be erected on the court were to be used were 'residence purposes only.' And as the house in controversy is to be constructed for such purpose only, and is not to be used for any other purpose, we do not think its construction is at all prohibited by this restriction clause."

See also note by annotator, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 728.

If the common grantor in the case before us had in mind the exclusion of a building for the abode of more than one family, he should have used language that would have expressed such an intention. The court cannot read it into the covenant.

We do not think the clause under consideration bears the interpretation given it by the court of appeals. Taking the language in its ordinary and popular sense, we are forced to the conclusion that it was not the intention of the common grantor to prohibit the erection of a double or two-family house on the premises. Defendant in error was therefore not entitled to the relief he sought, and his petition should have been dismissed.

Judgment of the Court of Appeals reversed, and judgment for plaintiff in error.

ST. LOUIS & SAN FRANCISCO RAIL-ROAD COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

HENRY M. DREYFUS et al., Doing Business under the Name Dreyfus Brothers.

(42 Okla. 401, 141 Pac. 773.)

Carrier — loss — act of God.

1. An act of God, such as a severe blizzard and snowstorm, which will excuse a carrier from liability for loss, must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but it must be the sole cause, and though the loss may have been caused by an act of God, yet, if the negligence of the defendant commingles with such act of God as an efficient, contributing, concurrent cause, and it appears from the evidence and the circumstances of the case that such injury would not have occurred except for such negligence, the company will be liable.

Evidence — loss by carrier — burden of proof.

Headnotes by HARRISON, C.

Note. — Burden of proof when the defense in an action to recover for loss or injury to goods during carriage is act of God or vis major.

This note is supplemental to the note to Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Logan, S. & Co. 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 663, where the earlier cases are collected.

For duty of carrier where act of God has occurred or is threatened, see the note to Armstrong v. Illinois C. R. Co. 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 671.

For carrier's liability for injury to live stock by weather conditions, see the note to Colsch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013.

As stated in the earlier note, the rule is well settled that whenever a carrier seeks to excuse itself for loss occurring through an act of God or irresistible superhuman cause, inevitable accident, or the public enemy, the burden of proof rests upon the carrier to establish such defense.

Thus, in Jonesboro, L. C. & E. R. Co. v. Dunnavant, — Ark. —, 174 S. W. 1187, in affirming a judgment upon a verdict for a shipper for damages on account of delay, where the carrier claimed that it had not accepted the shipment until high water had blocked its road, the court said: "By the common law a common carrier is in effect an insurer of goods intrusted to it for carriage while same are being transported, except when the loss occurs by the act of God, of the public enemy, or public authority, or from the inherent nature of the goods, and the burden of proving that the loss arose from any of these excepted acts rests upon the carrier."

a delay in shipment, the burden is upon the plaintiff to make out a prima facie case that the shipment was delivered to the carrier in good order and received from the carrier in damaged condition; and where the carrier denies liability because such loss was occasioned by an act of God, the burden is upon the carrier to show that such loss was the proximate result of the act of God; but, when this is done, the burden then shifts to the shipper to show that negligence on the part of the carrier co-operated with the act of God in bringing about the damage to the shipment.

Trial — jury — care of carrier.

3. Where a carrier seeks to avoid liability for loss on account of a snowstorm, and there is conflicting testimony as to whether such carrier, notwithstanding such snowstorm, could, by the exercise of ordinary care or reasonable efforts, have prevented the loss, it is proper to submit such issue of fact to the jury.

Evidence — burden of proof — care of carrier.

4. An instruction "that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to satisfy the jury by its evidence not only that the loss sustained by the plaintiff . . ." was occasioned by the act of God, but also that "the defendant exercised due care and diligence in the performance of its duty, and was not in any manner negligent in doing or omitting to do any act that might have averted the loss," such instruction, being unqualified or unmodified by other instructions, is an erroneous statement of the law.

As holding that an act of God, i. e., a washout, causing the delay charged, was not shown so as to invalidate a verdict for the shipper, see New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Mauldin, 103 Miss. 244, 60 So. 211.

It may be noted that in Colsch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 149 Iowa, 176, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013, 127 N. W. 198, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 915, where the carrier was held liable only for ordinary care, it was held that the burden of proof of the carrier's negligence was on the shipper where live stock were frozen, and that the plaintiff, who had accompanied his stock, was said by the court to have "assumed the burden of proving defendant's negligence not only in his pleading, but in the introduction of his testimony."

But in this connection it may be noted also that where furniture was injured by fire in transit and the shipper accompanied the goods, it was held that the ordinary rule is not altered or lessened by the fact that the shipper or his agent accompanies the goods. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Pape, 100 Ark. 269, 140 S. W. 265, where the court said: "Our conclusion is that by the common law a common carrier is in effect an insurer of goods intrusted to it for carriage while the same are in transit, except when the loss occurs by reason of one or the other of the acts above specified, and that the burden of

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. W. F. Evans, R. A. Kleinschmidt, and E. H. Foster, for plaintiff in error:

A snowstorm such as the evidence shows occurred at Tulsa on the night of February 15th is an act of God, for the consequences of which the defendant is not responsible.

Even where a common carrier is guilty of negligent delay in making delivery of freight, if such freight is destroyed by an act of God occurring subsequently to such delay, the act of God, and not the delay, would be referred to as the proximate cause of the injury.

proving that the loss arose from any of those excepted acts rests upon the carrier, even though the shipper accompanies the goods, and that it is only in cases where the shipper claims that the carrier was negligent in not avoiding or lessening the damage after it had arisen from an act of the shipper that the burden of proof rests upon the shipper to prove such negligence."

As appears in St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Dreyfus, the Oklahoma court adheres to its former holding in Armstrong, B. & Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 26 Okla. 352, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 871, 109 Pac. 216, that the carrier, having shown that the loss or injury was due to the act of God, is not bound to show affirmatively that there was no negligence or want of due care on its part but for which the goods would not have been injured or destroyed.

There are other recent cases, however, which hold to the contrary.

Thus, in Charleston & W. C. R. Co. v. Nixon Grocery Co. 142 Ga. 343, 82 S. E. 893, it was held that in an action brought against a common carrier to recover the value of goods delivered to it for transportation, where the sole defense was that the goods were not delivered because they were destroyed by act of God, to wit, an unprecedented flood of water which inundated and destroyed the goods, the burden was on the

So, in Ferguson v. Southern R. Co. 91 S. C. 61, 74 S. E. 129, the court, in affirming a judgment against the carrier for loss which it claimed was due to an act of God, viz., by an unprecedented flood, said: "The rule upon which this case must be decided was stated thus in Slater v. South Carolina R. Co. 29 S. C. 96, 6 S. E. 936: 'Where an act of God causes injury to property in the hands of a common carrier, and such act is the sole cause of such injury, then the proof of this fact is a perfect shield. But if there be any negligence on the part of the carrier, which, if it had not been present, the injury would not have happened, notwithstanding the act of God, the carrier cannot escape responsibility. And the onus is upon the carrier to show, not only that the act of God was the cause, but that it was the entire cause, because it is only when the act of God is the entire cause that the carrier can be shielded.'" Quoted and followed in Deaver-Jeter Co. v. Southern R. Co. 95 S. C. 485, 79 S. E. 709 (also a case of flood).

This passage was also quoted in National Rice Mill Co. v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. 132 La. 615, 61 So. 708, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 1099, where, under the Louisiana Code, which L.R.A.1915D.

provides that the carrier, to be relieved from liability, must prove "that such loss or damage has been occasioned by accidental and uncontrollable event," it was held that the carrier should have proved its allegation that a sudden flood ignited lime, causing the fire which destroyed the plaintiff's property; "that this happened without any contributory negligence on its part, and that the sudden and unprecedented flood, which could not have been anticipated, with the resultant fire, was the proximate cause of the destruction of plaintiff's property; . . . that the cars were not unreasonably delayed, and that nothing could have been done by respondent which was not done to save the property;" and that this was not altered by the fact that there was a stipulation in the bill of lading excepting damage by fire "unless such damage or destruction shall result directly and exclusively from their negligence or that of their employees, and unless such negligence shall be affirmatively established by the owner of said property."

Harrison, C., filed the following opinion:

This is an appeal from a judgment rendered upon two separate causes of action based upon an alleged negligence in delivery of two separate shipments of bananas. There was no separate finding as to liability in each shipment, but a general verdict in the sum of $314.12 was found in favor of plaintiffs below. The grounds for reversal arose from the issues involved in the first cause of action, which was based upon the allegation that, by the careless and negligent failure to deliver a car of bananas, the fruit became frozen and damaged to the amount sued for. The carrier defended on the ground that the damage was not the result of the carrier's negligence, but was the result of a severe snowstorm which froze and blocked up the switches and covered the tracks to such an extent that the car could not be delivered sooner than it was. The facts are that the car of fruit arrived at Tulsa between 7 and 8 o'clock on the evening of the 15th of February; that during the night of the 15th a blizzard and snowstorm came up and the weather turned severely cold; that the blizzard raged throughout the day and night of the 16th, and the car was not set at plaintiffs' warehouse until the 17th.

The carrier maintained that it was prevented from making the delivery by the severity of the storm, and invokes the doctrine of nonliability, where damages are the result of an act of God, citing an extended list of authorities in support of this contention. We find no fault with the authorities cited. We believe the settled rule to be that a carrier is not liable for damages resulting solely from an act of God, and this rule is followed by many authorities, even where the carrier was guilty of negligence prior to the act of God. But this rule is not applicable to the facts in the case at bar.

The decisive issue of fact in this case was whether the storm was in fact so severe that the carrier could not have set the car at plaintiffs' warehouse on the 16th, and L.R.A.1915D.

thereby averted the loss. The plaintiffs introduced testimony that a switch engine was seen operating and switching in the yards during the day of the 16th. The defendant admitted that it operated passenger trains during the day, but contended that the switches were so badly frozen and covered up with snow that they did not move any of the freight cars on the 16th. There was testimony also that it was equally as cold or colder on the 17th than on the 16th, and the car was delivered on that day. Under these circumstances, there was sufficient issue of fact to go to the jury as to whether or not the carrier, by ordinary care or reasonable efforts, could have prevented the injury, notwithstanding the snowstorm, and the court was not in error in refusing to give a peremptory instruction in favor of the railroad. This court in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Johnson, 34 Okla. 582, 126 Pac. 567, held: "An act of God, such as an unprecedented rainfall and resulting flood, which will excuse from liability, must not only be the proximate cause of the loss, but it must be the sole cause. If, however, the injury is caused by an act of God commingled with the negligence of the defendant, as an efficient and contributing concurrent cause, and the injury would not have occurred except for such negligence, the defendant will be liable."

We think the facts that the company was operating passenger trains, and the testimony that a switch engine was seen operating in the yards during the day of the 16th, and the fact that the car was delivered on the 17th, which it is admitted was colder than the 16th, were sufficient to raise the issue as to whether the carrier, by the exercise of reasonable efforts, could have delivered the fruit on the 16th, and that it was not improper to submit such issues to the jury.

But the court, in paragraph 6 of its charge, instructed the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the burden of proof is upon the defendant to satisfy the jury by its evidence, not only that the loss sustained by the plaintiff in its first cause of action was occasioned by the act of God, but also that the defendant exercised due care and diligence in the performance of its duty, and was not in any manner negligent in doing or omitting to do any act that might have averted the loss."

This instruction was excepted to by defendant, and presented as grounds for reversal in the original brief of the company, but the error in this instruction was overlooked in the original opinion, in which the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. But in the petition for rehearing the error contended for therein is pointed out with more clearness and argued with more force, and, upon reconsideration of this instruction, we believe the contention of plaintiff in error should be sustained. This instruction unqualifiedly places the burden upon the defendant to satisfy the jury that the loss was occasioned by an act of God, and to further satisfy them that the loss could not have been averted by the exercise of all due care and diligence. The burden was not on the defendant until plaintiffs had made a prima facie case which, without further proof, would have entitled them to recover. And the question of defendant's negligence in failing to deliver the car on the 16th being a close question of fact, it is readily seen that the jury could have been easily misled by the foregoing instruction, especially so since it was unqualified by any other paragraph in the charge. The correct rule as to the burden of proof in such cases is stated by this court in Armstrong, B. & Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 28 Okla. 352, 29 L.R.A. (N.S.) 671, 109 Pac. 216, wherein the principal question was the burden of proof. The court in the syllabus, after defining what constitutes a prima facie case, says: "(a) The carrier, by proving the damage was due entirely to the flood or act of God, overcomes such prima facie case, and the burden shifts to the shipper, then, to show that negligence on the part of the carrier co-operated with the act of God in bringing about the damage to the shipment, in order to recover."

For the error contained in the above instruction, the former opinion, affirming the judgment, is withdrawn, and this one filed instead, and the judgment reversed, and the cause remanded.

Note — Conveyance of homestead by husband after abandonment by wife.

The earlier authorities upon the above question are set out in the opinion in Murphy v. Renner, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 565, and in the note accompanying that case.

As to validity of conveyance or encumbrance of homestead by wife after abandonment by husband, see note to Somers v. Somers, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1024.

As to stoppel of wife living apart from her husband, to claim homestead as against purchaser ignorant of relationship, see note to Mason v. Dierks Lumber & Coal Co. 26 L.R.A. (N.S.) 574.

As to power of husband without wife's consent to abandon homestead, or to convey the premises by his sole deed after abandonment, see note to Stewart v. Pritchard, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 807.

The point now under discussion seems to have been decided in but two cases since the writing of the earlier note.

In McWhorter v. Brady, 41 Okla. 383, 140 Pac. 782, a statute provided that when the title to the homestead is in the husband, and the wife voluntarily abandons him for a period of one year, or for any cause takes up her residence out of the state, he may convey, mortgage, or make any contract relating thereto, without being joined therein by her, and contained a like provision requiring the husband to join in a conveyance of the homestead, the title to which is in the wife. The court said that before a deed to a homestead signed by one spouse only would constitute a good conveyance, there must be a voluntary abandonment by the other spouse, and refused to disturb the finding of the trial court that the wife's abandonment was involuntary and due to the husband's misconduct, and consequently held the deed of the husband alone of the homestead property void.

And in Johnson v. Chandler, — Vt. —, 92 Atl. 26, a mortgage of a homestead executed by a husband alone after he and his wife had separated was held void under Pub. Stat. 2553, on the ground that the wife did not join in its execution and acknowledgment.

the homestead of the family, by a married man, given without the wife's consent in the manner prescribed by law, is void.

Same — separation of family.

4. Where the relation of husband and wife exists, the deed of the former to the homestead of the family conveys no title, and this notwithstanding the fact that the husband and wife be living separate and apart, or even though the wife may have, without justifiable cause, abandoned the husband.

Mortgage — to wife — foreclosure — rights.

5. Where a husband gives a wife a mortgage on the homestead to secure the payment of a postnuptial settlement, which mortgage she subsequently foreclosed by suit, the purchaser at the foreclosure sale succeeds to her rights, and may attack as void a deed given to the homestead by the husband without the wife's consent.

Homestead — void statutes.

6. Sections 882 and 883, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903 (§§ 1189 and 1190, Comp. Laws, 1909), infringe upon and are repugnant to § 2 of article 12 of our Constitution, prohibiting the sale of the homestead where owned by a married man, without the consent of his wife given in the manner prescribed by law; hence were not extended in force in the state by § 2, art. 25, of the Constitution.

Evidence — rents.

Sharp, C., filed the following opinion:

The controversy between the parties concerns the title to a quarter section of land in Alfalfa county which was patented by the government to one James D. Whelan in 1906. Prior thereto, and in March, 1904, said James D. Whelan and Mary F. Whelan were married, and continued to reside together as husband and wife on the land in question until July 18, 1907, when, owing to domestic troubles, they separated, the husband continuing to reside on the farm, and the wife in the city of Cherokee, Alfalfa county. In 1907 each filed a divorce suit against the other, in different courts, which suits were pending and undetermined on May 21, 1908. On the latter day they entered into a contract whereby the said James D. Whelan was to pay his wife, at fixed times, the sum of $500, and dismiss his divorce proceedings, and further agreed to begin a new suit for divorce, charging as ground thereof defendant's abandonment of plaintiff, and to which suit to be so instituted the wife would make no defense. The wife also agreed, in consideration of the husband's undertakings, to dismiss her divorce suit, and, further, that upon payment of said sum of money, she would make no claim or demand of him for either temporary or permanent alimony or suit money. The performance of the provisions of this postnuptial contract was secured by a mortgage concurrently executed by the husband on the land in question, which mortgage was on the day of its execution duly placed of record. At the same time the land was occupied by the husband as a homestead. Thereafter, and on the 29th day of May following, the said James D. Whelan executed a deed purporting to convey to the defendant P. O. Adams the land in question, but which deed was not signed by his wife, and was given without her knowledge. On the 1st day of June following, P. O. Adams, joined by his wife, Effie Adams, executed a mortgage on said land to the plaintiff, Frank H. Whelan, a brother of James D. Whelan, which mortgage purported to have been given to secure the payment of a $3,000 note of even date, in favor of said mortgagee. This mortgage was placed of record on the day of its execution.

James D. Whelan having defaulted in the payment of the amount named in the settlement made with his wife, the latter, on July 17th following, instituted in the district court of Alfalfa county an action to foreclose the mortgage given to secure the performance of the contract. Neither P. O. Adams or his wife or Frank H. Whelan were parties to the foreclosure action. Personal service of summons was had on the defendant James D. Whelan, and on the 2d day of October, 1908, a judgment foreclosing said mortgage was rendered by the district court, and at a foreclosure sale subsequently held the land was purchased by the dependant Emery L. Metcalf, subject to a first mortgage in favor of the Monarch Loan Company. The sale being confirmed, a sheriff's deed was executed and delivered to said Metcalf on March 2, 1910, and placed of record in the office of register of deeds.

The present action was brought on December 15, 1910, by Frank H. Whelan, to foreclose his mortgage given by the defendants Adams and wife. It is insisted by each of the plaintiffs in error that neither Mary F. Whelan or Emery L. Metcalf have any right, title, or interest in the land in question, and, further, that Metcalf was not an innocent purchaser for value, and was not therefore entitled to an order restoring to him his expenditures laid out in the purchase of said farm, and the subsequent payment of taxes thereon, and interest on the Monarch Loan Company loan. On the part of Mary F. Whelan it is insisted in her answer and cross petition that, for numerous reasons named, the deed executed by her husband to P. O. Adams was void, and that hence Frank Whelan acquired no rights in the premises by virtue of his mortgage. As to her codefendant, Metcalf, Mary F. Whelan asked that the court enter its decree canceling any claim, right, or title that said defendant might have in the premises. In her reply to the answer and cross petition of defendant Metcalf, said defendant Whelan set up the mortgage given in her favor by her husband, the contract of May 21, 1908, the mortgage foreclosure proceedings, the sheriff's deed executed pursuant thereto, and charged that said contract and each and all of said proceedings were illegal and void, and tendered back to said Metcalf $500, and interest. The defendant Metcalf, in his cross petition, also charged that, for different reasons assigned, Adams acquired no title on account of his purported deed of May 29th, and that therefore the mortgage given by him and his wife to Frank H. Whelan in turn conveyed no interest or right to the property in question. Said defendant further set up the proceedings through which he acquired title at the foreclosure sale, including the sheriff's deed, charged that Mary F. Whelan was estopped from attacking his title, and asked for a cancellation of the deed from James D. Whelan to Adams, for a judgment barring the defendant Mary F. Whelan from any claim, right, title, or interest in the premises, and for a further decree vesting and conferring the title to said premises in him.

It was insisted on the part of the plaintiffs in error that Mary F. Whelan, in July, 1907, voluntarily and without cause abandoned her husband, and that the agreement of May 21, 1908, between James D. Whelan and his wife, and the subsequent foreclosure proceedings brought to enforce the terms thereof, the judgment of the court, order of confirmation, and the sheriff's deed, were each and all illegal and void, being against public policy, and that thereby the said Metcalf acquired no title by virtue of the sheriff's deed; that, Mary F. Whelan having without justifiable cause abandoned her husband, the deed executed by the latter to Adams on May 29th was valid, though not executed by her.

The case was tried before the court, special findings of fact and conclusions of law being made. In the decree Mary F. Whelan was given the immediate possession of the land in question, which was found to be the homestead of herself and husband. The sheriff's deed executed to the defendant Emery L. Metcalf was adjudged to be void, and it was ordered that said Metcalf have a lien against said land for the sum of $988.43. The mortgage executed by Adams and wife to Frank H. Whelan and wife was declared to be null and void, and ordered canceled, set aside, and held for naught, and said P. O. Adams and Effie Adams were adjudged to be in wrongful and unlawful possession of the premises, and their title ordered divested. Judgment was rendered against Adams and wife for $570; that being found to be the reasonable rent and profit arising from the land during their period of occupancy. Neither defendant Mary F. Whelan nor Emery L. Metcalf filed a motion for a new trial; hence, as between them, the judgment of the new trial court is final.

In view of our conclusions, it will be necessary to consider but few of the many assignments of error. The trial court's action in forcing plaintiff and defendants P. O. Adams and Effie Adams to trial on the day the issues of fact were joined was erroneous. The pleadings, it appears, were filed within the time prescribed by statute, or were permitted to be filed with the court's consent. At no time were the parties in default; neither were the demurrers filed by them adjudged to be frivolous. Section 5644, Comp. Laws 1909, provides that whenever the answer contains new matter constituting a right of relief against a codefendant, concerning the subject-matter of the action, such codefendant may demur or reply to such matter in the same manner as if he were plaintiff, and subject to the same rules as far as applicable. Long v. Harris, 37 Okla. 472, 132 Pac. 473. Section 5834, Comp. Laws 1909, provides when actions shall be triable, and has recently been construed by this court in Ardmore v. Orr, 35 Okla. 305, 129 Pac. 867; Conwill v. Eldridge, 35 Okla. 537, 130 Pac. 912; Title Guaranty & T. Co. v. Turnbull, 40 Okla. L.R.A.1915D.

294, 137 Pac. 1178; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Pitchford, — Okla. —, 143 Pac. 1146. In view, however, of the conceded facts, and of the law in the present case, by which the rights of both plaintiffs in error are to be determined, the error was without prejudice, and therefore not sufficient to cause a reversal.

The controlling question is that of the right of James D. Whelan to execute to P. O. Adams the deed of May 29, 1908. At the time of its execution said James D. Whelan and Mary F. Whelan were husband and wife, and the land attempted to be conveyed, though owned by the former, was the homestead of the family. Section 2, art. 12, of our Constitution, provides that the homestead of the family shall not be sold by the owner, if married, without the consent of his or her spouse, given in such manner as may be prescribed by law. At no time did Mary F. Whelan give her consent to the sale attempted to be made to Adams. The question presented does not appear to ever have been passed upon by this court. The opinions in Maloy v. Wm. Cameron & Co. 29 Okla. 763, 119 Pac. 587; Kelly v. Mosby, 34 Okla. 218, 124 Pac. 984; and Krauss v. Potts, 38 Okla. 674, 135 Pac. 362, all involve transfers made or attempted prior to the adoption of our state Constitution. The sale, having been made in direct violation of the express provision of our organic law, was void; hence Adams acquired no rights by reason of his purchase. The constitutional inhibition is plain, unambiguous, and admits of no exceptions which would destroy its obvious design. If the owner be a married man, the consent of the wife, given in such manner as may be prescribed by law, is essential to the valid alienation of the homestead, unless (it may be) the conveyance be made to her. No alienation of the homestead by the husband alone, in whatever way it may be effected, is of any validity; nothing that he can do or suffer to be done can cast a cloud upon the title; it remains absolutely free from all grants and encumbrances, except those mentioned in the Constitution. Morris v. Ward, 5 Kan. 239. Efforts have been made to ingraft exceptions arising out of the supposed necessities of the case, upon similar constitutional provisions or statutory enactments, but in all states save one, so far as we have examined the authorities, they have uniformly failed; for it must be remembered that it is not the homestead of the husband alone, though the title be in his name; it is the homestead of the family, made so by the Constitution.

Provisions similar to that of our Constitution are found either in the Constitutions or statutes of the great majority of the states of the Union, and, with a single exception, so far as our investigation has disclosed, conveyances made or attempted by the husband, without the consent of the wife given in the manner prescribed by law, are held to be void. Many of the authorities are collected in the notes to Poole v. Gerrard, 6 Cal. 71, 65 Am. Dec. 481; Chambers v. Cox, 23 Kan. 393; Alt v. Banholzer, 39 Minn. 511, 12 Am. St. Rep. 681, 40 N. W. 830; Stanton v. Hitchcock, 64 Mich. 316, 8 Am. St. Rep. 821, 31 N. W. 395; Martin v. Harrington, 73 Vt. 193, 87 Am. St. Rep. 704, 50 Atl. 1074; Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, 58 Pac. 910, 59 Pac. 296; O'Malley v. Ruddy, 79 Wis. 147, 24 Am. St. Rep. 702, 48 N. W. 116; Seiffert & W. Lumber Co. v. Hartwell, 94 Iowa, 576, 58 Am. St. Rep. 413, 63 N. W. 333; McKenzie v. Shows, 70 Miss. 388, 35 Am. St. Rep. 654, 12 So. 336.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that Mary F. Whelan had voluntarily abandoned her husband, and, notwithstanding his entreaties for her return, had continued to absent herself from the homestead, and to live separate and apart from her husband. The finding of the trial court, however, was to the effect that the abandonment was not voluntary, but was caused by the threats and ill treatment of the husband. We deem the fact of what caused the wife to leave and remain away from home, and whether her abandonment was voluntary or involuntary, as immaterial. They were still husband and wife, never having been divorced, and there is no exception written in our Constitution authorizing the husband to sell the homestead without the wife's consent upon her voluntary abandonment of him. Neither are we disposed to write into the language used an implied exception. Thompson v. New England Mortg. Secur. Co. 110 Ala. 400, 55 Am. St. Rep. 29, 18 So. 315; Murphy v. Renner, 99 Minn. 348, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 565, 116 Am. St. Rep. 418, 109 N. W. 593; Herron v. Knapp, S. & Co. 72 Wis. 553, 40 N. W. 149; Chambers v. Cox, 23 Kan. 393; Ott v. Sprague, 27 Kan. 620; Johnston v. Turner, 29 Ark. 230; Williams v. Swetland, 10 Iowa, 51; Lies v. De Diabler, 12 Cal. 327; Rogers v. Day, 115 Mich. 664, 69 Am. St. Rep. 593, 74 N. W. 190.

The contention that, even though the deed was void because the wife had not joined in its execution, or consented to the sale of the homestead, that fact cannot be availed of by the defendant Metcalf, is without merit. Metcalf purchased at the foreclosure sale, and occupies the same position in law, with regard to the Adams deed, as would Mary F. Whelan. The facts in this case are very similar to those in L.R.A.1915D.

Rogers v. Day, supra. There it was insisted that only the husband, widow, or children could take advantage of the homestead right, and maintain a suit to protect it, and that, since neither in that case disaffirmed the conveyance, the complainant had no standing. There the homestead had been sold upon execution on a decree for alimony rendered in favor of the wife, and it was held that the complainant, who derived his title through mesne conveyances, stood in the shoes of the wife; that, as she chose to have the property sold upon execution on a decree rendered in her favor, she was estopped to set up her homestead right as against the purchaser at the sale and his grantees; that, complainant being in possession under her, and as her grantee under the execution sale, he succeeded to her rights. To the same effect are Dorsey v. McFarland, 7 Cal. 342; Dye v. Mann, 10 Mich. 291; Bolton v. Oberne, 79 Iowa, 278, 44 N. W. 547; Goodwin v. Goodwin, 113 Iowa, 319, 85 N. W. 31; 21 Cyc. 558.

Section 883, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903 (§ 1190, Comp. Laws 1909), provided that, the husband or wife executing the instrument relating to the homestead, without being joined with the other, it could only be avoided by the one not joining. In Malloy v. Wm. Cameron & Co. 29 Okla. 763, 119 Pac. 587, Judge Williams called attention to the fact that said section did not appear to have been extended in force by the Constitution. This observation, in our judgment, stated a correct conclusion. The statute mentioned is without doubt repugnant to § 2, art. 12, Constitution, providing how the homestead of the family may be sold, and was therefore not put in force by § 2, art. 25, of the Constitution. By § 882, Wilson's Rev. & Anno. Stat. 1903 (§ 1189, Comp. Laws. 1909), it is provided that, where the title to the homestead is in the husband, and the wife voluntarily abandons him for the period of one year, or from any cause takes up her residence outside of the state, he may convey, mortgage, or make any contract relating thereto, without being joined therein by her. We think that this section of the statute must likewise fall. To hold otherwise would be to create an exception whereby, when one of two facts appear, the husband could convey the homestead without the consent of his wife. The fact that the wife may have without any cause taken up her residence outside of the state, or that she may voluntarily abandon her husband for a period of one year, does not of itself dissolve the marriage relation, unless, perhaps, it should continue for a sufficient length of time to raise the legal presumption of death. A similar question was before the court of chancery appeals of Tennessee in Couch v. Capitol Bldg. & L. Asso. — Tenn. —, 64 S. W. 340. It was contended by the defendants in that case, in effect, that, the husband having deserted and abandoned his wife before the execution of her deed, she had the right under Shannon's Code, § 4242, to sell or mortgage the homestead without her husband joining in the conveyance with her. On the other hand, it was urged by the complainant that, under the Constitution, the homestead could only be alienated by the joint consent of husband and wife, when that relation existed, and that in the purview of the law the relation of husband and wife was not dissolved by his desertion and abandonment of her. The opinion reads in part: "The homestead is a property right fixed in our Constitution. Const. art. 11, § 11. Its extent and duration are also fixed by it. The method of its alienation where the marriage relation exists is prescribed by it, and that is by the joint consent of the husband and wife. Legislation subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution prescribes how this joint consent shall be given. We are of opinion that it is not competent for the legislature to provide for the alienation of the homestead without the joint consent of the husband and wife, when that relation exists, simply because the Constitution says in explicit terms that it shall not be alienated otherwise. The mode or manner of giving or evidencing the joint consent of the husband and wife is another matter. The legislature may act here and prescribe. If correct in this, it follows that the section of the Code (Shannon's Code, § 4242) is of no avail to appellants in this aspect of the case, unless we hold that the desertion of the wife by the husband does away with the relation of husband and wife. It is not believed that such a proposition finds support in any adjudicated case, nor in sound judicial reasoning, when applied to the marriage state and statute. The relation of husband and wife is not dissolved, done away with, or destroyed by the desertion of either spouse by the other."

The clause "given in such manner as may be prescribed by law," in § 2, art. 12, Constitution, deals only, as the context clearly shows, with the form of the consent to the sale of the homestead; such, for instance, as whether the deed of conveyance should be executed jointly by the husband and wife, whether the wife should be privily examined by the officer taking her acknowledgment, or what officer was authorized by law to take such acknowledgment.

The deed from James D. Whelan to P. O. Adams, being void for the reasons already noted, neither the latter or his mortgagee, L.R.A.1915D.

Frank H. Whelan, acquired any rights thereunder, and as to them it matters not what errors the trial court may have committed. They have no cause to complain, for in no event are they or either of them entitled to any form of relief against the defendants in error.

The judgment for rents against Adams and wife for the years 1909 and 1910 should be vacated. During these years the wife had lived separate and apart from her husband. From the time of their separation in July, 1907, until the filing of her answer and cross petition in March, 1911, she had not asserted her right in the homestead. On the contrary, in 1908 she and her husband had effected a settlement purporting to be in full of their property rights, and which settlement she sought to, and did, enforce by a foreclosure proceeding in court. Her position during the years for which rent was recovered was that of a creditor, and not of a homestead claimant. Whatever we may think of the validity of the postnuptial settlement between James D. Whelan and wife, or of the effect that should have been given her subsequent foreclosure proceedings enforcing its terms, it cannot be that, covering the very period during which she occupied a wholly antagonistic position, she should be allowed to recover rents and profits arising from the lands sold Metcalf under the judgment against her husband. During the entire period she and James D. Whelan were husband and wife. We are not to be understood as saying that under no circumstances may a wife recover rents from the homestead where the title thereto is in the husband. It may be there are times when she can, though the husband be living and they be not divorced. But under a state of facts such as presented by the record before us we must conclude that no such recovery can be had.

To our minds, the court below erred in canceling the sheriff's deed to Emery L. Metcalf, but, as he appears to be satisfied with the judgment restoring to him the purchase price of the land, and the taxes and interest paid out, we are without authority to review the judgment as between said defendants.

In so far as the judgment of the court below gave judgment for rent against plaintiffs in error P. O. Adams and Effie Adams, it should be vacated and set aside. In all other respects the judgment should be affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

STELLA M. HENCH, Admr., etc., of Edgar S. Hench, Deceased,
v.

PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY,
Appt.

(246 Pa. 1, 91 Atl. 1056.)

Evidence — to show interstate character of work in which servant is engaged.

1. To entitle a brakeman who is a member of a shifting crew in a freight yard to hold the railroad company liable for personal injuries under the Federal employers' liability act or safety appliance act, he must show that at the time of the injury he was engaged in interstate commerce or with its instrumentalities, and this burden is not met merely by showing that in the yard where he was employed cars containing interstate as well as intrastate shipments were handled.

Same — suppression — absence of record.

2. Failure of a railroad company to produce in response to a subpoena the record of the cars with which an employee in a yard was at work when injured does not amount to a suppression of evidence which will raise a presumption against the company, if the evidence is uncontradicted that no such record was kept.

(July 1, 1914.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Washington County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages, under the Federal employers' liability act, for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's husband. Reversed.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. R. W. Irwin, Rufus S. Mar-riner, and James A. Wiley for appellant.

Messrs. W. Clyde Grubbs, Edwin T. Levengood, and Alexander M. Temple-ton for appellee.

Elkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trespass to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in the death of plaintiff's husband, who was employed as a brakeman in a general freight yard of defendant railroad company, located in the city of Pittsburgh. The suit was brought under two acts of Congress—the employers' liability act of April 22, 1908, and the safety appliance act of March 2, 1893. In such a case the burden is on the party suing to prove the facts necessary to show a violation of the Federal statutes, and that the injured party was engaged in interstate commerce or with its instrumentalities at the time of the accident.

In the case at bar the injured party was engaged as a brakeman on a shifting crew in a freight yard, where all kinds of freight were received and distributed. If the action had been brought at common law or for the violation of a state statute, the question of the character of the commerce in which the decedent was engaged at the time of his injury would have been immaterial; but plaintiff elected to bring her suit under the acts of Congress, as she clearly had the right to do, and thus assumed the burden of making out a case under the Federal statutes. The controlling question for decision here is whether the evidence adduced at the trial was sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the acts of Congress relied on to sustain a recovery. Appellant contends the evidence does not show that in the performance of his duties as brakeman the deceased husband had anything to do with interstate commerce, or that at the time of the injury he was engaged in such commerce, or that the cars being shifted in the freight yard where decedent was injured, including the cars which caused the injuries, were so engaged. Even counsel for appellee concede that there was no direct or positive testimony bearing upon these material questions. No attempt was made to prove what the general duties of decedent were, or what duties were included within the scope of his employment, and the fact that he was a brakeman only appears as an incident of the trial, without explanation as to the character of his general duties, or that he had anything to do in connection with interstate shipments. At the close of the trial the only substantive fact proved tending to show in any way decedent to have been engaged even remotely in interstate commerce was that in the freight yard where he was employed cars containing both intra and interstate shipments were received, stored, shifted, and reloaded for transportation from time to time. So far as the evidence discloses there is no greater presumption that the empty cars being shifted at the time of the accident were intended for use in interstate commerce than that they were to contain intrastate shipments. The evidence is silent as to the character of freight with which these cars were loaded when they arrived in the freight yard, what disposition had been made of the cars after their arrival, and what kind of shipments, if any, they contained when they left the yard. All of these important facts are left to conjecture.

Can it be said under these circumstances that the plaintiff made out a case under the acts of Congress? It is argued that where there is no direct or positive evidence of the negligence charged, or of the facts required to make the acts of Congress applicable, the circumstances may be such as to warrant the necessary inference to be drawn by the jury. This is stating the rule more broadly than the cases relied on warrant. It is true that the facts proved at the trial may warrant a presumption of negligence, and there are exceptional cases in which it has been so held. But even in such cases it is for the court to say whether the facts proved are sufficient to raise the presumption relied on. 38 Cyc. 1519; Stoever v. Whitman, 6 Binn. 416. In the case at bar the facts proved do not show what kind of commerce decedent was engaged in at the time of the accident. The empty cars may have been intended for interstate shipments, or for intrastate. There is no more presumption one way than the other. The presumptions in this respect are equal, if, indeed, it can be said there is any presumption under such circumstances. Again, it is worthy of notice that the cars being shifted were empties and did not contain any kind of commerce, and there is no evidence to show from whence they came nor whither they were going, what kind of shipments they carried into the freight yard, or what character of commerce they were engaged in when they left it.

It is further contended for appellee that the failure to produce the records of the draft of cars in question when subpoenaed to do so amounts to a suppression of evidence on the part of appellant, and raises a presumption that decedent was engaged in interstate commerce. The difficulty with this argument is that the facts do not sustain it. The witness Allen was subpoenaed to produce the records of the conductor, Hickey, showing the cars he moved in the freight yard on the night of the accident. The witness appeared and testified, and there is nothing in his testimony to indicate a suppression of evidence. He said he had no such records, and that as soon as the subpoena was served he wired the Philadelphia office, where all records were kept, L.R.A.1915D.

asking for the records in question, but was informed that no record of empty cars was kept. This witness testified that reports of loaded cars were kept, but not of empty cars handled in the yard. The evidence was straightforward and was not disputed. This stands as an established fact by a witness produced by plaintiff, and not challenged by anyone. The witness could not produce what he did not have, and how can it be said that he suppressed a record which never existed? There were two loaded cars in the draft of twenty-two cars; but counsel for plaintiff asked no questions about the loaded cars, and, indeed, these cars had nothing to do with the injury of decedent. Council did ask the witness Hickey for the number of the car which caused the injury, and was informed that it was "Hopper, 682,970." No further inquiry was made about this car, nor about the other five cars in the draft being shifted at the time decedent was injured. The numbers of these cars could have been obtained, their movements could have been traced, and the kind of shipments they contained when loaded and made up into trains could have been ascertained by proper inquiry; but no such questions were asked, and no attempt was made to elicit this information, or to establish these material facts. We discover no attempt to suppress evidence in this record, nor is there anything to indicate that the witness Allen did not tell the exact truth when he testified that no record of empty cars was kept while they were lying in the freight yard awaiting consignment in regular trains, or were being shifted for this purpose. Under this state of facts, it is our opinion that the rule of spoliation, upon which the contention of appellee is based, has no application.

As we view this case, the burden was on plaintiff to prove facts to show that her husband was engaged in interstate commerce, or had to do with the instrumentalities of such commerce, at the time he received his injuries, and as to these essential facts the proofs fail to make out a prima facie case. It is difficult to lay down a definite rule marking the division lines between intra and interstate commerce in this class of cases, so as to be able to determine with precision and exactness in each case as it arises whether the injured employee was or was not engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the acts of Congress. Much depends upon the facts of each particular case, and hence the necessity of proving the essential facts relied on to show that the injured party was engaged in interstate commerce, or had to do with its instrumentalities when he was injured. How liberally the acts of Congress shall be construed, and to what extent they may be widened and broadened in their enforcement, so as to include injured persons only remotely or incidentally engaged in interstate commerce, and without reference to their primary and principal duties, is not for this court to finally determine. To hold the scales evenly balanced, so as not to unduly limit the powers of Congress on one hand, nor yet encroach upon the proper exercise of state jurisdiction on the other, is not an easy task for any court. But there must be a division line at some point in each case, and the facts must be the guide to determine where that line shall be drawn.

We are not unmindful of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in which this question has been broadly considered. These cases construe the Federal statutes most liberally, and will have the effect of extending their application in many directions. Such are Southern R. Co. v. United States, 222 U. S. 20, 56 L. ed. 72, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 2; Second Employers' Liability Cases (Moudou v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co.) 223 U. S. 1, 56 L. ed. 327, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 169, 1 N. C. C. A. 875; Pedersen v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, 57 L. ed. 1125, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 153, 3 N. C. C. A. 779, and other cases of like import. We must assume, however, that it was not the intention of these decisions to construe the acts of Congress so as to make them cover injuries sustained by an employee engaged in intrastate commerce at the time he was injured. Certainly the acts of Congress could not apply to a railroad, or its employees, engaged exclusively in intrastate commerce, and not having any business of an interstate character. But no such situation is likely to arise, because nearly every railroad in this country, and perhaps every one, engages to some extent in interstate commerce, either by shipments to points outside the state or by receiving cars or freight from points beyond state lines. If the mere fact that a railroad may be used at times, frequently or otherwise, for interstate commerce transportation, fixes the status of all its employees as being engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the acts of Congress, without reference to the duties they were performing at the time of the injury, it would follow that all such employees, no matter how incidentally or remotely their duties had to do with interstate commerce generally, or what kind of commerce they were engaged in when injured, would come within the purview of the Federal statutes when they brought an action to recover damages for personal injuries. To so hold would mean the wiping out of all state regulation and authority in matters relating to the personal injuries of railroad employees. The cases have not gone so far, and we do not see how the rule can be laid down so broadly without doing violence to the plain language of the commerce clause of the Constitution which limits the Federal power to interstate subjects.

Our view is that in cases like the one at bar commerce must be regarded as of two kinds, intra and interstate; and the status of the employees must be determined by the kind of commerce they are engaged in at the time the injuries were sustained. If they were engaged in interstate commerce, the acts of Congress apply; if they were engaged in intrastate commerce, the Federal statutes have no application. All of this depends upon the facts, and in order to make out a case under the acts of Congress plaintiff must prove that the injured person was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident. In the present case this burden was not borne.

This position is sustained by a historical view of the decisions and legislation relating to this subject. The employers' liability act of Congress of June 11, 1906 (34 Stat. at L. 232, chap. 3073, Comp. Stat. 1913, § 3913), was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, because it included subjects wholly outside the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution,—that is, subjects relating to intrastate commerce. Employers' Liability Cases (Howard v. Illinois C. R. Co.) 207 U. S. 463, 52 L. ed. 297, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 141. Following that decision Congress passed the act of 1908, which in plain language limited its application to interstate commerce and to "any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce." The evident purpose of this act was to limit its application to interstate subjects and to correct what the Supreme Court of the United States had pointed out as a fatal defect in the act of 1906. Keeping in mind the plain language of the act of 1908, and the sequence of events which led to its enactment, how can it be successfully contended that it may be so enlarged and extended as to include injuries to all kinds of employees engaged in all kinds of commerce, and that it is not to be restricted to interstate commerce and to persons engaged therein?

There is some question as to the evidence being sufficient to sustain a charge of negligence under the acts of Congress even if it appeared that decedent was engaged in interstate commerce at the time. It is a close question, to say the least; but it is of no special importance, in the view we have taken of the case, that there was no proof to show decedent to have been engaged in interstate commerce. Having failed to establish this essential fact, the case falls.

This case has now been heard and carefully considered by all the members of this court, with the result that there is entire agreement upon the conclusion reached. In other words, we all agree that the evidence was insufficient to make out a case showing that decedent was engaged in interstate commerce when injured.

Judgment reversed, and is here entered for defendant upon the whole record.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

MARY GEROSKI

v.

ALLEGHENY COUNTY LIGHT COMPANY, Appt.

Electricity — death — duty to anticipate accident.

One maintaining heavily charged wires in a city street, 29 feet from the ground and 12 feet from the adjoining building, is not liable for the death of the janitor of the building, who, in attempting, while on the ground, to substitute a wire for a rope on a flagstaff on the building, walks toward the street far enough to bring the wire in contact with the current, thereby causing his death, since there is no duty to anticipate such an accident.

(January 2, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the death of her husband, which was alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John G. Frazer and Reed, Smith, Shaw, & Beal, for appellant:

The company was not bound to foresee the happening of the accident from the fact that it maintained a defectively insulated wire at the location of the one in question, and the death of Geroski was the result of his own independent act, which defendant could not reasonably have anticipated, and against which there was no duty to insulate its wires.

Messrs. Robertson & Link and A. E. Goss, for appellee:

While an owner of a dangerous wire may not be bound to anticipate in detail the particular state of facts constituting this case, the owner is bound to anticipate any contact that may occur at places where others have the right to go for work, business, or pleasure.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Mary Geroski brought this action of trespass against the Allegheny County Light Company, to recover damages for the death of her husband, John Geroski, which she alleges was due to the negligence of defendant. Geroski was a coal miner and lived at Glendale, Allegheny county. He was also the janitor of the Polish Falcon Hall, at that place. The hall fronts on a public street, and upon the roof of the front portion of the hall there is a flagpole. The wires of the defendant company are strung upon poles along the side of the street in front of the hall, at a distance of 12 or 13 feet from the building, and at a height of about 29 feet from the ground. The flagpole extends some 8 or 10 feet higher than the wires. There is a narrow board walk in front of the hall, and defendant's poles are placed between it and the roadway. On May 28, 1910, Geroski was about to raise the flag on the pole. A rope had previously been used for that purpose, but at that time Geroski attempted to remove the rope and replaced it with a piece of copper-plated wire. He attached an end of the wire to the rope, and began to pull it up. When the wire reached the top of the pole, it became entangled in some way, and in trying to loosen it, Geroski stepped backwards from the porch of the hall, where he had been standing, to the board walk, and then into the roadway, pulling and shaking the wire and rope. While so engaged, the small wire evidently came in contact with or in close proximity to, the overhead electric wire, and Geroski received an electric shock which caused his death. It was alleged on the part of plaintiff that defendant's overhead wire, which was charged with a powerful current of electricity, was not properly insulated, and was not in good repair. The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict for plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon, defendant has appealed.

The first assignment of error is to the refusal of the trial judge to give binding instructions in favor of the defendant, and the second assignment is to his refusal to enter judgment for defendant non obstante veredicto. It was admitted that the electric wires were part of a so-called high-tension power line, carrying 10,000 volts. The evidence offered upon the part of plaintiff tended to show that the insulation on the electric wires was worn off to a slight extent in a few places, but there was nothing to indicate that the wires were in any way out of repair. The testimony of the witnesses who had any knowledge of electricity tended to show that Geroski did not receive anything like the full force of the current, or such as he would have received had the wire in his hand come in direct contact with an uninsulated part of the overhead electric wire. The testimony of these witnesses, who had expert knowledge of the subject, and of the conditions which existed at the time, tended to show that the shock which Geroski received came from the fact that the wire in his hand was brought by him into close proximity to the overhead highly charged electric wire, but not into actual contact with it. In the judgment of these witnesses, the injury was caused by the leakage of static electricity from the overhead wire, which, when the small wire was brought near to it, entered it by induction. It was further pointed out that, in case of direct contact between the wires, the burns received by Geroski would have been much more severe, and death would have been instantaneous. It matters not, however, whether the injury resulted from direct contact with the overhead wire, or from leakage therefrom which entered the small wire held by Geroski, when it was brought by him into close proximity to the overhead wire. For in any event it is apparent from the testimony in this case that, with such high-tension wires as these, carrying so heavy a voltage, mere insulation alone could not be depended upon to insure safety to the public. In any such case due precaution would require that the wires should be so placed that there would be no likelihood or reasonable probability of human contact therewith. If, therefore, under the circumstances, the defendant company ought to have reasonably anticipated that anyone, in the proper exercise of business or pleasure, would come in contact with its overhead wires at the location in which they were placed, it would properly be liable in damages for such injuries as were the proximate result of such location, unless the injured person was guilty of negligence contributing to the injury. Can it be said in the present case that appellant ought to have reasonably anticipated that any person upon the ground would come in contact with its electric wires carried at a height of 29 feet in the air, and 12 feet distant from the building? Was it bound to foresee that appellee's husband would attach a wire to the flagpole 12 feet away, and then walk out into the street under the wires, and pull upon the small wire in his hand until he had drawn it over the intervening distance, and brought it in contact with, or in close proximity to, the overhead electric wire? If not, then it follows, under what may properly be regarded as the well-settled doctrine of our cases, that there can be no recovery by plaintiff, and that judgment should have been entered for the defendant. Thus, in Trout v. Philadelphia Electric Co. 236 Pa. 506, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 713, 84 Atl. 967, 968, it appeared that a thirteen-year-old boy was endeavoring to detach a kite from an electric wire on which it had been caught, when he received a shock which resulted in his death. The wire was stretched upon poles, at a distance of about 4 to 6 inches from the outside edge of the cornice of the house. The boy lay down on the cornice and threw a corncob tied to the end of a string over the electric wire and pulled it toward him. When the wire came within reach he touched it, and immediately received the electric shock. This court, speaking through Mr. Justice Moschzisker, said (p. 509): "The act of the boy in getting hold of the wire was wholly unrelated to any act of the defendant in connection therewith. Had the wire been so close to the house that the boy might naturally have come in contact with it while playing about the roof, it might be contended that its condition was the proximate cause of his death. But such was not the case; all of the defendant's wires were so far out from the house that they could not possibly have been reached by a full-grown man, much less a boy of thirteen. The boy could have run and played all over the roof without the possibility of his coming in contact with these wires. It was an original, independent act of the deceased which could not reasonably have been anticipated that brought about this most sad accident, and this act was not induced by, or did not follow as a natural sequence to, any negligence of the defendant in connection with its wires. Under such circumstances there could be no recovery, and the defendant was entitled to binding instructions, as requested."

damages for personal injuries, resulting from a seven-year-old boy having come in contact with an uninsulated wire of defendant. It appears that the wire was some 8 or 10 feet above the sidewalk, and was connected with an electric light suspended from the bar of an awning; that the boy had climbed up a pole supporting the awning, and, while walking along a horizontal bar, had come in contact with the wire. There was evidence that the boys of the neighborhood, including plaintiff, had been forbidden to climb the pole, and there was no evidence that defendant had actual knowledge that they did so. It was held that under these circumstances there could be no recovery. Mr. Justice Brown said (p. 158): "If the defendant company ought reasonably to have anticipated contact with the wires where the boy grasped them, its use of them uninsulated at that point was the proximate cause of the injury; and, if the place where he came in contact with them was to be legitimately regarded as a playground for children, either on account of the character of the place or by reason of its permissive use by children, the defendant was bound to anticipate that injuries might result from its use of uninsulated wires. All this is frankly conceded by learned counsel for the appellee, whose further concession is that the boy was not a trespasser upon private property, nor guilty of contributory negligence, in view of his age. The defense is that, under the circumstances, no duty was upon the company to insulate the wires."

The opinion concluded (p. 160): "But it is urged that, as boys had frequently got on the awning rods in their sports, the defendant company had at least constructive notice of this, and was therefore bound to insulate its wires. It does not appear that the company ever had any actual notice of the boys' performances, and, in the absence of such notice, it could safely assume that they would not do what the injured plaintiff and his companions did. Under the circumstances, nothing short of actual notice of their performances imposed any duty upon the company to protect them from injury from its wires suspended from the awning beyond their reach and that of all others in the ordinary use of the sidewalk and adjoining premises."

Again, in the case of Green v. West Penn R. Co. 246 Pa. 340, L.R.A. 1915C, 151, 92 Atl. 341, it appeared that two boys, while playing, found a coil of copper wire. They attached a stone to one end of the wire, and threw it over a high tension uninsulated feed wire of the defendant company. A third boy took hold of the wire and was badly injured. Upon the trial judgment of nonsuit was entered, which was affirmed by this court. In the opinion of Mr. Justice Stewart, he said (p. 343): "It is settled law that no liability results from failure to anticipate wrongful acts by others; but, waiving this, for the reason that in this case we are dealing with a trespass committed by boys of tender years, a fact which, under certain conditions, changes the rule, and regarding the copper wire incident simply as an interference not participated in by the defendant company, and done without its knowledge, how stands the case? Without the wire present, the accident could not have occurred. By mere chance the boys found it at the foot of a telephone pole, and in sport they threw it over the feed wire. Could such a concurrence of fortuitous circumstances have been reasonably foreseen by the defendant company? Considering that defendant company stood in no relation to the wire, was not responsible for it being where it was, and had no knowledge of it being there, to hold it responsible for the injury to the boy, on the ground that it should have anticipated such consequence from the fact that it maintained an uninsulated feed wire at an elevation which would admit of a stone attached to a wire being thrown over it, would be to substitute for injury within reasonable anticipation any possible injury which might result. There is no case that goes to such extreme length."

The only one of our cases which might seem to justify any modification of the conclusions in these decisions which we have cited is Mullen v. Wilkes-Barre Gas & Electric Co. 229 Pa. 54, 77 Atl. 1108. In that case it was shown that a child of tender years climbed into a tree on the sidewalk, and was injured by contact with a poorly insulated wire running through the branches. It appeared that children were accustomed to play about the tree and climb into it. In affirming a judgment in that case per curiam, we said, (p. 61) that "on the main question presented by this appeal, whether danger to anyone was reasonably to be apprehended because of the condition of the defendant's wire, the case is admittedly close; but, in the opinion of a majority of the court, the judgment should be affirmed."

That case, however, went to the extreme limit, for in the subsequent case of Trout v. Philadelphia Electric Co. 236 Pa. 506, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 713, 84 Atl. 967, 968, it was said (p. 510) that Mullen v. Wilkes-Barre Gas & Electric Co. "stands for, and must be confined to, its own facts." This was repeated in O'Gara v. Philadelphia Electric Co. 244 Pa. 156, 90 Atl. 529. The true line of distinction in these cases is that which was pointed out in Yeager v. Edison Electric Co. 242 Pa. 101, 88 Atl. 872, 873. We there said (p. 104): "Prudence requires those in control of a deadly current of electricity to exercise the highest degree of care in protecting the wires at points where persons in the course of their lawful employment are liable to come in contact with them."

And attention was called to the distinction between the danger to be apprehended from the wires when hanging in the air out of ordinary reach and that which should properly be anticipated at a point where persons in the exercise of their proper employment might come into dangerous proximity to the heavily charged wires.

In the present case the wires were hanging entirely out of ordinary reach, being 29 feet from the ground, and more than 12 feet away from the building. The defendant could not have reasonably anticipated the combination of circumstances which resulted in the injury to Geroski. He was an adult, in the full use of his faculties. He found a rope, which was a non-conductor of electricity, attached to the flagpole. He attempted to substitute for the rope a copper-plated wire, which was an excellent conductor of electricity. He then manipulated the wire, and finally walked with it in his hand, out under the heavily charged electric wire, into the street far enough to pull the copper wire over the intervening distance of 12 feet, until it came in contact with, or in close proximity to, the electric wire, 29 feet in the air. Surely the defendant could not reasonably have anticipated such a concurrence of fortuitous circumstances. Doubtless the action of Geroski was due to ignorance, but the result was no less fatal. It drew down upon him the deadly current, which, in the absence of his unusual, but active, interference therewith, would have done him no harm.

The first and second assignments of error are sustained. The judgment is reversed, and it is now entered for the defendant.

Carrier — escape of cattle — injury to bystander — liability.

A collision between freight trains caused by the negligence of the railway's employees resulted in the wreck of a number of cars loaded with cattle, from which a number of wild, dangerous Texas cattle escaped into the city of Harper, Kansas, where, while they were being gathered up and driven to the stockyards by persons employed by the railway for that purpose, one of the cattle, a cow, attacked and injured the plaintiff, who was walking on the sidewalk; this cow, after the wreck, before attacking the plaintiff, having made three separate attacks on one of the employees driving her. The railway is held liable for damages done by this cow to the plaintiff.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Harper County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William R. Smith, Owen J. Wood, and Alfred A. Scott, for appellant:

Negligence of the defendant was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury.

A search has revealed but one case in addition to HARTMAN v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. R. Co., passing upon the liability of a carrier for injury or damage inflicted by an animal which escapes from its custody or control.

In Jones v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 178 Mo. 528, 101 Am. St. Rep. 434, 77 S. Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, Alice Hartman, recovered a judgment in the district court of Harper county, Kansas, against the railway company, for $800, damages for personal injuries caused by being knocked down and run over by a cow which had escaped from a car broken open in a collision. The defendant appeals.

Through the negligence of the defendant, a collision between two freight trains occurred on its road running east and west through the city of Harper. The east-bound train was a special, with sixty-three cars loaded with cattle. As a result of the collision, several of these cattle cars were torn open, and a number of cattle escaped therefrom, into the city of Harper. The defendant employed several residents of Harper to gather up the escaped cattle and put them in the stock yards. One of these men was O'Connell. While these employees were gathering up the cattle, one of them, a cow, charged the plaintiff, knocking her down and injuring her. For this injury she brought this action. A better understanding of how this cow acted, and of what those driving her did, can be had by quoting somewhat from appellant's abstract.

L.R.A.(N.S.) 445, 83 N. E. 588, 14 Ann. Cas. 57, it is held that a carrier having possession of a wild animal for transportation is not within the rule that the keeper of such animal is liable for injuries caused by it, irrespective of negligence on his part. In this case, however, the animal did not escape, but the injury was brought about by the injured person, who, impelled by curiosity, went between the cages, which the carrier had arranged facing each other so that the public could make reasonable use of the premises without danger.

Mr. O'Connell testified: ". . . Mr. Elder, the station agent, employed me to get some of the cattle in. It was about half past 1. . . . I joined in there to help get the cattle back. To get the cattle back we were out there until about 6:30, as near as I could judge. As we got the cattle in we put them in the stock yards. Put seven head in there. The rest got away in different directions while we were taking this bunch out there. One of the cows laid down and kind of sulked, and we went on with the balance and put them in the yards. Then I came back to see where the cow was. In the meantime she got up and started down the street. I followed her right up horseback, and she was going down the street, and I was not looking for anything to occur much. I was right after her horseback when this old lady was coming up the sidewalk. I was 2 or 3 rods behind the cow riding along, and just as the cow got even with this old lady she whirled and made a run right towards her, and run over her, and knocked her down. The cow had shown a little bad disposition before that. She made two or three dives at the horse and me, like any cow will when they get riled up and go to driving them,—get warmed up. Most any cow will. The cow was supposed to be western bred. I could not say where she came from. . . . When I first came down to the stock yards she charged at me, and I got out of the way. . . . There were sidewalks along the street. I was 30 or 40 feet behind at the time she made this rush for the old lady. I saw Mrs. Hartman coming along. . . . I was on horseback. The cow was walking. I was not expecting her to run. I do not know if the fact that she had made some passes at me and my horse had anything to do with my staying so far behind. I was not particularly afraid of her at that time. I did not want to crowd her on. I was waiting for help. I felt at this time that I should have had more help with the cow. At the time I first saw Mrs. Hartman she was walking on the sidewalk. . . . When the cow came up near to Mrs. Hartman she turned and ran at her, tore down the street, and run for her and struck her; threw Mrs. Hartman down and run over her. The cow went on through the fence, over the fence; turned a somersault right over the fence; had some speed up. She had been walking quietly along just prior to that time. I was as close as 20 feet to her, anyhow. After she turned before she struck Mrs. Hartman she had to travel 25 or 30 feet, or about halfway across the street. There was a fence right against the sidewalk. The cow struck Mrs. Hartman and ran over her and turned a complete somersault over the fence. It was done so quickly I could not tell. I knew she went over it,—turned right over. I thought she was going to get up and make for the old lady, and I run right across and told her to make for the house. Then I drove my horse right across the sidewalk, and the cow got over the fence and turned and went down the street. I judge it was about 5 o'clock. I did not assist Mrs. Hartman at all. Went after the cow. The cow went down the street, and there were some children on the street. I went on down to get them out of the road. Hollered to the children to get out of the road, and saw Mrs. Hartman get up and go into the house, . . . and I was trying to follow this cow up and do all I could. The cow went down on a vacant lot and laid down. I did not get the cow back up to the stock yards. I was running a livery barn, and about 6:30 I had to go back to the barn. The other boys came along with a rope, and had better saddle horses than I had to take hold of her. . . . Before she ran over the plaintiff I had been driving her with the other cattle. When she dropped from the bunch she laid down beside the road. She was pretty scrappy before that; fought the horse and fought us. A man named Jack Munger and I were driving. After she quieted down she acted like any other cow would under the circumstances. We run them a good deal and got them warmed up, and they got mad. . . . This cow showed fight before she laid down. That was before she struck Mrs. Hartman."

Sam Row testified: "The cattle liberated were western cattle—long-horn cattle. I would call them wild and scrappy cattle. They were wild and savage."

The jury returned a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Several special questions were submitted to the jury and answers returned, the material ones of which are as follows:

"(1) Q. What, if any, negligence was the defendant guilty of that caused the injury to the plaintiff, if any injury the plaintiff received? Ans. Neglect to perform their duty in failing to turn switch, which caused wreck and liberated cattle."

"(6) Q. If the defendant's negligence caused the injuries complained of, give the name or position of the employee or employees guilty of such negligence. Ans. Conductor."

"(8) Q. Had the animal that ran over the plaintiff been passing quietly down the highway in front of O'Connell for several blocks, just prior to the time plaintiff was run over by said animal? Ans. No.

"(9) Q. Was said animal passing down the highway quietly and in an ordinary walk, just prior to the time it ran over the plaintiff? Ans. Yes.

"(10) Q. After the animal in question ran over the plaintiff, was it driven for some distance by O'Connell in an ordinary walk to a lot where it lay down? Ans. Yes.

"(11) Q. Were the cattle that escaped what is known as white-faced cattle (at least in the main)? Ans. Yes.

"(12) Q. If the cow that ran over the plaintiff was wild and dangerous, when did any representative of the defendant learn that fact? Ans. When said cow charged O'Connell.

"(13) Q. Who, if anyone, learned said cow was dangerous? Ans. O'Connell and Sam Noel.

"(14) Q. Did the animal that ran over the plaintiff belong to the species known as white-faced cattle? Ans. No."

"(17) Q. What was the direct and immediate cause of the cow running over the plaintiff? Ans. Because of a vicious disposition.

"(18) Q. How long was it from the time the cattle escaped until the plaintiff was run over by the cow in question? Ans. About four hours.

"(19) Q. Are what is known as white-faced cattle wild, unruly, or dangerous as a class? Ans. Yes.

"(20) Q. Were these cattle what is known generally as the wild, dangerous Texas cattle? Ans. Yes."

A demurrer to the evidence was overruled, and a motion for judgment in favor of the defendant, on the special findings, was denied.

The defendant contends that the negligence of its employees in causing the wreck was not the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff; that there was an intervening cause of the injury; that this intervening cause was the act of the cow in charging the plaintiff; that the company had no knowledge of the cow's vicious disposition for a sufficient length of time in advance of the cow's attack upon plaintiff to have prevented the same by the exercise of ordinary care; that its employees did their best to drive the cow to the stock yards; that there was no contractual relation between plaintiff and defendant, and for that reason the defendant could not be guilty of negligence toward the plaintiff; and that for these reasons it is not liable L.R.A.1915D.

to the plaintiff for the injuries sustained.

Was the negligence in causing the wreck the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, as that expression is used in actions for damages for personal injury? The following cases may assist in answering this question:

"Negligence is the proximate cause of an injury when it appears that 'the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the negligence or wrongful act, and that it ought to have been foreseen in the light of the attending circumstances.'" Schwarzschild & S. Co. v. Weeks, 72 Kan. 190, syl. ¶ 3, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 515, 83 Pac. 406, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 242.

"Negligence, to be the proximate cause of an injury, must be such that a person of ordinary caution and prudence would have foreseen that some injury would likely result therefrom, not that the specific injury would result." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Parry, 67 Kan. 515, syl. ¶ 2, 73 Pac. 105.

"The proximate cause of an injury is the primary moving cause without which it would not have been inflicted, and which, in the natural and probable sequence of events, without the intervention of any new and independent cause, produces the injury." Winona v. Botzet, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 204, syl. ¶ 4, 94 C. C. A. 563, 169 Fed. 321, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 445.

The negligence of the defendant's employees caused the wreck of cars loaded with cattle. From these cars some of the cattle escaped. Some of the escaped cattle did injury. This was the natural, probable, and to be expected, result of the negligence, and ought to have been foreseen by a person of ordinary caution and prudence, in the light of the attending circumstances. The specific injury could not be foreseen, but that these cattle would do some damage, in their fright or their anger, was very likely; that injury might reasonably have been expected to be to gardens, crops, animals, or to persons. The negligence causing the wreck was the primary or first moving cause, without which the injury would not have been inflicted. Was there another, an intervening cause, between the defendant's negligence and the injury to the plaintiff?

"Where two distinct, successive causes, wholly unrelated in operation, contribute toward the production of an accident resulting in injury and damage, one of such causes must be the proximate, and the other the remote, cause of the injury. A prior and remote cause cannot be made the basis of an action for the recovery of damages if such remote cause did nothing more than furnish the condition, or give rise to the occasion, by which the injury was made possible, if there intervened, between such prior or remote cause and the injury, a distinct, successive, unrelated, and efficient cause of the injury." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Columbia, 65 Kan. 390, syl. ¶¶ 1, 2, 58 L.R.A. 399, 69 Pac. 338.

"The intervening cause which will relieve of liability for an injury is an independent cause which intervenes between the original wrongful act or omission and the injury, turns aside the natural sequence of events, and produces a result which would not otherwise have followed, and which could not have been reasonably anticipated." Winona v. Botzet, supra.

"The mere fact that another cause intervened between defendants' negligence and plaintiff's injury is not enough to relieve the former from liability if the intervening act was of such nature that its happening was to have been apprehended. Stated otherwise, the intervening cause will not relieve the original negligence of its actionable quality if the occurrence of the former might have been anticipated." Fishburn v. Burlington & N. W. R. Co. 127 Iowa, 483, 490, 103 N. W. 481, 484.

"If a carrier be guilty of negligence not in itself harmful, but wrongful only because of injurious consequences which may follow, and a new cause intervene between such negligence and the injury complained of, which new cause is not a consequence of the original negligence, which reasonable prudence on the part of the original wrongdoer could not have anticipated, and but for which the injury could not have happened, the new cause is the proximate cause, and the original negligence is disregarded, as not affecting the final result." Rodgers v. Missouri P. R. Co. 75 Kan. 222, 223, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 658, 121 Am. St. Rep. 416, 88 Pac. 885, 12 Ann. Cas. 441.

"The question of proximate cause is one frequently so near the border line as to cause much perplexity, but, generally speaking, it may be said in this state that the proximate is the producing cause; not the one supplying the condition, but the one producing the injury. The one supplying the condition may be so intrinsically careless as to amount practically to a continuing invitation, so to speak, for a direct cause to join in producing a disastrous result. But to be such it must present a condition of danger so manifest that the one responsible must be held to have been negligent in furnishing the means for a probable injury. But a condition which could not reasonably be expected to endanger, and which, but for some independent cause without which the injury would not have occurred, would not have endangered, does not ordinarily amount to a proximate L.R.A.1915D.

cause." Eberhardt v. Glasgow Mut. Teleph. Asso. 91 Kan. 763, 765, 139 Pac. 416, 417.

"Where the intervening cause is set in operation by the original negligence, such negligence is still the proximate cause, and where the circumstances are such that the injurious consequences might have been foreseen as likely to result from the first negligent act or omission, the act of the third person will not excuse the first wrongdoer. . . . If the act of the third person, which is the immediate cause of the injury, is such as, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, would not be anticipated, and the third person is not under the control of the one guilty of the first act or omission, the connection is broken, and the first act or omission is not the proximate cause of the injury." Seith v. Commonwealth Electric Co. 241 Ill. 252, 260, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 978, 132 Am. St. Rep. 204, 89 N. E. 425, 428.

"The primary cause may be the proximate cause of a disaster, though it may operate through successive instruments, as an article at the end of a chain may be moved by a force applied to the other end; that force being the proximate cause of the movement. . . . The question always is: Was there an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury, a continuous operation? Did the facts constitute a continuous succession of events, so linked together as to make a natural whole, or was there some new and independent cause intervening between the wrong and the injury?" Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 474, 24 L. ed. 256, 259.

The injury to the plaintiff was related to the negligence of the defendant. That injury did follow, in regular order, the several successive events flowing from that negligence. There was an unbroken connection between that negligence and the injury to the plaintiff, unless the attack by the cow or the acts of her drivers broke that connection or succession of events. It can hardly be said that these acts of cow or drivers were causes independent of the original acts of negligence. The driving of the cow by the defendant's employees was made necessary by the wreck. It was the duty of the defendant to gather up the liberated cattle. The producing cause, the one without which the injury would not have occurred, was the negligence of the defendant. That negligence made it necessary to employ the drivers. They were not acting independent of the defendant. Their employment was to have been anticipated. They were under the control of the defendant. The cow had no intelligence. She could not produce a cause of injury for which some person might be liable. The acts of the cow cannot be said to have been a cause of the injury to the plaintiff, intervening between the negligence of the defendant and that injury, so as to relieve the company from liability for its negligence. The drivers may have been negligent in handling the cow, but that is not alleged, and cannot be considered. If they were negligent, and had been separate and independent agencies, the defendant probably would not be liable.

If O'Connell had been the owner of the cow, would he be liable for the injury done? He learned that the cow was vicious when she charged him on three separate occasions before injuring the plaintiff. O'Connell then had notice of the cow's vicious disposition. It was then his duty to see that she did no injury to anyone. He was then bound to use a degree of diligence that would prevent injury. It finally became necessary to rope this cow. That is probably what ought to have been done before she injured the plaintiff. The cow was in the streets of a city. She was almost sure to hurt some person, unless her freedom of movement was absolutely restrained. A jury would have been warranted in finding O'Connell guilty of negligence in handling the cow, and therefore liable for the damage done by reason of that negligence. The owner of a domestic animal known by him to be vicious must see that it does no injury. 3 Enc. L. & P. 966; 1 R. C. L. 1088, 1089; 2 Cyc. 368, 369.

In Clowdis v. Fresno Flume & Irrig. Co. 118 Cal. 315, 62 Am. St. Rep. 238, 50 Pac. 373, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 326, the owner of a bull was held liable for injuries inflicted while the bull was being driven from one place to another, a vicious disposition being first developed on the trip, the injury being done after the bull had attacked several persons.

The jury found that the cattle were what is known as wild, dangerous Texas cattle. By the negligence causing the wreck they were released in a city. It is only reasonable to expect this kind of cattle turned loose in a city to do damage, not only to property, but to persons as well. The fact that one of them did hurt an old lady, without any additional cause therefor, shows that injury ought to have been expected as a result of these cattle roaming on the streets of Harper. It is generally known that wild, dangerous Texas cattle will attack men on foot. When these cattle were released, it ought to have been anticipated that they would attack pedestrians whom they might meet.

In Hammond v. Melton, 42 Ill. App. 186, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 274, we find this: "The owner of a domestic animal is bound to take notice of the general propensities of L.R.A.1916D.

the class to which it belongs, and if such propensities are of a nature to cause injury, he must anticipate and guard against them." p. 189.

"What is the proximate cause of an injury is ordinarily a question for the jury." Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256.

See also Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Parry, 67 Kan. 515, 73 Pac. 105; Home Oil & Gas Co. v. Dabney, 79 Kan. 820, 101 Pac. 488.

"When the facts are established, whether the negligent acts complained of are the proximate cause of the injury is a question of law to be determined by the court." Consolidated Electric Light & P. Co. v. Koepp, 64 Kan. 735, 73 Pac. 608, 609, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 404.

See also Dewald v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. 44 Kan. 586, 24 Pac. 1101, 3 Am. Neg. Cas. 447; Eberhardt v. Glasgow Mut. Teleph. Asso. 91 Kan. 763, 767, 139 Pac. 416.

"In a case where it is either admitted, or from the facts as found established, that two distinct, successive causes, unrelated in their operation, conjoined to produce a given injury, the question of remote and proximate cause becomes one of law for the decision of the court, and not of fact for the determination of the jury, and the determination of this question of law by the jury is not binding or conclusive on the court." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Columbia, 65 Kan. 390, syl. ¶ 3, 58 L.R.A. 399, 69 Pac. 338.

It must be noted that in all the cases quoted from, the question of proximate and intervening causes depends on their relation to or independence of each other.

Whether or not the question of proximate cause should have been submitted to the jury is unimportant, if we have reached a correct conclusion concerning the liability of the defendant, on the facts as shown by its abstract. The question was submitted to the jury, and the jury, in its general verdict, found against the defendant, and the court approved the verdict. We are not unmindful of the answer to question 17. That answer is that the direct and immediate cause of the cow's running over the plaintiff was her vicious disposition. But that vicious disposition was not the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff. That was an unintelligent dangerous force that had been loosed by the defendant's negligence.

The defendant cites 29 Cyc. 419, 426, to the effect that it owed no duty to the plaintiff. There was no contractual relation between the parties, but the defendant did owe to the plaintiff the duty of not injuring her by any agency it might set in motion.

We have given this case careful consideration, and are unable to say that the judgment should be interfered with, and it is therefore affirmed.

Burch, Mason, and Dawson, JJ., concur.

Johnston, Ch. J., dissenting:

I am unable to concur in the judgment of affirmance. The evidence sufficiently shows that the collision and resulting liberation of the cattle from the car were due to the negligence of the railway company, and for any injury that can be said to be the proximate result of that negligence, the company is responsible. The injury, however, was not inflicted when the cattle were liberated from the car, nor did it occur until a long time after the accident by which the cattle were released. In the four-hour period which elapsed between the time of the accident and the injury of the plaintiff, the cow had strayed away a considerable distance and had even been lying down. O'Connell, who had a riding horse, was asked by the agent of the company to drive this cow and other cattle to the stock yards, and if, through his negligence in driving the cow, an injury was inflicted, the company may be held liable. The negligence charged, and upon which the verdict rests, is the improper switching of the trains which resulted in the collision. The collision, in my opinion, cannot be regarded as the producing or proximate cause of the injury. A party is not liable for every consequence, near and remote, which may possibly result from negligence. It is only those which are the natural and probable consequences of the negligent act, and which should have been foreseen. The cow was run along the highway by O'Connell, and he says that when she got warmed up she became mad. She was a white-faced western cow, but plaintiff's witnesses said that any cow is likely to show such a disposition when she is so chased, and in that respect she acted like an ordinary cow. The fact that she became excited and ugly under such treatment is not the proximate result of the failure to turn the switch, and, judged by common experience and observation, the likelihood that anyone would be struck by the cow while she was being driven was not within reasonable anticipation, and is not the natural and probable consequence of the collision. If an owner of a cow allowed her to escape because of an insufficient fence, and a neighbor, in driving her home, should run her and excite her, and she should become ugly and run against a person on the highway, could it be said that the injury was the natural and probable consequence of the defective fence, and that it was a result that the owner should have foreseen? To my mind the injury to the plaintiff was not the natural or probable consequence of the collision. It was no more than a remote possibility that a cow so liberated would, while being chased by a horse about four hours later, run against and injure a person, and for such remote consequences there is no liability. There was another efficient and proximate cause of the injury, but whether the defendant was responsible for that cause has never been submitted to or determined by the jury.

I am therefore of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed.

Porter and West, JJ., concur in the foregoing dissent.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

T. F. BRANNON, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF KENTUCKY.

(162 Ky. 350, 172 S. W. 703.)

Evidence — bias of jury — affidavit of juror.

1. Upon the question whether or not a juror was so biased against accused as to justify setting aside a verdict against him, his affidavit to the effect that he used his influence to reduce the punishment fixed by the jury is admissible.

Appeal — refusal to set aside verdict.

2. No abuse of discretion which will require a reversal on appeal in refusing to set aside a verdict for bias of a juror is

Note. — Misconduct toward witness as contempt of court.

For misconduct towards jurors as contempt, see note to Poindexter v. State, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 517.

As to procuring one having knowledge of an offense to leave the jurisdiction, see note to Com. v. Berry, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 976.

Arrest.

It is contempt to procure the arrest upon civil process of a material witness for one of the parties to a pending action, while he is in attendance at a hearing therein before a referee. State v. Buck, 62 N. H. 670.

So, in Smith v. Jones, 76 Me. 138, 49 Am. Rep. 598, an action to recover damages for causing the plaintiff's arrest and imprisonment at a time when he was privileged from arrest, as he was returning home from a place where he had been attending court as shown by the fact that the court acts upon a statement in his affidavit that he used his influence to reduce the punishment fixed by the jury, in preference to affidavits by friends of the accused that the juror told them that accused should be given the limit.

Contempt — criminal — assault on witness.

3. It is a criminal contempt for one under several indictments, in one of which the jury is out but eventually returns a verdict of guilty, with another yet to be tried, to commit a battery on a witness who testified against him in the pending case and is to be called in a subsequent one, for the purpose of punishing him for the testimony given and intimidating him for the future.

Same — submission to jury.

4. A court whose power summarily to a witness, the court said: "It is clear that a person ordering an arrest of a witness may be punished for contempt of court for interference with its business."

And similarly, it is contempt of court for an attorney to cause a writ of attachment for an absent witness to be issued improperly and wrongfully, before the witness is in default under the subpoena which was served upon him. Butler v. People, 2 Colo. 295.

Assault.

See BRANNON v. COM., which seems to be the only reported case upon the question of assault on a witness as contempt of court.

Bribery.

It is contempt of court to endeavor by bribery to induce a witness to suppress evidence which it is his duty to give. Re Hooley, 79 L. T. N. S. 306, 6 Manson, 44.

So, it is a contempt of court to induce, persuade, and procure, by the payment of money, one known to be a material and important witness for the United States in a pending prosecution, who, it is known, will be subpoenaed by the government, to avoid the service of any subpoena upon him, and to conceal and hide himself, and absent himself from the court, preventing the United States from using him as a witness upon the trial of the cause. Re Brule, 71 Fed. 943.

And it is a contempt of court for a director of a company to offer money to a bankrupt to induce him to say nothing, at his public examination, about certain transactions between them, which, while capable of satisfactory explanation, were liable to misconstruction and might injure the company. Re Hooley, supra.

And in White v. White, — N. J. Eq. —, 62 Atl. 430, the plaintiff and others were adjudged guilty of contempt of court for attempting to bribe and otherwise procure a witness to suppress testimony unfavorable to the plaintiff.

It is also "misbehavior in the presence of the court," within the meaning of a statute L.R.A.1915D.

punish for contempt is not adequate to inflict a suitable punishment for a criminal contempt may submit the matter to the determination of a jury.

Same — ignorance of subpoena.

5. That one who assaults a prospective witness against him does not know that he has been subpoenaed is immaterial to the question of his liability for contempt.

Same — punishment — excess.

6. A fine of $1,000 and six months' imprisonment in jail is not excessive to inflict upon one who commits a battery upon one who testified against him in a criminal case, to intimidate him from giving evidence in another case yet to be tried in which he is a prospective witness.

(January 27, 1916.)

restricting the power of the United States court to inflict summary punishment for contempt to certain specified cases, among which is such misbehavior, for one, in the jury room of the court, which is temporarily used for a witness room, and which is located within less than 7 feet of the court room, to approach a witness and improperly attempt to deter him from testifying for the government in a pending action; or to approach a witness in the hallway of the court building, immediately adjoining the court room, and offer him money not to testify against the defendant in the action. Re Savin, 131 U. S. 267, 33 L. ed. 150, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 699.

And it is a direct contempt committed in the presence of the court, for one to approach a witness in the main corridor of the building, near the court room, while he is in attendance for the purpose of testifying in a criminal case on the calendar of the court and about to be called, and to ask him to go to a neighboring saloon and have a drink, and then to invite him to take a ride, and to tell him that the case in which he has been subpoenaed has been continued, and to give him money and procure him not to be present in court at the time when the case has been set for trial. People v. Jackson, 178 Ill. App. 121.

Likewise, it is contempt committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to interfere with its procedure, to attempt, in the hall of the courthouse, or just outside and near the courthouse, pending the trial of a criminal case, to bribe a witness in attendance upon the court in the case, to modify his testimony and swear falsely therein. Fisher v. McDaniel, 9 Wyo. 457, 87 Am. St. Rep. 971, 64 Pac. 1056.

And bribery of a material witness in a pending criminal cause is misbehavior so near the court as to obstruct the administration of justice, within the meaning of the statute limiting the power of the Federal courts to punish summarily for contempt, notwithstanding the bribery took place at the residence of the witness, $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile away from the court building. Re Brule, supra.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Bourbon County, convicting him of criminal contempt of court. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Denis Dundon and John J. Williams, for appellant:

The acts proved did not constitute contempt of court.

2 Roberson, Crim. Law & Proc. § 649; Newport v. Newport Light Co. 92 Ky. 449, 17 S. W. 435; Wages v. Com. 13 Ky. L. Rep. 925; French v. Com. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 98, 97 S. W. 427; Gordon v. Com. 141 Ky. 461, 133 S. W. 206.

Messrs. Hazelrigg & Hazelrigg also for appellant.

And in United States v. Carroll, 147 Fed. 947, although it was held that the evidence was too unsatisfactory upon which to find the accused guilty, beyond a reasonable doubt, of an alleged attempt to influence a witness, the court said that "any direct attempt on the part of any person to bribe or persuade a witness to testify contrary to the truth in a cause pending and then on trial, . . . where made so near the court as is designated by the witnesses for the government, being not to exceed three blocks away, constitutes, in legal contemplation, a direct contempt; that is to say, it constitutes misbehavior so near to the court as to obstruct the administration of justice."

And see also State v. Moore, and French v. Com. infra, under "Inducing to disregard summons, subpoena, or recognizance."

Intimidation.

It is contempt of court to endeavor to intimidate a witness in a pending action. Bromilow v. Phillips, 40 Week. Rep. 220; Shaw v. Shaw, 2 Swabey & T. 517, 31 L. J. Prob. N. S. 35, 6 L. T. N. S. 477, 8 Jur. N. S. 141; Re Herencia, 1 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 207.

Thus, it is a contempt of court for a party to a pending suit, who was in court when witnesses who had been sworn in the case were charged by the court not to talk to anybody, or permit anybody to talk to them, or in their presence, about the case, and knew of this charge and order, to talk to the witnesses, either directly or indirectly, with the expectation that they will hear his remarks, the only effect, and only expected effect, of which could be that this would serve to intimidate the witnesses. Re Herencia, supra.

And it is contempt of court for a party to a pending suit to attempt, by any communication, to intimidate a prospective witness for the other party in giving his evidence. Shaw v. Shaw, supra.

Likewise, it is contempt of court to prevent, by intimidation, a witness residing in another state, who has been summoned L.R.A.1915D.

Messrs. James Garnett, Attorney General, and Robert T. Caldwell, Assistant Attorney General, for the Commonwealth:

The verdict is not excessive.

French v. Com. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 98, 97 S. W. 427.

Contempt of court was committed.

Melton v. Com. 160 Ky. 642, L.R.A. 1915B, 689, 170 S. W. 37; Criminal Code of Practice, § 273; State v. Tugwell, 19 Wash. 238, 43 L.R.A. 717, 52 Pac. 1056; Re Chadwick, 109 Mich. 588, 67 N. and also recognized to appear at the trial of an indictment, from appearing and giving evidence. McCarthy v. State, 89 Tenn. 543, 15 S. W. 736.

And in Partridge v. Partridge, Tothill, 40, it appears that a man was committed for terrifying a witness who was to be examined at a commission.

And see also Re Savin, supra, under "Bribery;" French v. Com. infra, under "Inducing to disregard summons, subpoena, or recognizance;" and Ricketts v. State, infra, under "Subornation of perjury."

Inducing witness to evade service of summons or subpoena.

Where an indictment has been found and is pending in court, and a summons requiring the attendance as a witness in the case, at an approaching term of the court, of one whose name is indorsed on the indictment as a witness, has been issued and is in the hands of the sheriff to be served on him, it is contempt of court for one who knows these facts, for the purpose of preventing the service of the summons, to remove the witness to a remote part of the county, away from his ordinary place of residence, and advise and direct him thus to avoid the service of the summons. Haskett v. State, 51 Ind. 176.

And under a statute providing that every court of record shall have power to punish for unlawfully detaining any witness in a suit noticed for trial therein, while going to, remaining at, or returning from, the court, it is a contempt of court to counsel and induce a material witness for one of the parties to a pending action, who has not yet been subpoenaed to appear, to depart from the jurisdiction of the court, to avoid the service of a subpoena. Montgomery v. Palmer, 100 Mich. 436, 59 N. W. 148.

Inducing witness to disregard summons, subpoena, or recognizance.

It is contempt of court for one, with the intent to hinder and obstruct the administration of justice in a court, by giving or offering money or bribes, or by threats of

Settle, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, T. F. Brannon, under a rule from the Bourbon circuit court, was tried by a jury and convicted of criminal contempt; his punishment being fixed by the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court at a fine of $1,000 and six months' imprisonment in the county jail. Following the return of the verdict, appellant filed motion and grounds for a new trial; the grounds being: (1) The acts proved did not constitute a contempt of court; (2) the court erred in instructing the jury; (3) the punishment was so excessive as to show that the jury were actuated by passion or prejudice in fixing it. The motion for a new trial was overruled. Thereafter, at the same term of the court, the appellant filed his own and other affidavits and moved the court to set aside the order overruling the motion for a new trial, and renewed the motion for a new trial, both of which motions the court overruled, to which ruling the appellant excepted. The latter, being dissatisfied with the judgment of conviction and the several rulings of the court referred to, has appealed.

The ruling of the court as to the supplemental motion for a new trial will first be disposed of. The affidavits filed in support of this motion stated, in substance, that one of the jurors had previous to the trial said in their presence "that he believed that the defendant should be given the limit." The juror by affidavit denied making the violence, or of personal injury, to induce, persuade, entice, or procure one whom he knows to be in the city for the purpose of attending a term of court as a witness in a pending action, having been duly summoned to attend the court as such witness, to absent himself from the court, and to leave and depart from the city, and from the county, and go beyond and out of the jurisdiction of the court. French v. Com. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 98, 97 S. W. 427.

And under a statute making punishable as contempt any "unlawful interference with the proceedings in any action," and such acts as "tend to defeat, impair, impede, or prejudice" rights or remedies "in an action then pending," it is contempt of court for the defendant in a pending criminal action to try to persuade a witness duly recognized to appear and testify against him therein, to leave the state and not appear in court against him, offering to assist the witness in going and to give him money to pay his way, and to indemnify him for the apprehended forfeit of his bond for appearance at court as a witness. Re Young, 137 N. C. 552, 50 S. E. 220.

So, in Re Whetstone, 9 Utah, 156, 36 Pac. 633, the supreme court of the territory of Utah, without opinion, denied an application for a writ of habeas corpus to review an adjudication of contempt of court, made by a district court of the territory while exercising the powers of a Federal court, under a statute limiting the power of the Federal courts to punish contempt of their authority to certain cases, including misbehavior of any person in their presence or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice, and the resistance by any person to any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of the courts.—the alleged contempt having been committed by persuading and inducing a witness known to have been duly subpoenaed to appear and testify before a grand jury of the district, while it was examining into a criminal charge under the laws of the United States, to leave the territory in order that he might not so appear.

And under a statute providing that the court shall have power to punish as for contempt any person unlawfully interfering with the proceedings in any action, it is a contempt of court to approach and suggest to a complainant who has been recognized to appear as a witness against one bound over to the court upon a criminal charge, and who is a necessary witness for the state, with the intent to prevent her from attending court as a witness against the accused, that she settle and compromise the matter, and not attend court, telling her that, if she will do this, the accused will probably pay her money. State v. Moore, 146 N. C. 653, 61 S. E. 463.

Likewise, under a statute providing that a court of record has power to punish as a criminal contempt, wilful disobedience, or resistance wilfully offered, to its lawful mandate, it is a criminal contempt of court to advise and attempt to procure a witness to disobey a subpoena duces tecum, which is a lawful mandate of the court, by destroying or hiding and wilfully failing to produce the books and papers called for by the subpoena, notwithstanding the attempt to procure the disobedience of the subpoena fails, and the witness does produce the books and papers in accordance therewith. People ex rel. Drake v. Andrews, 197 N. Y. 53, 90 N. E. 347, 18 Ann. Cas. 317, reversing 134 App. Div. 32, 118 N. Y. Supp. 37, which reversed, on the ground that the subpoena in question was not a lawful "mandate" of the court, the order of the trial court committing the relator for contempt.

And see also Re Brule and People v. Jackson, supra, under "Bribery."

Preventing appearance.

It is contempt of court to use means to prevent, and to prevent, one who has been duly summoned to attend court as a witness from thus attending to give evidence. Com. v. Feely, 2 Va. Cas. 1.

So, it is a contempt of court to remove a witness from the county of his residence, where he is under subpoena to attend upon the trial of a pending cause, with the purpose and effect of preventing his appearance statement, or that he entertained prejudice toward appellant, admitting, however, that he had inquired of a former commonwealth's attorney what punishment could be inflicted for criminal contempt, and was told by the latter that it was unlimited. It also appears from his affidavit that this admission, with the further statement that he had not made up his mind as to the guilt or innocence of appellant, was made by him when taken upon the jury, and that on appellant's trial he unavailingly exerted his influence with other members of the jury to reduce the punishment below that fixed by the verdict.

It is, however, insisted for appellant that to his efforts to reduce the punishment in so much of the juror's affidavit as related dicted by the verdict was incompetent, but we do not so regard it. The competency of such evidence was considered by us in Gleason v. Com. 145 Ky. 128, 140 S. W. 63, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 757. In the opinion it is said:

"By the affidavits of three persons filed in support of this ground [disqualification of a juror], it was stated that J. M. Morris, a member of the jury by which appellant was tried, expressed before the trial, and before he was accepted as a juror, the opinion that appellant was 'guilty of the murder of George Courtney, and should be punished therefor by being hanged or sent to the penitentiary for life.' Morris gave an affidavit denying that he formed or expressed any opinion as to appellant's guilt or innocence before the trial. In addition, upon the day of trial. Hale v. State, 55 Ohio St. 210, 36 L.R.A. 254, 60 Am. St. Rep. 691, 45 N. E. 199.

But, although it is contempt of court for one, knowing that a certain person has been subpoenaed by the state to appear and give testimony before the grand jury in a criminal case, to decoy such person out of the state with the purpose of preventing his appearance as a witness, one who thus decoys a supposed witness is not punishable for contempt, under a statute limiting the power of the courts of the state to punish for contempts of this nature to cases of abuse of, or unlawful interference with, the process of proceedings of the court, where the supposed witness had not, in fact, been lawfully subpoenaed, although he was decoyed out of the state under the belief that a lawful subpoena had been served on him. Scott v. State, 109 Tenn. 390, 71 S. W. 824, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 292.

Publication accusing of perjury.

The publication in a newspaper, after the filing of the bill and affidavits, but before a hearing, in a suit in chancery, of an article attributing falsehood and perjury to the witnesses who made the affidavits, is a contempt of court. Felkin v. Herbert, 9 L. T. N. S. 635, 10 Jur. N. S. 62, 12 Week. Rep. 332.

And the publication in a trade gazette, pending the progress of a cause in court, of articles reflecting on the plaintiff's witnesses and representing their affidavits, upon which the plaintiff had obtained an injunction, as containing glaring misrepresentations which the editor believed, and heartily hoped, would lead to an indictment for perjury, is a contempt of court, Littler v. Thomson, 2 Beav. 129.

Service of process.

It is contempt of court to cause process of summons to be served upon a material witness in a pending suit, who is a nonresident of the state and is in the state solely to attend the trial of the cause and testify as a witness, and has not had an opportunity, since testifying, to return to his home. Re Healey, 53 Vt. 694, 38 Am. Rep. 713.

So, it is a contempt of court to serve civil process, after the termination of a criminal prosecution, on witnesses for the government who were brought by it to the place of trial from another state and were regularly subpoenaed as witnesses in the cause, before they had left, or had reasonable opportunity to leave, the place of trial on their return journey to their homes. United States v. Zavelo, 177 Fed. 536.

And this is misbehavior so near the court as to obstruct the administration of justice, within the meaning of the statute limiting the power of the Federal courts to punish summarily for contempt, notwithstanding the acts were not committed in the court room or its immediate vicinity. Ibid.

But the service upon a nonresident witness in a pending action in a Federal court, of a writ of garnishment from a state court in a suit between other parties, while he is proceeding from the court room to his boarding place at the noon recess, is not "a misbehavior in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice," within the meaning of the statute limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in cases of contempt. Ex parte Schulenburg, 25 Fed. 211.

Subornation of perjury.

Procuring a witness for the state in a pending prosecution, by persuasion and threats of personal violence, to testify falsely as to the time of the alleged offense, so as to make it appear to be barred by the statute of limitation, is contempt of court within the meaning of a statute giving the court power to punish, as contempt, an unlawful abuse of or interference with the process or proceedings of the court. Ricketts v. State, 111 Tenn. 380, 77 S. W. 1076, 14 Am. Crim. Rep. 301.

And see also Fisher v. McDaniel, supra, under "Bribery."

But one who, having instigated a negligence action, made and delivered to the wit-

there were filed the affidavits of several members of the jury, from which it appeared that Morris, at no time during the trial, manifested any bias or prejudice against appellant, but that, on the contrary, he was largely instrumental in influencing several of the jury, who were in favor of finding appellant guilty of murder and punishing him accordingly, to agree to a verdict of voluntary manslaughter. We are of opinion that the affidavits of the other jurors were properly admitted as evidence on the charge of bias against Morris. The affidavit or oral testimony of a juror will not be received to impeach a verdict or to impeach a fellow juror's conduct, but will be admitted in support of a verdict attempted to be impeached by other testimony, whether the juror's testimony goes to deny or explain . . . misconduct during retirement. We are aware that this doctrine does not meet with favor in some of the states, but we gave it our approval in Howard v. Com. 24 Ky. L. Rep. 612, 69 S. W. 721, and have since adhered to it. In elaboration of this doctrine Mr. Wigmore, in his valuable work on Evidence (vol. 4, § 2354, subsec. 4), says: 'Moreover, this object of disproving bias alleged to have existed before trial may be attained by showing expressions and conduct during retirement as an evidential fact relating back and negating the supposed prior bias. But where the object is to determine the grounds or motives of the verdict as in themselves important for sustaining it (for example, to show that a certain illegal paper or erroneous charge did not influence the verdict), here the other principle (ante, § 2349) applies to forbid this. The distinction is that in the former case the juror's expressions are not considered in their aspect in establishing motives for the verdict, but merely as part of his whole conduct going to determine the question of his former bias.' 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1008."

If the conduct of the juror in attempting to influence the jury to inflict a lighter punishment than was awarded by the verdict could properly have been shown by the affidavit of other members of the jury, as held by the authorities, supra, it was clearly competent to show it, as was done in this case, by the affidavit of the juror himself. Under the circumstances, it was necessary for the trial court to determine whether the juror alleged to be biased was disqualified to such an extent as to impeach the verdict and give cause for setting it aside. The matter was one that addressed itself to the discretion of the court. Some weight must be given to the court's knowledge of the conduct of the juror during the trial and its acquaintance with the character of the juror and those of the three personal friends of appellant by whose affidavits his disqualification for service upon the jury was attempted to be shown; and the fact that the court accepted the statements contained in the juror's affidavit in preference to those contained in the affidavits of the three witnesses of appellant gives us no ground for holding that the ruling of the court on this point against appellant nesses who were to testify for the plaintiff, typewritten statements of what they were to swear when called at the trial, which statements were false, and were furnished to aid the plaintiff in obtaining a verdict by false and perjured testimony, is not guilty of a civil contempt, under a statute giving courts of record the power to punish as a civil contempt, in certain cases, misconduct by which a right or remedy of a party to a pending civil action may be defeated, impaired, impeded, or prejudiced, where the defendant has succeeded at the trial. Noster v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. 30 Misc. 722, 63 N. Y. Supp. 501.

Miscellaneous.

It is contempt of court for the defendant in a pending civil action to prevent the service of a subpoena upon, and to keep out of the way, a material and necessary witness for the plaintiff, who resides with the defendant as a part of his family and is entirely under his care and control. Clements v. Williams, 2 Scott, 814.

And it is contempt of court to endeavor to warp the minds of possible witnesses in a pending action, by writing letters to persons who, from their knowledge of the matters involved, are likely to be called as witnesses in the action, and one of whom has already actually been subpoenaed. Welby v. Still, 66 L. T. N. S. 523.

Where, owing to sickness of one summoned as a witness, and his inability to attend court, his bookkeeper has been subpoenaed to appear and bring with him into court one of his employer's books, which he brings, in obedience to the summons, it is contempt of court for another to take the book from him, and carry it out of court and to the employer, although the employee brought the book into court without consulting his employer, or obtaining the latter's permission to take it. Com. v. Braynard, Thacher, Crim. Cas. 146.

But it is not a contempt of court merely to write to one who may become a material witness for the plaintiff in a pending civil action, and attempt to persuade him not to give evidence at the trial, where it is not shown that such conduct interferes in any way with the plaintiff's serving the witness with a subpoena, or that the witness, if served, will not appear and furnish the evidence desired by the plaintiff. Schlesinger v. Flersheim, 2 Dowl. & L. 737, 14 L. J. Q. B., N. S. 97.

was error. In other words, we are unconvinced, by anything appearing in the record, that the ruling of the court in refusing to set aside the previous order overruling the motion for a new trial was an abuse of discretion, or prejudicial to the rights of appellant. McKee v. Cincinnati, F. & S. E. R. Co. 161 Ky. 711, 171 S. W. 425.

Appellant's main contention that the acts for which he was convicted did not constitute contempt cannot prevail. To intelligently pass upon this contention, consideration of the evidence will be necessary. It appears that there were three indictments returned in the Bourbon circuit court against appellant, who was the keeper of a saloon, each charging him with an unlawful sale of liquor. C. P. Cook was an important witness for the commonwealth in each of the three cases referred to. Two of the cases had been tried, one of the trials resulting in appellant's acquittal and the other in his conviction; Cook being the principal witness against him in each of the cases. The third case was continued.

The following excerpts from the testimony of Cook in the instant case will indicate the acts constituting the alleged contempt:

Q. This rule charges Mr. Brannon with contempt of court for striking you after you had left the court room here. Just tell what those facts were, if he struck you, Mr. Cook, how it came up, and how long after the trial of this case was it?

A. A very few minutes. I walked up street before the jury had brought in a verdict. After I testified I walked up street, and I stopped on the corner of Seventh and Main to talk to Mrs. Sims Wilson. She stopped me and asked me about a certain matter. I have forgotten what it was now—perhaps an order—and just as I started to walk on to get on the other side of the street—Seventh street, going up—Mr. Brannon came diagonally across the street. I turned and saw him. He was almost to me; and he says, "God damn you, I ought to whip you, and I am going to do it." And with that he struck me on the jaw here, and then he struck me here, and knocked me down and kicked me twice.

Q. Where did he kick you?

A. Kicked me in the back. . . .

A. As soon as I got up, he shook his fist in my face, and says, "God damn you, I am going to give you this every time that I meet you." . . .

A. When he first struck me he said, "You God damned s— of a b—, I ought to whip you, and I'm going to do it."

Q. What did you do?

A. Nothing whatever. And said nothing. . . .

Q. Did you or not have an opportunity to defend yourself before he struck you?

A. No, sir; he struck me just as he said—he says, "You God damned s— of a b—, I ought to whip you, and I am going to;" and with that he struck me.

With respect to this transaction, appellant testified as follows:

Q. Now, tell just how you met Mr. Cook there at the corner of Seventh and Main streets, and what was said between you there, and what was done?

A. Well, I was going up on the west side of Main street, from the court here. When I left the courthouse I went up Main street on the west side until I got to Seventh street. My place is on the opposite side of the street, and I was crossing over and I met—I never saw Mr. Cook until I run right into him between Seventh street, between the two corners.

Q. You mean on the north side or the south side of Seventh street?

A. Yes, sir. Right in the middle of the crossing. I said to him: "You dirty little cur, you lied. You know you lied." And he called me another liar, and as he did I hit him. I never hit him but once. I hit him the first time this way, then I hit him with the left hand the second time, and that was all that I done.

Q. Did you knock him down?

A. Yes, sir. He fell on his back.

Q. Did you kick him at all?

A. I did not, sir. . . .

Q. What else did you say to him there at the time? Did you say that you were going to whip him every time you saw him?

A. I don't think I did.

Appellant also testified, in substance, that he did not threaten Cook with any violence; that he had no purpose of intimidating him from testifying in the remaining case pending against him; and that he intended no contempt of the court.

On cross-examination he was asked:

Q. You say that you didn't strike Mr. Cook for the purpose of intimidating him from giving any further testimony. It is a fact that you did strike him for having testified?

A. No, sir. Never.

Q. What did you strike him for?

A. Just because he told a lie. That's it.

Q. Then you did strike him for the purpose of punishing him for having testified against you, if you struck him for having told a lie, didn't you?

A. I thought it was all over and everything settled, and I had no idea of doing anything to wrong this court.

Cook's testimony was corroborated in the main by three eyewitnesses of the assault, one of whom heard appellant use the insulting and abusive epithets and language applied to Cook and saw him knock him down and kick him. The others were not close enough to hear what was said, but they saw Cook knocked down and kicked by appellant, and all three witnesses testified that the assault was unprovoked by anything that Cook did, and that he made no effort to defend himself against the attack.

It should here be remarked that, at the time the assault and battery was committed by appellant upon Cook, there was still pending one of the indictments against the former, under which he had not been tried, and that Cook's name appeared on this indictment as a witness; and it was known to appellant that he would, upon the trial of the case at the next term, be called on to again testify as a witness in behalf of the commonwealth against him. Appellant's trial under one of the other indictments had, as previously stated, resulted in a verdict in his behalf, but the trial of the case in which he was convicted had, according to his testimony, been concluded but a few minutes before he committed the assault and battery upon Cook. According to Cook's testimony, the attack upon him occurred very soon after he had left the court house for his place of business, and that, at the time of his leaving the court house, the jury which convicted appellant had not returned a verdict. It is true the case in which appellant was convicted of unlawfully selling liquor had, at the time of the assault, been tried, but it had not been finally disposed of, for the judgment had not then been entered upon the verdict; and as, under § 273, Criminal Code, appellant had the right to make application for a new trial at any time during the term, which continued for some days thereafter, the case cannot be said to have been finally disposed of until the time allowed by the Code for filing motion and grounds for a new trial expired, which ended with the close of the term.

So it is apparent that, at the time of the assault upon Cook by appellant, there were two cases pending against him in the Bourbon circuit court—one of which had been disposed of only in part, and the other continued for trial at the succeeding term—in which Cook was an important witness for the commonwealth; and it is manifest from what he said to Cook at the time of assaulting and knocking him down and kicking him, and his threat to repeat it at all future meetings between them, that the purpose of the attack upon the latter was not only to punish him for previously testifying against appellant in the two cases which had been tried, and one of which had not been finally disposed of, but also to intimidate him with a view of influencing his testimony, or of preventing his giving it, on any future trial that might take place under the indictment which had been continued.

There appears to be no authority in this jurisdiction, other than Melton v. Com. 160 Ky. 642, L.R.A. 1915B, 689, 170 S. W. 37, as to what constitutes the pendency or non-pendency of an action or proceeding, with respect to which a contempt was charged to have been committed; but the question seems to have been decided in other jurisdictions, a leading case on the subject being that of State v. Tugwell, 19 Wash. 238, 43 L.R.A. 717, 52 Pac. 1056. In that case the respondent was accused of publishing a libelous article six days after the reversal of a judgment by the supreme court of the state of Washington, which attacked the court because of the reversal. It appeared, however, that the publication, though occurring after the reversal, was made before the court had acted upon a petition for a modification of the opinion, final judgment upon which was not rendered until March 2, 1898, the remittitur issuing March 9, 1898. In rejecting the respondent's contention in the contempt proceeding, that the case, with respect to which the contempt was charged to have been committed, was not pending on appeal at the time the article was written, the court said:

"The first opinion in the cause was followed by a petition for rehearing on the part of the appellant. Leave to print and file additional briefs was granted by the court, and the case assigned regularly, and reargued orally in the court, and the opinion of the majority of the court then filed, reversing the judgment of the superior court. A petition was then filed by counsel for respondent, praying for an important modification of the opinion filed, and subsequently an opinion filed denying such modification. There can be no doubt of the jurisdiction of this court over the cause and the power to make any modification of its opinion, until the final judgment was rendered, and until the remittitur issued. Under the law, the courts in this state are always in session, in legal contemplation. 'An action is "pending" . . . until the judgment is fully certified.' Anderson's Law Dict. verb. Pend. See Ulshafer v. Stewart, 71 Pa. 170; Holland v. Fox, 3 El. & Bl. 977; Wegman v. Childs, 41 N. Y. 159."

In the elaborate abstract of brief appended to the case, in [43 L.R.A. 718], will be found the following statements of the rule in question, supported by abundant authority:

"Where a decree has not been enrolled, or where it is subject to modification upon motion, or where the court might grant a rehearing, or where an appeal might be taken, or where the costs had not been taxed, or where no execution had issued, it not being in condition to issue execution, . . . the case could not be said to have reached that stage where it could be said it was not pending in that court. Re Chadwick, 109 Mich. 588, 67 N. W. 1071; Fishback v. State, 131 Ind. 304, 30 N. E. 1088; Bloom v. People, 23 Colo. 416, 48 Pac. 519.

"A petition of which judgment has been finally pronounced, but on which the order has not been drawn up, is a 'pending proceeding.' Ex parte Turner, 3 Mont. D. & De G. 523."

In Melton v. Com. supra, Melton, a physician, in contemplation of a suit to be instituted by a party to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the alleged negligence of another, pretended to treat the party in a professional way for the purpose of manufacturing evidence that would sustain the action that was soon thereafter brought, when he knew such party was not injured. We held that although such conduct upon his part was a common-law misdemeanor, because of its obstructing justice, for which he might have been proceeded against by warrant or indictment, he was not guilty of contempt, because the action in which he attempted to manufacture evidence was not an action pending in court. After defining the distinction between acts which constitute the common-law misdemeanor of obstructing justice and those which constitute criminal contempt, it is in the opinion said:

"In thus speaking, we do not undervalue the importance of protecting courts or of keeping pure the administration of the law; nor do we think what we have said limits in any manner the power courts have always possessed to punish, as for contempt, persons who were guilty of contempt, as it has been always defined. When a court has full power and authority to protect its dignity, enforce its processes, discipline its officers, and punish those who would impede or bring into disrepute the administration of justice in a pending case, it has all the authority that is needed to be exercised through contempt proceedings, and other offenses should be left to be disposed of in the ordinary way. If there had been a suit pending in the Jefferson circuit court, and Melton had attempted to manufacture evidence in this suit, or had endeavored to persuade a witness to give false evidence or conceal the truth, or had in any manner or form interfered with the due administration of justice in the court in which the case was pending, we would have no doubt of the right of the court, in which the case was pending, to proceed against him in the summary manner adopted by Judge Field in this case."

For one to commit, as was done by the appellant in this case, an assault and battery upon the witness as a punishment for giving testimony against him in an action or criminal prosecution then pending, though in part disposed of, or as a means to intimidate him and influence his testimony expected to be given in the future trial of an action or criminal prosecution then pending, is a criminal contempt, because such conduct is as much an interference with the authority and dignity of the court, and an obstruction of justice, as would be the intimidation or bribery of a witness, or any contempt committed in the presence of the court. The evidence clearly proves appellant's guilt of such a contempt; and, this being true, it was within the power and jurisdiction of the court to proceed against him by rule and summarily try him, as was done in this case. It is equally manifest that the power of the court was inadequate to the infliction of such punishment as the contempt of appellant deserved. Therefore it was proper to submit the matter to the determination of a jury. As said in French v. Com. 30 Ky. L. Rep. 98, 97 S. W. 427: "We have in this state no statute defining contempt. There is a statute limiting the power of the court as to the infliction of punishment for contempt; but, in the opinion of the court the contempt is one demanding greater punishment than lies in its power to inflict, it may have a jury to hear the truth of the matter, and leave it to them to inflict such punishment as they may deem commensurate with the offense. As in any other case of trial by jury, their verdict will not be disturbed, unless flagrantly against the evidence, or the result of passion or prejudice. There is nothing here to indicate passion or prejudice on the part of the jury."

The further contention of appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury is without merit. Instruction No. 1 appears to be the only one objected to. That instruction, in substance, told the jury that, in order to find the appellant guilty of the contempt charged, they must believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the assault and battery committed upon Cook was done to intimidate him as a witness in the case then pending, or to punish him for testifying in the case theretofore recently tried. It is insisted for appellant that the alleged error in this instruction was in its advising the jury that they might find appellant guilty if his motive for committing the assault and battery was to punish Cook for testifying in the case just tried. Obviously this contention rests upon the ground that, if the assault was committed from the motive last mentioned, it would not constitute a contempt, in the meaning of the law. This we have already answered by stating in the opinion that, as the case tried must be regarded as pending in court at the time of the commission of the assault, the assault, if committed by way of punishment for the testimony given by Cook therein, was as much a contempt as if it had been committed for the purpose of intimidating Cook as a witness in a future trial to be had of the other indictment, which had been continued to the succeeding term of the court.

It is also insisted for appellant that he did not actually know that Cook had been subpoenaed as a witness in the continued case. In our opinion it is not material whether appellant had knowledge of a subpoena having been served on Cook in that case. It is manifest that he knew Cook was a prospective witness in the continued case, as his name appears upon the indictment as a witness for the commonwealth, and appellant, being in court on that indictment, must be presumed to have knowledge of what it contained, not only as to the offense charged, but as to the witnesses for the commonwealth, whose names appear upon the back thereof. Moreover, as Cook was the most important witness for the commonwealth in the other two cases and had testified in each, which was of course known to the appellant, who was himself present at each of the trials, it is reasonably certain that he knew of the importance of his testimony to the commonwealth in the continued case.

Appellant's final contention, that the punishment inflicted by the verdict is excessive, cannot be sustained. In view of the nature of the contempt committed by appellant and the aggravating circumstances attending its commission, no reason is apparent for regarding the punishment inflicted by the jury greater than his conduct deserved. In French v. Com. supra, the judgment inflicting a fine of $5,000 upon the appellant was affirmed by this court. We find in this case nothing to indicate that the jury, in reaching a verdict, were influenced by passion or prejudice, and, in the absence of such a showing, no reason is apparent for disturbing the verdict. Every judge at all familiar with the conduct of criminal prosecutions in this state has seen that one of the chief difficulties in the way of the punishment of crime and the enforcement of law lies in the inability of the courts and prosecuting officers to procure the testimony of witnesses having knowledge of the facts upon which the conviction of violators of the law may be secured. This, in most instances, is due to the intimidation or bribery of witnesses. It is therefore the duty of the court to protect witnesses from evilly disposed persons who resort to such means of suppressing evidence; and this cannot better be done than by bringing them to speedy trial and certain punishment; and where, as in a case like this, the evidence unerringly establishes the guilt of the contemner, and there is nothing to be urged in mitigation of the contempt, it would be a miscarriage of justice to set aside the verdict, unless for error so prejudicial in character as that it prevented the accused from receiving a fair and impartial trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

H. D. SMALLWOOD, Appt.,

v.

J. M. YORK.

(163 Ky. 139, 173 S. W. 380.)

Slander — privilege — statement in court.

1. A statement by an attorney in open court that the jury in another case had turned in a verdict which they knew to be wrong is not privileged.

Same — charging return of wrong verdict — actionability.

2. To charge a juror with returning a verdict which he knew to be wrong is not actionable per se.

Same — office — juror.

3. The position of juror is not an office or employment within the rule that it is slanderous to impute unfitness to perform the duties of an office or employment.

(February 25, 1915.)

Note. — Libel and slander: imputing misconduct to judicial officer or juror.

Generally.

The purpose of this note is to consider what constitutes a libel or slander of a judicial officer in that capacity for which an action for damages may be maintained; and while a few cases of libel or slander not touching such person in his office have been included in this note, it is not intended to exhaust such cases. Neither is this note concerned with the question of criminal libel of such officer, in which connection see notes cited in §§ 6, 7, Contempt, Index to L.R.A. notes, 252.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Pike County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged slander. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. E. Childers, for appellant:

The language sued on was actionable per se.

Spears v. McCoy, 155 Ky. 1, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1033, 159 S. W. 610; Byers v. Martin, 2 Colo. 605, 25 Am. Rep. 755, 25 Cyc. 352.

It imputes to plaintiff unfitness to perform the duties of an office and employment.

Kemper v. Fort, 123 Am. St. Rep. 650, note.

For many valuable notes on the general subject of libel and slander, see "Libel and Slander," Index to L.R.A. Notes, 840.

As regards language concerning one in office, the same general principles apply as to language concerning one in a trade. Language concerning one in office, which imputes to him a want of integrity or misfeasance in his office, or a want of capacity, generally, to fulfil the duties of his office, or which is calculated to diminish public confidence in him, or charges him with the breach of some public trust, is actionable. Spiering v. Andr , infra.

To say of a commissioner for the examination of witnesses that he has taken bribes to favor one of the parties is actionable. Moor v. Foster, Cro. Jac. 65.

And in Lansing v. Carpenter, 9 Wis. 540, 70 Am. Dec. 281, the substance of the alleged libelous charge published in a newspaper was that it was expected that the plaintiff as court commissioner would discharge, habeas corpus, all persons who might be committed by the legislature for refusing to testify, merely to subserve the views of other parties, whose tool and toady the plaintiff was, and that the writer of the article considered him "a fit tool for such purposes," etc., and that "whatever he might do in the future, the past would warrant the depriving him of his office." Such imputations made against an officer, it was held, have natural tendency, so far as the influence of the press extends, to diminish public confidence in his official integrity, and thus injure him in the business of his office, and are actionable within the rule relating to words spoken of a man in his trade or profession.

It is settled that an action for libel may be sustained for words published which tend to bring the plaintiff into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, even though the same words spoken would not have been actionable. Ibid.

To accuse one in open court with having perverted justice is actionable. Seignior de la Ware v. Pawlet, F. Moore, 409. It does not clearly appear in this case who the plaintiff was. L.R.A.1915D.

If a party desires to plead privileged occasion he must admit speaking the words.

Edwards v. Kevil, 133 Ky. 392, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 551, 134 Am. St. Rep. 463, 118 S. W. 273.

The communication of litigants, counsel, and witnesses are conditionally privileged.

Morgan v. Booth, 13 Bush. 482; Tanner v. Stevenson, 138 Ky. 578, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 200, 128 S. W. 878.

Messrs. Hobson & Hobson, for appellee: The statements of counsel are absolutely privileged.

See Earle v. Johnson, 81 Minn. 472, 84 N. W. 332, holding that the alleged words charged an appraiser of real estate with crime, and were slanderous per se.

Judge—libel.

Quoting from Newell on Libel & Slander, the court in Dixon v. Chappell, infra, said: "Defamatory words falsely spoken of a person, which impute to the party unfitness to perform the duties of an office, or employment of profit, or the want of integrity in the discharge of the duties of such an office or employment, are actionable in themselves without proof of special damages."

In Dixon v. Chappell, 133 Ky. 663, 118 S. W. 929, the court said: "In the article before us it is charged that justice has been outdone, overruled by sleight of hand; that it is a matter of self-exposure, self-ignorance, bad recollection, no bookkeeping, or downright graft on the part of the county officials; that when things go wrong the county judge has a very bad memory, and his graft continues to extract money from the taxpayers' pockets. The natural meaning of this is that the misuse of the county money is due to ignorance, bad recollection, no bookkeeping, or downright graft on the part of the county officials, and that the county judge has both a bad recollection, and by graft continues to extract money from the taxpayers' pockets. The word 'graft' has a well-defined popular meaning at this time. It means the fraudulent obtaining of public money unlawfully by the corruption of public officers. It is constantly so used in the daily press, and is thus defined in Clarkson's American Dictionary: 'The act of anyone, especially an official or public employee, by which he procures money surreptitiously by virtue of his office or position.' 'Grafter' is thus defined: 'A dishonest official.' The charge touches the county judge in his office. To charge an official with graft is to charge him with want of integrity. The article in question, if true, would necessarily destroy the respect of the people of Leslie county for the county judge. Its necessary tendency was to de-

A publication to the effect that an assemblyman, a lawyer, passed a bill raising the salary of a county judge as the agent of the judge, and that the assemblyman was rewarded for such act by the principal by appointment as referee, etc., while not charging the judge with bribery within the legal definition of that crime, is calculated to degrade his character and impeach his integrity as a judge, and injure him in the public estimation, and is libelous. Hickey v. Corson Mfg. Co. 58 Misc. 70, 108 N. Y. Supp. 884, affirmed without opinion in 127 App. Div. 946, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1123.

Stat. 1911, defining a libel as "a defamation expressed in printing or writing, or by signs and pictures or drawings, tending to blacken the memory of the dead, or tending to injure the reputation of one who is alive, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, or financial injury, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, or virtue, or reputation of anyone, or to publish the Lauder v. Jones, 13 N. D. 525, 101 N. W. 907.

In Tappan v. Wilson, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 191, it does not seem that the publication which was held not libelous was made concerning the plaintiff as judge.

In Briggs v. Garrett, 111 Pa. 404, 56 Am. Rep. 274, 2 Atl. 513, the alleged libel was published concerning a judge as a candidate for re-election, and the case is concerned chiefly with the question, in what manner and to what extent the fitness of a candidate for a public office may be discussed by the people, whose votes may elect or defeat him.

Ames v. Hazard, 6 R. I. 335, subsequent appeal in 8 R. I. 143, was an action for libel against the plaintiff in his office of chief justice of the supreme court of Rhode Island, and reporter of its decisions. The case, however, decides nothing peculiar to cases of the type now under consideration, being concerned with the sufficiency of a plea attempting to justify the alleged libel complained of. And see in the same connection Royce v. Maloney, 57 Vt. 325, 58 Vt. 437, 5 Atl. 393. And see also Harris v. Lawrence, 1 Tyler (Vt.) 156; Harris v. Huntington, 2 Tyler (Vt.) 129, 4 Am. —slander.

To say of one that he has been a corrupt judge and justice, and has taken bribes of many persons, is actionable. Pepper v. Gay, Lntw. pt. 2, p. 538. L.R.A.1915D.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, who is the appellant here, brought suit against the defendant, now appellee, to recover damages for an alleged slander. The defendant is an attorney at law, and the petition charged that in the courthouse, while making the opening statement in a case, he falsely and maliciously spoke of and concerning the plaintiff the following words, to wit: "In this case the only question is whether a corporation can get justice in Pike county. No longer than yesterday I heard a case tried in this court of Carl Massy against the Allegheny Coke Company and John Fuller, in which the jury turned in a verdict under their oaths against the Allegheny Coke Company

And words charging a judge with using undue influence and violating his oath, for which he ought to be removed from office, were held actionable in Hook v. Hackney, 16 Serg. & R. 385, without colloquium or innuendo.

One said that my Lord Chief Baron cannot hear of one ear colloquio prohibito of his administration of justice; and it was adjudged actionable. Alleston v. Moor, Het. 167 (dictum). It would have been otherwise if they had said nothing of his justice. Ibid.

And it seems that to say of an admiralty judge that a sentence was corruptly given by him is actionable. See Caesar v. Curseny, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 305.

Justice of peace—libel.

A newspaper account describing what purported to be a scene between a justice of the peace and a prisoner, in which the justice, aroused to anger by the prisoner's disrespect, left the bench and violently assaulted the prisoner, was libelous per se. O'Leary v. New York News Pub. Co. 51 App. Div. 2, 64 N. Y. Supp. 327. Against the conclusion of the trial judge that the language of the publication was not so actionable, the court said: "The publication charged the plaintiff, while in the exercise of his functions as a justice of the peace, with having committed an assault upon a prisoner who stood arraigned before him. The fact that the prisoner had treated him with derision was no justification for a personal attack by the plaintiff, nor was such attack justified or excused by the fact that the prisoner started to leave the room. According to the article, the constable who had brought the prisoner to court was present throughout the entire altercation, and nothing is stated in the article disclosing the slightest necessity of any effort on the part of the justice to detain the prisoner. On the contrary, the action attributed to the plaintiff by this publication, if not palliated by facts which do not appear in the published statement, would warrant the removal of the justice from office. In slander, it is a general rule and found in favor of John Fuller, which they knew to be wrong. That verdict was a travesty on justice and a shame and a disgrace to the community."

It was averred "that the plaintiff was, at the time the words were spoken, one of the regular jurors of the court, and, as such, had been selected and sworn as required by law to try the said case of Carl Massy against the Allegheny Coke Company and John Fuller, and, as such juror, had tried said case and returned a verdict against the said Allegheny Coke Company and for John Fuller; that this defendant as an attorney at law represented said Allegheny Coke Company in said case, and, chafing under the defeat of his client, made said statement for the express and only purpose of insulting and slandering the jury that tried said case of Massy against the Allegheny Coke Company; that said words were used by defendant in stating the case of Coleman against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway, and had no relevancy to or place in said case, and defendant purposely digressed from said case to insult and slander the jury that tried the Allegheny company case."

And further averred: "That defendant meant to and did charge the plaintiff with the crime of perjury, and further meant to charge that he had wilfully and knowingly violated the oath that he had taken to try the issues joined and a true verdict render in said case, and had returned a verdict which he knew to be wrong; that said that words not actionable in themselves are not actionable when uttered of one in an office, unless they touch him in his office. Kinney v. Nash, 3 N. Y. 177. This rule is invoked in behalf of the respondent in the present action, although the defamatory words complained of here were in writing. Assuming that it applies to libel as well as slander, there are two reasons why it cannot aid the defendant here,—one is that the words published are actionable of themselves, as relating to the plaintiff in his individual as distinguished from his official character, for the reason that they charge him with an offense against the criminal law; to wit, an assault. The other is that they do 'touch him in his office,' and, if true, would manifest his unfitness to hold it. We think that the language of the article published by the defendant was actionable per se, and that it was error to dismiss the complaint."

In Clifton v. Lange, 108 Iowa, 472, 79 N. W. 276, a newspaper publication charging plaintiff, a justice of the peace, with dishonesty in office, in helping in a "rotten and infernal steal," was conceded to be libelous and actionable per se.

Such publication was not privileged as criticism of an official act of a public officer, for the reason that it contained an attack upon the private character of the plaintiff. Ibid.

To write of a magistrate, that "as chairman of a finance committee, he audited accounts containing items of upwards of £12,000 for the nominal purpose of furnishing lodgings, plate, etc., for the judges, but which expenditure was in reality to find accommodation for the magistrates, as the sheriff always found the judges suitable lodgings without putting the county to any expense," was held actionable in Adams v. Meredew, 3 Younge & J. 219.

But an affidavit filed, praying for leave to appeal from a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, and alleging that the testimony was concluded after dark on the day of the trial; that thereupon the justice announced an adjournment, but for no definite time; that all the parties left the L.R.A.19151D.

justice's office; that the attorney for the defendant was sick for several days thereafter, and unable to attend to business; that judgment was rendered on the day the case was tried; that the affiant was deceived thereby; and that by reason thereof, and by the sickness of the attorney, the defendant was prevented from taking an appeal within the statutory time,—does not charge fraud and dishonesty upon the justice, and is not libelous per se. Murphy v. Nelson, 94 Mich. 554, 54 N. W. 282. The court said: "A judgment may in fact be a fraud upon the rights of the party against whom it is rendered, while the judicial officer rendering it may have acted in entire good faith. It would certainly lead to strange results if litigants could not allege, in the pleadings and papers necessary to obtain review of judgments, that such judgments were in fact a fraud upon their rights, without charging corruption and fraud upon the judicial officers rendering them."

And where a paper was written for the purpose of preventing the reappointment of a justice of the peace to office, and stating that his general character and reputation were such as to make him unfit for such appointment, and there was reasonable and probable cause for writing the said paper, the plaintiff in an action of libel was not entitled to recover. Clark v. Ford, 1 Hayw. & H. 6, Fed. Cas. No. 2,820.

In Miner v. Detroit Post & Tribune Co. 49 Mich. 358, 13 N. W. 773, where the alleged libel consisted of reflections upon the plaintiff's conduct as a police justice,—the substance of which was that when a complaint had been filed in his court against a Chinaman, the justice, without the assent of the complainant, had inserted the name of another and different Chinaman; that though the evidence completely exonerated this second man, he was held for trial under heavy bonds; that such holding was an inexcusable outrage; that if the justice would discharge his duty on the complaints for violations of the liquor and gambling laws, people would be more lenient in their judgment of him, but instead of so doing he turns upon a helpless Chinaman, who has words were spoken in the courthouse and in the presence of the court, the jurors, and the bar, and a large crowd of people there assembled; that said words were spoken of plaintiff as a juror, an officer of the court, and were used to falsely leave the impression on those who heard them that plaintiff was a perjurer and had been false to his trust as an officer of the court; that by reason of the use of said words by defendant as aforesaid the plaintiff has suffered great disgrace, humiliation, and loss of character and reputation, to his great damage."

This petition was dismissed on demurrer, and the plaintiff is here on appeal.

We think it was highly improper for the defendant, as an attorney and officer of the court, to go out of his way and assail in the manner alleged a jury because they had, in another case in which he was also engaged as an attorney, returned a verdict against his client, and, considering the place, and circumstances under which the words were spoken, it may well be admitted that they were calculated to wound the feelings of the plaintiff and subject him to at least some measure of ridicule and reproach.

And we are also satisfied that appellee should not be protected in this assault on the jury by the law of qualified or absolute privilege. The fact that he was an attorney, and that the words complained of were spoken in the course of an argument or statement he was making, do not furnish any excuse for his attack of the jury that no political influence,—the trial court ruled that so much of the defamatory article as related to the enforcement of the liquor and gambling laws was privileged, but that the imputations concerning the holding for trial of the Chinaman were not. The appellate court, overruling this in an opinion by Cooley, J., said: "When a judge orders a man into confinement without a charge against him, he deprives him of liberty without due process of law; and in doing so violates the earliest and most important guaranty of constitutional freedom. When in a case where bail is of right, he demands security in a sum which, considering the position in life and probable means and ability to give it, of the person accused, is altogether beyond his power, the demand is unreasonable, and for that reason is repugnant to a further provision of the Constitution, the importance of which is only second to the other. There must be some great and most serious defect in the administration of the law when such things can take place, and the matter is one which concerns every member of the political community; for if constitutional principles fail to protect the most humble of the people, they protect no one. The defendant contends that to call public attention to what so vitally concerns the public is matter of privilege; and that, by presumption of law, its motives in doing so must be deemed proper, and not actuated by malice. The trial judge denied this claim altogether. In doing so he put the case upon precisely the same footing with publications which involve merely private gossip and scandal. The truth was allowed to be a defense, if made out, and so it would have been if the injurious charge which was published had been one in which the public was not concerned. If there is no difference in moral quality between the publication of mere personal abuse and the discussion of matters of grave public concern, then this judgment may be right, and should be affirmed. But it is very certain, I think, that no declaration of this or any other court can convince the common reason that the distinction is not plain and palpable. Few wrongs can be greater than the L.R.A.1915D.

public detraction which has only abuse, or the profit from abuse, for its object. Few duties can be plainer than to challenge public attention to the official disregard of the principles which protect public and personal liberty. I know of nothing more likely to encourage the license of a dissolute press than to establish the principle that the discussion of matters of general concern involving public wrongs and the publication of personal scandal come under the same condemnation in the law; for this inevitably brings the law itself into contempt and creates public sentiment against its enforcement. If a law is to be efficiently enforced the approval of the people must attend its penalties, and there must be some presumption at least that an act which it punishes involves some elements of wrongdoing. If prima facie the punishment is as likely to be inflicted for a right act as for a wrong act, the violation of law will not only be without disgrace, but the reckless libeler, when ranked by the law in the same company with respectable and public-spirited journalists, will shield himself to some extent behind their commendable public spirit, and will find some protection for his license in the public opinion which condemns the law which it cannot respect."

Where the complaint in an action for libel alleges that the libelous publication meant not only to impute to the plaintiff corruption and official malfeasance on the trial of the particular cause mentioned, in his action on that occasion, but that it was habitual for him to thus act in administering his judicial duties, evidence of how he acted on other occasions in administering his judicial duties is pertinent to so much of the charge as imputes to the plaintiff the habitual abuse of his authority. Davis v. Lyon, 91 N. C. 444.

Mix v. Woodward, 12 Conn. 262, is not regarded as in point in this note, for it seems that the plaintiff in that case was not a judicial officer at the time of the alleged libel, which was to the alleged effect that the plaintiff "was deprived of a two-penny justiceship for malpractice in packing a jury."

returned the verdict in another suit pending in the court. The privilege that protects an attorney extends only to speeches made by him that are pertinent to the case in which he is engaged when the remarks are made. It fortunately does not license him to go entirely out of the record and assail other persons having no manner of connection with the case in which he is employed. If it did, it would place in the power of an attorney the right to malign at will those who had incurred his displeasure, and permit him to defame and scandalize all who might come within the circle of his enmity. The extent to which an attorney is privileged from suit for slander and the limitation upon this privilege are well stated in Sebree v. Thompson, 126 Ky. 223, — slander.

Words spoken of a justice of the peace and characterizing him as "a damned fool of a justice" are actionable per se. Spiering v. Andrae, 45 Wis. 330, 30 Am. Rep. 744. The court said: "Certainly the language used by the defendant imputed a want of capacity and ability on the part of the plaintiff to discharge properly the duties of his office, and was calculated, if believed by his hearers, to diminish public confidence in him as a justice. We are not yet prepared to say that the citizen, in the exercise of his right to criticize the acts and qualifications of those holding office, may publicly make false and malicious charges as to their honesty, or their capacity to discharge the duties of the offices held by them. Though the citizen has the right to criticize those in office, and a just and truthful criticism may be a wholesome corrective of abuses of official positions, such criticism should be honest, and founded upon truth, and not falsehood."

To render words actionable per se, when spoken in reference to the official character or action of a person holding an office of profit, it is not necessary that they should import a crime, but it is sufficient if they charge incapacity, or want of integrity or corruption in the officer. Gove v. Blethen, 21 Minn. 80, 18 Am. Rep. 380. The reason for this rule seems to be thus: When an office is lucrative, words which reflect upon the integrity or the capacity of the officer render his tenure precarious, and are therefore a detriment in a pecuniary point of view. Ibid.

In Gove v. Blethen, supra, the slander complained of was in the following terms: "Gove perjured himself in deciding the suit of Whitcomb against me. And I will be d—d if I will believe him under oath; for he has decided against me contrary to all law and evidence, and it is the G—d d—est erroneous decision I ever saw any justice give, and it was a d—d outrage, and it was done for spite." The court said: "There can be no doubt, we think, that the words stated in the complaint are in themselves 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 723, 103 S. W. 374, 15 Ann. Cas. 770, where the court, after setting down the privileges of an attorney, said he would not be protected if he availed himself "of his situation to gratify private malice by uttering slanderous expressions, either against a party, witness, or third person, which have no relation to the cause or subject-matter of the inquiry." To the same effect are Morgan v. Booth, 13 Bush, 480; Gaines v. Aetna Ins. Co. 104 Ky. 695 47 S. W. 884; Stewart v. Hall, 83 Ky. 375; Monroe v. Davis, 118 Ky. 806, 82 S. W. 450.

The words spoken not being privileged, the remaining question is: Are they actionable? On behalf of the appellant it is insisted that they are actionable per se; or, if actionable, and are within both the reason and the letter of the rule. The charge that the plaintiff perjured himself in deciding the suit referred to against the defendant, while it does not charge a technical perjury, does charge that the plaintiff violated his official promissory oath. Gen. Stat. chap. 9, § 2. A charge of this nature is in itself actionable. Hopkins v. Beedle, 1 Caines, 347, 2 Am. Dec. 191; Aston v. Blagrove, 1 Strange, 617, 2 Ld. Raym. 1369; Rex v. Pocock, 2 Strange, 1157; Kent v. Pocock, 2 Strange, 1168; 3 Burn's J. P. 18th ed. 29. But the words spoken in this case go further. They charge against the plaintiff not only a violation of his official oath, but that the decision was erroneous, contrary to all law and evidence, and rendered against the defendant for spite. A decision of this character must necessarily be corrupt and malicious. If made by a justice of the peace in a case of which he had jurisdiction, it would constitute an offense against public justice, for which he would be liable to indictment and removal from office. 4 Bl. Com. 141; Russell, Crimes, 45, 135; People v. Coon, 15 Wend. 277; Gen. Stat. chap. 91, § 8; chap. 9, § 2. The words, therefore, charge not only corruption and a want of integrity against the plaintiff, but also a criminal offense."

And in this case, where the language of the complaint was that the slanderous discourse was "of and concerning the said plaintiff in the execution of his said office of justice of the peace, and of and concerning a decision the plaintiff had then recently made in a suit before him as such justice of the peace, wherein one O. P. Whitcomb was plaintiff and the said defendant was defendant," etc., it was held that the allegations of the complaint imported that the plaintiff as a justice of the peace had jurisdiction of the action mentioned therein, and, as such justice of the peace, had made the decision referred to.

The words, "partial justice," touch a justice of the peace in his office and for them an action lies. Kemp v. Housgoe, Cro. Jac. 90.

And words charging a magistrate with having procured a person to take a false not, they are actionable because spoken of the appellee in respect to an office.

In Williams v. Riddle, 145 Ky. 459, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 974, 140 S. W. 661, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1151, it is said that "in the following cases only were words slanderous, or actionable per se: (1) Words falsely spoken imputing a commission of a crime involving moral turpitude, for which the party might be indicted and punished; (2) words imputing an infectious disease, likely to exclude him from society; (3) words imputing unfitness to perform the duties of an office or employment; (4) words prejudicing him in his profession or trade; (5) words tending to disinherit him. 'In all other cases spoken words are either (a) not actionable at all, or only actionable (b) on proof of special damage.'"

Adopting this definition of actionable words, we think it is apparent that the words charged must come under the first class, or they cannot be treated as actionable. Or, to put it in another way, unless the words spoken impute the commission of a crime involving moral turpitude for which the jurors, including the plaintiff, might be indicted and punished, they do not furnish the basis for a suit for slander, although we are quite sure that, if words were spoken generally of a jury or applied to a jury as a whole that did impute to the jury a violation of § 2256 of the statute, or the commission of some crime involving moral turpitude for which the individual members oath before him touch him in his office, and are actionable. Chetwind v. Meeston, Cro. Jac. 308.

It is actionable to say of a justice of the peace in his official capacity—

—"I have often been with Sir John Isham for justice, but never could get any at his hand but injustice," Isham v. York, Cro. Car. 15; —"that he is 'half-eared' and 'will only hear on one side,'" Masham v. Bridges, Cro. Car. 223;

—"Mr. Hassett did seek my life, and offered 10 shillings to the under sheriff to impanel a special jury that might find me guilty of the felony," Bleverhassett v. Baspoole, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 313;

—"He is forsworn justice, and not fit to sit upon a bench," and no colloquium is needed, for by the words themselves it appears they were spoken of the plaintiff in respect of his office, Carn v. Osgood, 1 Lev. 280;

—"Thou art a false" or "a lewd justice," or "Thou dealest corruptly," or "Thou dost not administer true justice," Wright v. Morehouse, Cro. Eliz. pt. 1, p. 358;

—"that 'he for malice and spleen did many times wrest the law, and prevent justice to serve his own turn,'" Beaumont v. Hastings, Cro. Jac. 240;

—"that he has given secret warning to a person against whom he has issued a warrant, that he might absent himself," Burton v. Tokin, Cro. Jac. 143;

—"He is a knave, a busy knave, for searching after me, and I will make him give me satisfaction for plundering me," Prowse v. Wilcox, 3 Mod. 163;

—"He makes use of the King's commission to worry men out of their estates," Newton v. Stubbs, 3 Mod. 71;

—"Mr. Kent is a rogue," Kent v. Pocock, 2 Strange, 1168; —"that he is a rascal, a villain, and a liar," Aston v. Blagrove, 1 Strange, 617, 2 Ld. Raym. 1369;

—"that he was privy to the theft of a horse," Lassels v. Lassels, F. Moore, 401;

—"that he received money of a thief who was apprehended and brought before him for L.R.A.1915D.

stealing sheep, to let the thief escape and keep him from jail, Marriner v. Cotton, F. Moore, 695. And see Hilliard v. Constable, F. Moore, 418.

It is actionable to say of one who is a justice of the peace, deputy lieutenant of a county, and a candidate for a seat in Parliament, "He is a Jacobite, and for bringing in the Prince of Wales, and Popery, to the destroying of our nation." How v. Prinnee, 2 Ld. Raym. 812.

To sustain an action for words spoken of a magistrate which are not actionable per se, they must appear to have been spoken of him in his official character, and it is not enough that they tend to injure him in his office. Van Tassel v. Capron, 1 Denio, 250, 43 Am. Dec. 667. The court said: "It is the privilege of the vulgar to use coarse and abusive language; and no action will lie for calling a man such opprobrious names as liar, cheat, rascal, swindler, black-leg, and the like. Nor will such words be actionable though spoken of one who holds an office, or exercises some trade or profession, unless they are spoken of and touch him in his office or calling. It is not enough that the words may tend to injure him in his office or calling, unless they are spoken of him in his official or business character."

Calling a magistrate a "damned black-leg," and charging him with being in a "combined company to cheat strangers," is not actionable where no official misconduct or neglect of official duty is alleged against him. Ibid.

Charging a magistrate with omitting to give information to a judgment plaintiff in his court, that his execution has not been returned in time, and that therefore he has a right of action against the constable, where it is not charged that he possessed such information, or was requested to make it, imputes no neglect of official duty, and is not actionable. Ibid.

Speaking of a magistrate as "squire" in using opprobrious words concerning him is mere descriptio personae, and does not import that the words are spoken of him in respect of office. Ibid. It means no more, the court said, than would be signified by the might be indicted and punished, an action would lie by any member of the jury, although no one of them was designated by name in the spoken words. Levert v. Daily States Pub. Co. 123 La. 594, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 131 Am. St. Rep. 356, 49 So. 206; Palmerlee v. Nottage, 119 Minn. 351, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 870, 138 N. W. 312; Lathrop v. Sundberg, 55 Wash. 144, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 381, 104 Pac. 176.

The substance of the words spoken is that the jury in the Allegheny Coke Company Case returned a verdict which they knew to be wrong. But these words, however reprehensible, did not impute to the jury the commission of any offense for which they might be indicted and punished. So far as we are advised, except in the instance we will presently point out, a juror cannot be subjected to punishment for any use of the plaintiff's baptismal name in the same place.

The words, "Squire Oakley is a damned rogue," spoken of a magistrate not in his official capacity, are not actionable. Oakley v. Farrington, 1 Johns. Cas. 129, 1 Am. Dec. 107.

And see Lindsey v. Smith, 7 Johns. 359, where the words charged the magistrate with having been "feed," and stated that defendant "could do nothing when the magistrate was in that way against him."

Holding that the words, "He, one of our little Chowan justices of the peace, was taken up a few nights ago playing cards with negro Quomana, in a rookery box, and committed to jail, and remained there until next day 9 or 10 o'clock, and then was turned out and split for the country," were not actionable, the court in McGuire v. Blair, 4 N. C. (2 Car. Law Repos. 443) said: "The words stated in the declaration to have been spoken by the defendant are not in themselves actionable, as they impute no crime which, if true, would subject the plaintiff to infamous punishment. And it is not charged in the declaration that the plaintiff was a justice, or that they were spoken of him in relation to his office. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendant."

Calling a justice of the peace "a basket justice" was held not actionable in Kemp v. Housgoe, Cro. Jac. 90, on the ground that "one may take presents of victuals without offense."

In Hollis v. Briscow, Cro. Jac. 58, it was held not actionable to say of a magistrate that he "is a rascally villain and keeps a company of thieves and traitors to do mischief," as, it seems, the words were subject to a favorable or reasonable construction.

Gross incompetency in a magistrate is not of itself evidence of official corruption or personal depravity; and when this fact alone appears, unaccompanied by any circumstances indicating an improper motive, no inference can be drawn that the magistrate decision he may render. He is not answerable to any other tribunal for his finding, and the motives that influenced him cannot be made the subject of a criminal investigation. 1 Bishop, New Crim. Law, § 462; Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282.

It is, however, provided in § 2256 of the Kentucky Statutes that "if a juror in any case shall take or agree to take anything, directly or indirectly, to give or refrain from giving his verdict, or shall, from favoritism or corrupt partiality, give or refrain from giving his verdict, and shall be thereof convicted, such juror shall not thereafter serve on any jury, and shall be fined $100 and a sum equal to ten times the amount received or agreed to be received."

If, therefore, the words spoken had charged this jury with having taken or agreed to take anything, directly or in-

was an accomplice in crime, or guilty of corrupt misconduct in office. Quinn v. Scott, 22 Minn. 456, which was an action for slander of a magistrate, with the following words set forth in the complaint with proper innuendoes: "There is no use bringing any horse thieves to this town, for the justice is in the ring just as bad as any of them. I believe Quinn belongs to the gang of thieves. The justice is in the gang and interested with them," etc.

An action for slander does not lie for words charging a justice of the peace with partiality and corruption in trying a cause over which he has no jurisdiction. Oram v. Franklin, 5 Blackf. 42. Such language does not defame him as an officer, for he is not acting within his office.

To a declaration in slander charging that alleged slanderous words were spoken of the plaintiff in his office of justice of the peace, a plea in justification is insufficient which merely states that the defendant believed the words to be true, when from their nature he must have known whether they were true or false. Smith v. Johnson, 69 Vt. 231, 39 Atl. 198.

Juror—libel.

Words published in a newspaper tending to impeach the honesty and integrity of jurors in their office are libelous. Byers v. Martin, 2 Colo. 605, 25 Am. Rep. 755.

A publication denouncing a verdict as infamous, and declaring that "we cannot express the contempt which should be felt for these twelve men, who have thus not only offended public opinion, but have done injustice to their own oaths," was held in Byers v. Martin, supra, to be directed against the jurors individually.

And it cannot be claimed that such publication affects only the verdict of the jury, or that it is directed against the jury as a body or class of men. Ibid.

A publication charging that one acted corruptly as a juror, and perjured himself, is directly, to give a verdict, or that its verdict was given from corrupt favoritism or corrupt partiality, then they would be actionable, as imputing moral turpitude involving an offense for which the members of the jury might be indicted and punished. But we do not think the words spoken can be fairly construed into a charge that the jury was guilty of the offense described in this statute. The petition avers that the appellee meant to, and did, charge the plaintiff, as one of the jury, with the crime of perjury, and it is argued that the meaning of the words spoken was that the plaintiff and the other members of the jury had committed the crime of perjury by violating the oath they had taken to try the issues joined and a true verdict render, by returning a verdict that they knew to be wrong. But it does not aver that ap-pellee, by the use of the words spoken, intended to charge that the jury was influenced by corrupt favoritism, or by corrupt partiality, to give the verdict, although it would seem to be a more reasonable inference from the words spoken that the speaker had in mind to charge the jury with corrupt favoritism or partiality rather than with the commission of the crime of perjury.

But, however this may be, the meaning of the words spoken cannot, of course, be enlarged by innuendo. Moore v. Johnson, 147 Ky. 584, 144 S. W. 765. The words are to be taken in their usual and ordinary acceptation, and, so treating them, we do not think they can be construed as either charging perjury or corrupt favoritism or corrupt partiality. If the jury returned a verdict they knew to be wrong, they, of libelous per se. McIntyre v. Bransford, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 454, 17 S. W. 359.

To charge that members of a jury have perjured themselves in rendering a certain verdict is libelous. Welch v. Tribune Pub. Co. 83 Mich. 661, 11 L.R.A. 233, 21 Am. St. Rep. 629, 47 N. W. 562.

A false and wilful publication concerning a juror, to the effect that he was guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury in answering certain questions put to him touching his qualifications as juror, is not privileged. Rosenberg v. Nesbitt, 14 N. Y. S. R. 248. Such being the case, and the defendants being volunteers in the legal proceedings, the circumstance that the libel was contained in an affidavit in such proceedings is unimportant. Ibid.

—slander.

The decision in SMALLWOOD v. YORK, that to charge a juror with returning a verdict which he knew to be wrong is not slanderous per se, receives some support from the holding in McAnally v. Williams, 3 Sneed, 26, where applying the principle that words, to be actionable in themselves, must contain a distinct imputation of some crime or misdemeanor which, by law, is indictable, it was held not actionable to charge a grand juror with having sworn himself in not having presented a criminal offense of which he had knowledge. The court said: "It is true that the oath of a grand juror imposes upon him an obligation to make presentment of all such criminal offenses within his knowledge as are cognizable by the court. The neglect or refusal to do so is highly immoral and censurable; but we are not aware of any principle or authority upon which it can be held to constitute legal perjury. The present action cannot, therefore, be maintained upon the assumption that the words import a charge of felony. Nor can we concur with the counsel for the defendant in error, that the action is maintainable upon the ground that the words impute a high misdemeanor. It has been recently held by this court (vide Smith v. Smith, 2 Sneed, 473), that word imputing a high misdemeanor, involving moral turpitude, and subjecting the party to an indictment, are in themselves actionable. But no authority has been adduced to establish that the failure or refusal of a grand juror to present an offense within his knowledge is an indictable offense."

In an action for slander the complaint contained the following allegations: "That on the 6th day of October, A. D. 1903, at Minneapolis, Minnesota, the defendant, in a certain discourse which he then and there had with one Michael Breslauer, in the presence and hearing of said Breslauer and others, falsely and maliciously spoke and published of and concerning the plaintiff the false, malicious, and defamatory words following, to wit: 'Quist came to my office, shut the door, and came down with his hand, and said: "I have got the boys (meaning thereby certain persons, some of whom had been, and some of whom were at said time, members of the city council of the city of Minneapolis), and I want you to get me five thousand dollars ($5,000). You can get it from Cal. Goodrich and the Electric Light Company. I must have it, or I will fix them (said persons meaning)." And plaintiff alleges that in and by said false, malicious, and defamatory words defendant intended thereby to charge, and was understood to charge, this plaintiff with the crime of asking this defendant for a bribe of $5,000, with the understanding that, unless said sum of $5,000 was procured by defendant and paid over to plaintiff, he (plaintiff) would, as foreman of said grand jury, use his efforts to induce said grand jury to return indictments against said persons." Closing, the complaint alleges that the words spoken were false and defamatory, and prays for damages. The complaint was held to state a cause of action. Quist v. Kitchel, 92 Minn. 160, 99 N. W. 642. W. W. A.

course, committed an offense against the administration of justice and did a wrong to the Allegheny Coke Company. But this wrong they might have done without being guilty of perjury or being influenced by corrupt favoritism or partiality for Massy. And so we think the words spoken are not actionable per se.

It is, however, insisted that, although the words may not be actionable per se, they are actionable because spoken of the appellant in respect to an office; and the attempt, therefore, is made to bring the words within the class that makes it actionable to impute unfitness to perform the duties of an office or employment. But we think the position of a juror is not an office or employment within the meaning of these words as employed in the quotation from Williams v. Riddle. The words, "employment, profession, or trade," mean some business, employment, profession, or trade in which the complaining party is engaged, and in the conduct of which he has sustained some injury on account of the slanderous words; and the word "office" means some public position with honors, emoluments, or profits, the enjoyment of which may be affected by the words, and a juror does not hold such an office as this. His duties are transitory and subject to be terminated at any time. He is merely selected out of the body of the people for the purpose of discharging, at the will of the court, responsible and honorable public duties that the state has a right to call upon its citizens to perform. He is for the time being an officer of the court, but holds no office or employment that could be affected in a pecuniary way by slanderous words. Townshend, Slander & Libel, pp. 287, 311; Newell, Slander & Libel, p. 168.

In Byers v. Martin, 2 Colo. 605, 25 Am. Rep. 755, the court held that an action for libel might be maintained by a juror against a newspaper that, in the course of an article commenting on a trial, said: "We are not a little surprised at Judge Wells' lenient charge in the case. We are still more so at the infamous verdict of this jury. . . . We cannot express the contempt which should be felt for these twelve men, who have thus not only offended public opinion, but have done injustice to their own oaths,"—saying that the words were actionable under the statute defining libel, "as well as upon general principles, as words spoken of one in the execution of his office."

While not inclined to agree with the conclusion of the court that the words were actionable because written of the juror in connection with his office, their actionable character might safely be put upon the L.R.A.1915D.

ground that they were libelous, as many words that would be sufficient to furnish the basis of an action for libel would not sustain an action for slander.

In Riley v. Lee, 88 Ky. 603, 21 Am. St. Rep. 358, 11 S. W. 713, the general rule upon the subject of libelous words is thus stated: "So it may be regarded as thoroughly settled that if the written or printed publication tends to degrade the person about whom it is written or printed, that is, if it tends to reduce his character or reputation in the estimation of his friends or acquaintances or the public, from a higher to a lower grade; or if it tends to disgrace him, that is, if it tends to deprive him of the favor and esteem of his friends or acquaintances or the public, or tends to render him odious, ridiculous, or contemptible in the estimation of his friends or acquaintances or the public,—it is per se actionable libel."

And so, if these words had been written and published concerning the jury, we think they would clearly be libelous on the complaint of any of the jury. But spoken words are only actionable per se when "they clearly and unequivocally import that the person accused is guilty of some felony or other crime of such turpitude as to render him liable upon indictment to some infamous punishment." Moore v. Johnson, 147 Ky. 584, 144 S. W. 765. And, as we have seen, the words spoken do not come within the scope of this definition, and therefore cannot be made the basis of an action for slander.

The judgment is affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

TRUSTEES OF UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI, Appts.,

v.

W. P. WAUGH.

(105 Miss. 623, 62 So. 327.)

Schools — right in legislature to prohibit fraternities.

1. A legislature which has power to create and abolish institutions of learning to be supported by the state has authority

Note. — Forbidding student's affiliation with secret society.

This question was considered in Wayland v. School Directors, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352, and note thereto.

There has been so much agitation in recent years against Greek letter fraternities, especially in the public schools, that boards of education in many cities have adopted rules and regulations with reference to to forbid the existence of Greek letter fraternities in such institutions, and deprive members in them of the right to receive honors or diplomas from such institution.

Injunction — against expulsion of Greek letter fraternities — admission of moral qualities — effect.

2. Admission that Greek letter fraternities are moral agents will not sustain an injunction against trustees of a state institution to prevent their exclusion therefrom, if their existence is prohibited by statute.

Statute — sufficiency of title — question for legislature.

3. The question of the sufficiency of the title of a statute is for the legislature, and not for the courts, to determine.

Constitutional law — departments of government — excluding fraternities from schools.

4. The constitutional provision distribut-them, and laws have been enacted in many states, either absolutely forbidding them, or placing them under control. Questions which may arise with reference to secret fraternities in schools and colleges are: (1) The power of educational institutions supported by the state to exclude pupils who are members of a fraternity or refuse to pledge themselves not to become members; (2) the power of educational institutions supported by the state to debar members of fraternities from participating in certain privileges; (3) the power of an incorporated college or university privately endowed to forbid students to join fraternities; (4) the constitutionality of statutes forbidding membership in fraternal societies connected with schools or colleges.

The power of educational institutions supported by the state to exclude members of secret fraternities was denied in State ex rel. Stallard v. White, 82 Ind. 278, 42 Am. Rep. 496 (set out in the note to Wayland v. School Directory, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352). This case distinguished People ex rel. Pratt v. Wheaton College, infra, which upheld the validity of such action, as being a case involving an action by a privately endowed college.

On the other hand, the power of such institutions to debar members of secret fraternities from participating in special privileges was upheld in Wayland v. School Directors, 43 Wash. 441, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352, 86 Pac. 642, as not being a denial of a natural right, or an unlawful discrimination against them. And to the same effect are Wilson v. Board of Education, 233 Ill. 464, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1136, 84 N. E. 697, 13 Ann. Cas. 330, citing with approval the Wayland Case, supra, and Favorite v. Board of Education, 235 Ill. 314, 85 N. E. 402, which followed as authority, without discussion, the Wilson Case, supra.

And the power of an incorporated college privately endowed to forbid students to join secret fraternities was upheld in People ex rel. Pratt v. Wheaton College, 40 L.R.A.1915D.

ing the power of government into departments is not violated by a statute excluding Greek letter fraternities from state schools.

School — prohibition of Greek letter fraternities — interference with constitutional rights.

5. No constitutional privileges or property rights are denied by making renunciation of allegiance to Greek letter fraternities a condition to becoming students in schools supported by the state.

State university — right to prohibit affiliation with Greek letter fraternities.

6. The trustees of a state university may, under legislative authority, prohibit persons desiring to become students in that institution from holding allegiance to any Greek letter fraternity wherever it may be located.

Ill. 186 (cited in note in 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352).

The constitutionality of a statute forbidding the pupils of public schools to join secret fraternities connected with the schools was considered in Bradford v. Board of Education, 18 Cal. App. 19, 121 Pac. 929. This was an action to compel the reinstatement of a girl student in the high school, who was expelled because of membership in a Greek letter sorority. The expulsion was by virtue of the following statute:

"Section 1. From and after the passage of this act, it shall be unlawful for any pupil, enrolled as such in any elementary or secondary school of this state, to join or become a member of any secret fraternity, sorority, or club, wholly or partly formed from the membership of pupils attending such public schools, or to take part in the organization or formation of any such fraternity, sorority, or secret club; provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent anyone subject to the provisions of the section from joining the order of the Native Sons of the Golden West, Native Daughters of the Golden West, Foresters of America, or other kindred organizations not directly associated with the public schools of the state.

"Section 2. Boards of school trustees and boards of education shall have full power and authority to enforce the provisions of this act, and to make and enforce all rules and regulations needful for the government and discipline of the schools under their charge. They are hereby required to enforce the provisions of this act by suspending, or, if necessary, expelling a pupil in any elementary or secondary school who refuses or neglects to obey any or all such rules and regulations."

It was contended that the above statute was unconstitutional for the reasons, first, that it contravened the section of the Constitution providing that no citizen or class of citizens shall be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Lafayette County in plaintiff's favor in a proceeding to enjoin the enforcement of a suit excluding fraternities from the state university. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William C. McLean for appellants.

Messrs. A. F. Fox and W. G. Cavett for appellee.

Mayes, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The legislature of 1912 passed an act entitled "An Act to Abolish and Prohibit Greek Letter Fraternities and Sororities and All Secret Orders among Students in the University of Mississippi and in All Other Educational Institutions Supported, in Whole or in Part, by the State, Providing Penalties for Any Trustee, Teacher, or Other Officer Connected with the Institution for Failure or Refusal to Enforce the Provisions of This Act, Providing Penalty shall not be granted to all citizens; second, that it contravened the provision of the Constitution providing that the legislature shall not pass local or special laws granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity; third, that it did not conform to the section of the Constitution which provides that every act shall embrace but one subject, which shall be expressed in its title; and, fourth, that it was repugnant to the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution because it deprived a citizen of the right to attend a public school of the state. And in denying the first contention, the court stated: "It is argued by counsel that this contravention of constitutional provisions arises because the act grants an immunity to certain pupils in the public schools of the state, viz., those in the normal schools, in that only the elementary and secondary schools come within the provisions of the act; that it grants a special privilege to such pupils by allowing them to join fraternities, sororities, and secret clubs, while other students in the public schools are punished for doing the same thing; that it grants a privilege and immunity to certain fraternities, viz., the order of the Native Sons of the Golden West, the Native Daughters of the Golden West, the Foresters of America, and other kindred organizations not directly associated with the public schools, because pupils in said schools may join such societies, and not come within the inhibition of the act. . . . It is quite apparent to us that the younger and more immature pupils of the public schools may quite properly form a class and be made the subject of this character of legislation. Normal schools and colleges are attended by students who are preparing for the serious affairs of life; and, being older in years L.R.A.1915D.

for Any Student Who Knowingly Violates the Provisions of This Act," etc. See chap. 177, p. 192, Laws of 1912. For purposes of decision we deem it unnecessary to set out the act in full. We shall content ourselves with setting out in this opinion only the particular sections of the act which are involved in this controversy. These sections are 1, 2, 3, and 4.

By § 1, it is provided that the fraternities and sororities, or Greek letter societies known as "Delta Kappa Epsilon," etc., and all other secret orders, chapters, fraternities, sororities, societies, and organizations, of whatever name, or without a name, of similar name and purpose, among students are hereby abolished, and further prohibited to exist in the University of Mississippi and in all other educational institutions supported, in whole or in part, by the state. Section 2 provides that no student in the university, or in any other educational institution supported, in whole or in part, by the state, who is a member and with wider experience, are better fortified to withstand any possible hurtful influence attendant upon membership in secret societies and clubs, than the younger pupils attending elementary and secondary schools, who are less experienced and more impressionable. We have no doubt that there is a sufficient difference between these last-mentioned schools and the normal to constitute a proper basis for classification, and that the statute applies equally to all of the particular class mentioned." And so, also, in denying the second contention, the court said: "Neither does the exception in the statute of the order of the Native Sons of the Golden West and similar fraternal societies constitute, in our opinion, an invalid discrimination. The act itself requires that they be not 'directly associated with the public schools of the state.' It is clear that the legislature intended to discountenance only secret societies in the elementary and secondary schools which are formed almost entirely of the pupils of such schools, and which, in the opinion of the legislature, were calculated to diminish the efficiency of the educational system of the state, and exert a harmful influence upon the younger pupils of its schools as such. No such deleterious effect has been or could be attributed to the occasional membership of such pupils in the fraternal orders excepted in the statute, and such exception, therefore, cannot be said to be arbitrary or invalid." And in denying the third contention the court said: "It will be observed that the title of the act states that it is an act to prohibit the formation and existence of 'secret, oath-bound fraternities in the public schools,' while the body of the act forbids the formation and existence of 'secret fraternities, sororities, or clubs.' Basing her argument upon this difference of language, of any of the orders, chapters, fraternities, sororities, societies, and organizations hereby prohibited, shall be permitted to receive any class honors, diplomas, or distinctions conferred by the institution of which he is a student, nor to compete nor contend for any prize or medal offered by his respective school, or by any association or individual. But any student who is a member of any of the orders, chapters, fraternities, sororities, societies, or organizations aforesaid may, upon entrance to any of the aforesaid schools, file with the chancellor, president, or superintendent, as the case may be, an agreement in writing that he will not, during his attendance at said school, affiliate with same, nor attend their meetings, nor in any wise contribute any dues or donations to them, and thereafter, so long as such agreement is complied with in good faith, such student shall not be subjected to the restrictions created by this section. Section 3 commands that the act shall be enforced by the trustees and faculties by such rules and punishments as they may prescribe. Section 4 provides that any member of the board of trustees or faculty, or other officer connected with any educational institution supported, in whole or in part, by the state, who shall knowingly permit any violation of this act, and shall fail or refuse to take proper steps to enforce this act, shall be removed from such position by the governor.

Let it be here noted that the enforcement of this act is imposed upon the trustees and faculties of the educational institutions of the state, and they are required to do it by such rules and punishments as they may prescribe. Let it further be noted that § 4 emphasizes the duty of the trustees and faculties to enforce the act by providing that, if they fail or refuse to take proper steps to enforce it, they shall be removed from their positions by the governor. When the above act is read, it discloses the fact that in its passage the legislature had two purposes in view. The

it is the contention of appellant that the act is broader in its scope than the title, for the reasons, first, that the expression 'secret fraternities' is broader than 'secret, oath-bound fraternities;' and, second, that the title mentions only fraternities, whereas the body of the act deals also with sororities and clubs. In order that a fraternity may be secret, a promise or an agreement must be made by its members not to reveal its proceedings or secret work, and as to various other matters, which undertaking is doubtless invariably in the form of a pledge, an obligation, or of a nonjudicial oath. As here used, the compound word 'oath-bound' is synonymous with the word 'secret.' We have no doubt that this is the sense in which the term was employed by the legislature. . . . We think, also, that the word 'fraternities' in its popular sense and as here used includes organizations of both sexes, sororities, and clubs. In this state our Codes contain sections declaring that 'words used in the masculine gender include the feminine.' While such sections apply specifically to the Codes alone, they emphasize the fact that in the enactment of laws the legislature frequently employs the masculine gender in matters where it is evident that the feminine is not excluded. Even if the word 'fraternity' could be said to mean an organization of males only, it might still be apparent from the context that it was used in a sense to include the opposite sex also. But without resorting to any such latitude of construction, the word itself has a broader signification." Also in denying the fourth contention, the court said that the system of public schools in this state is a state institution, and is subject to exclusive control of the constitutional authorities of the state. It is, of course, true that the right of attending a public school is capable L.R.A.1915D.

of enforcement at law, but it is not such a right as is guaranteed by the provision of the Federal Constitution that no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States.

The judgment of the court in UNIVERSITY OF MISSISSIPPI v. WAUGH, that a statute excluding Greek letter fraternities from state educational institutions is constitutional, has been affirmed in 237 U. S. 589, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720, and so the question of the power of the legislature to exclude Greek letter fraternities from state educational institutions under its control is finally settled, at least so far as such a statute being in violation of the U. S. Const. 14th Amend. is concerned.

In affirming the judgment it was held that the state may require a member of a chapter of a Greek letter fraternity at another college to renounce his allegiance to and affiliation with such fraternity before admitting him as a student to any educational institution supported by the state without denying him due process of law or privileges, and immunities as a citizen of the United States under U. S. Const. 14th Amend. although the fraternity to which he belongs may be a moral and of itself a disciplinary force.

Also that a state statute prohibiting the existence of Greek letter fraternities and similar societies in the state's educational institutions, and depriving members in them of the right to receive or compete for diplomas, class honors, prizes or medals does not deny the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the U. S. Const. 14th Amend. because it is construed by the officials charged with its enforcement not to apply "to students already entered, and who conduct themselves with that decorum always expected of southern gentlemen." J. H. B.

primary purpose was to prohibit the existence of any secret society at the University of Mississippi, or any other educational institution supported by the state. Its second purpose is to prohibit any student in any of the above institutions continuing to hold membership in any secret society, or affiliating with same in any way, after admission to the educational institutions of the state, from receiving any class honors, diplomas, distinctions, etc., or for competing for any prize or medal at any of such institutions, unless the student will file with the chancellor, president, or superintendent an agreement that he will not, during his attendance at any such school, affiliate with any of the prohibited secret societies, nor attend any of their meetings, nor contribute in dues or donations while he is a student at any of the educational institutions above named.

The enforcement of the act is committed to the rules prescribed by the trustees and faculties, and it is made their imperative duty, under penalty of removal from office, to see that the act is enforced. In order to carry out the duty which the legislature imposed upon them of enforcing the act, the trustees, by an order placed upon their minutes at the September meeting in 1912, made it a condition precedent to the right of any student to enter the University that each student making an application for admission should be required to sign the following statement: "I hereby state and affirm upon my honor that I am not now pledged to become a member of any of the Greek letter fraternities, societies, or sororities named in the senate bill 227 of the Laws of Mississippi, 1912, pages 192 and 193, chapter 177, and that I have not become a member of any of said fraternities, sororities, or societies within the sixty days preceding the opening of the session of 1912-13. I further pledge and promise not to join any such organizations while I am a student of the University, and that I will not aid or abet or encourage the organization or perpetuation of any such orders or societies while I am a student of the University. I further promise and pledge that I will not apply for nor accept any scholarship or medal, or in any way be the beneficiary of any student's self-help fund, or accept any position in the University while I am a student therein, if I fail to keep or violate any of the provisions of the foregoing pledge. I furthermore promise and pledge to regard this obligation as binding between the sessions of 1912-13 and 1913-14, and that it shall be my purpose and constant endeavor to so act that no word or deed of mine could be even remotely construed as being violative to the letter and the spirit of what is known as the 'anti-fraternity bill,' passed by the last legislature and approved by the governor February 27, 1912."

When the order of the trustees is examined, it is readily seen that the pledge which the student is required to sign is nothing more than that he will comply with the act of the legislature while he is in the institution. If the statute is constitutional, it occurs to us that the trustees adopted the only practicable way they could of enforcing the act of the legislature. The act is a mere disciplinary regulation. It was the judgment of the legislature that all secret orders were detrimental to the welfare of the educational institutions of the state. These educational institutions are under the control of the legislature. It had the power to create and abolish them, and, having the power to create and abolish, it had the power to regulate; and when the legislature has passed a law disciplinary in its nature, controlling and regulating any subject which it considered to be inimical to the welfare of the institution, it is certainly not within the power of any court to super-vise the wisdom of legislative acts and declare its acts unenforceable, merely because it might be the view of the court that the act was unwise and unnecessary. All acts of a legislature are valid unless they conflict with the Constitution of the state or United States, and the acts of the legislature are to be upheld by the courts, unless it is plainly apparent that they conflict with the organic law, after solving all doubts in favor of the validity of the law. Announcing this rule of construction as our guide, a rule that has been repeatedly announced by this court, we proceed to discuss further the act of the legislature under review, and the order of the trustees passed in pursuance of the act.

It appears from the complaint that some time after the legislature passed the law, and after the board of trustees, in order to carry out the act of the legislature, had passed the above order requiring this pledge to be taken, the complainant made application for admission to the university, and was declined admittance because he refused to sign the pledge which the trustees said he should sign before he could enter the university. When this was done complainant made application to the chancery court of Lafayette county for an injunction against the board of trustees of the University of Mississippi, asking that the court enjoin them from enforcing the order and require them to refrain from requiring him to sign the pledge incorporated in the application for admission to the university as a student, and prayed, further, that upon final hearing the act of the legislature in question be declared unconstitutional, as being in conflict with both the Constitution of the United States and the Constitution of the state of Mississippi, and that the order of the board be declared to be unreasonable, and ultra vires, etc. The application for the injunction sets out the fact that the University of Mississippi was incorporated in 1844, and states many features of the incorporating act, which we deem unnecessary to rehearse here. The complaint then sets out the act of the legislature in full, and alleges that the complainant is now, and has been for several years, a member of what is known as the Kappa Sigma fraternity, and is affiliated and identified with the chapter at Millsaps College; that the Kappa Sigma fraternity is one of the fraternities in the above-recited act. The complaint then sets out the order of the board of trustees, and alleges that in November, 1912, he applied to the chancellor of the university for admission as a student, and that the chancellor presented him with the pledge required to be signed by students desiring to enter the university, and requested him to sign as a prerequisite to admission as a student to the university; that complainant refused to do this, and the chancellor thereupon refused to admit him as a student in the university; and that the refusal was based alone upon the ground that complainant refused to sign the pledge. Complainant then alleges that he has never been a member of, nor has he affiliated with, or paid dues to, any chapter of any so-called Greek letter fraternity organized among the student body of the university. Complainant then alleges that he is affiliated with and pays dues to, the chapter of the Kappa Sigma fraternity at Millsaps College, and alleges that if he is admitted as a student at the university it is not his intention or purpose to encourage the organization, continuance, or maintenance of any Greek letter fraternity in the University of Mississippi, or to affiliate or pay dues to, or in any way support or encourage any such organization at the university, or be connected with any sort of active work, or meeting with any fraternity in the university. He then alleges that the act of the legislature is in conflict with the Constitution of the state of Mississippi and the Constitution of the United States; that it violates § 71 of the Constitution of the state, in that the title is not sufficient; that the act is further violative of §§ 1 and 2 of the Constitution of the state of Mississippi, in that under the charter of the University and all statutes relating to it the government and discipline of the university, and the control of its students, is delegated to a board of trustees, and that such control is an executive, and not a legislative, function; that under § 2 of the Constitution of the state all power properly belongs to the board of trustees, and the legislature has no control over it; that as a citizen of the United States and the state of Mississippi, within the jurisdiction of the state, under the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, he is entitled to the protection of life, liberty, and property, and the pursuit of happiness, and entitled to the equal protection of the law, and that the above act of the legislature and the regulations of the board of trustees of the University of Mississippi, refusing him admission to the university, deprives him of his property, property rights, and liberty, and denies him the equal protection of the law. Complainant then proceeds to allege that the fraternity of which he is a member has for its paramount purpose the enforcement and promotion of good morals, the highest possible attainment and standing in class, good order and discipline in the student body of the different colleges with which it is connected, and that § 2 of the act of the legislature is unreasonable, in that it assumes extraterritorial jurisdiction, in prohibiting any member of any fraternity not connected with the university from receiving any class honors, diplomas, distinctions, etc., conferred by the university, and because it prohibits any student of the university from affiliating with or paying dues to, any chapter whatever, wherever situated, although entirely disconnected with the University.

This bill was demurred to on many grounds, but we see no occasion to go beyond the first. The first ground of the demurrer challenges the fact that there is any equity on the face of the bill. We think this challenge brings into review, at once, the whole of this case. Counsel for appellee stress the fact that the demurrer admits all the allegations of the bill, and call the court's attention to the allegations wherein the high moral purposes of the order to which complainant belongs is set out, and argues that, whatever the general result may be, this case is bound to be affirmed, because with these admissions an institution cannot drive out of its halls, even before an act of the legislature, an order that is fruitful of so much good as is claimed for the order to which complainant belongs. But let it also be kept in mind that the court takes judicial knowledge of the law, and reads into every alleged complaint the law of the land, and where the thing complained of, and against which relief is sought, is a thing which the law prohibits the complainant from doing, the court will not grant relief merely because complainant alleges that, if allowed to do the thing which the law says he must not, a great moral good will be accomplished. The allegation of fact amounts to nothing, when it merely shows that a complainant is seeking to disobey the law, no matter how strong the allegation that a great good will be accomplished if allowed to violate the law. We think this ends any discussion as to any admission of fact made by the demurrer.

In answer to that portion of the argument made by counsel for appellee that the act is void because the title is bad, we need only cite the case of Jackson v. State, — Miss. —, 59 So. 873, holding that the sufficiency of the title is a legislative, and not a judicial, question.

A further contention of appellee is that the act of the legislature violates §§ 1 and 2 of the Constitution. We fail to see how the act of the legislature violates either section above named. Section 1 of the Constitution merely provides for the distribution of the powers of government into three distinct departments, and § 2 prohibits any person, or collection of persons, being one or belonging to one of these departments of government, from exercising any powers properly belonging to either of the others. We do not see how either of these sections is invaded by this act. The legislature did nothing but pass a law for the regulation of the educational institutions of the state, and why it may not do so is something that a reading of the sections of the Constitution above referred to does not disclose to us. The trustees are mere instruments to carry out the will of the legislature in regard to the educational institutions of the state. Both the institutions and the trustees are under the absolute control of the legislature. The legislature has the undoubted power to pass a law prohibiting Greek letter fraternities from being organized or carried on at any educational institution in the state. The legislature has the right to say that any student desiring to enter any educational institution of the state shall renounce his allegiance to any Greek letter fraternity, while he is a student in the state institution. The law requires the trustees of the educational institutions of the state to see that this act is enforced, and in order to do this they have a right to exact of any student who desires to enter, as a condition precedent to his entry, that he will promise to obey the statute law of the state, and this is all L.R.A.1915D.

that the trustees have required. If complainant desires to enter the university, all he has to do is to promise obedience to the law of the state, and the doors of the university will be open to him.

But complainant says that by requiring him to sign a pledge to obey the law of the state while he is a student in the educational institutions of the state, and to renounce his allegiance to, and affiliation with, secret societies at other institutions, he is denied a right guaranteed to him by the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. We fail to see any force in this contention. The 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States was never intended to act as an accomplice to any young man who wanted to take advantage of the gratuitous advantages offered the youths to obtain an education, and yet refuse to obey and submit to the disciplinary regulations enacted by the legislature for the welfare of the institutions of learning. The right to attend the educational institutions of the state is not a natural right. It is a gift of civilization, a benefaction of the law. If a person seeks to become a beneficiary of this gift, he must submit to such conditions as the law imposes as a condition precedent to this right. The act in question is not class legislation. It is quite the reverse, and seeks to destroy the possibility of the existence of any class at the educational institutions. No state or Federal Constitution is violated by this act in any way. Complainant is not deprived of any constitutional right, unless complainant can be said to have a constitutional right to breach the discipline of the school and set at naught the laws of the state. If it be true that the board of trustees, or the legislature, have extended the operation of the rule beyond what would seem to be the necessities, they have done it in order to effectuate the purpose of the legislature in prohibiting the existence of Greek letter fraternities at any of the educational institutions in the state. The trustees, and the legislature, both have the right to say that any student who desires to enter the university shall not only promise not to affiliate with any Greek letter fraternity while there, but that he shall not encourage the organization of any Greek letter fraternity elsewhere, by paying dues, etc., while a member of that institution. If this were not true, there might be organized at the university, although the dues were paid elsewhere, as complete a Greek letter fraternity, save the meetings, as if it were organized at the institution. Young men attending the educational institutions of the state, if allowed to hold their memberships in fraternities at other institutions while attending the state institutions, could as effectually carry on their fraternity relation as if an organization existed at the particular place. The legislature knew this, and to make the law effective prohibited all affiliation with secret societies while a student at a state institution.

In the case of Purity Extract & Tonic Co. v. Lynch, 100 Miss. 650, 56 So. 316, the supreme court of this state and of the United States held that the legislature might, in order to make a police regulation effective, press the act beyond the seeming necessities in order to effectuate its purpose. The case of Hobbs v. Germany, 94 Miss. 469, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 983, 49 So. 515, is not a parallel case to this. The trustees in that case were not acting under the power conferred upon them by an act of the legislature. They were not trying to break up any secret orders; but the trustees of the public schools, to which a child has a constitutional right to attend between certain ages, undertook to say that after the child had reached its home it should not be controlled by its own parents, but that they would establish rules that would reach into the fireside and control the child around the hearthstone of its own parents. This court said this could not be done. Many decisions are cited by appellee, but we refuse to follow any decision that would hold this act unconstitutional.

We can see nothing in the act which is violative of any section of the Constitution. Whether the act was a wise one or an unwise one, was a question for the legislature to determine. The legislature is in control of the colleges and universities of the state, and has a right to legislate for their welfare, and to enact measures for their discipline, and to impose the duty upon the trustees of each of these institutions to see that the requirements of the legislature are enforced; and when the legislature has done this, it is not subject to any control by the courts.

The decree of the court below is reversed, the demurrer sustained, and the bill dismissed.

Affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, June 1, 1915, 237 U. S. 589, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT.
(In banc.)

W. B. HAYS, Respt.,
v.

CITY OF POPLAR BLUFF et al., Appts.

(— Mo. —, 173 S. W. 676.)

Municipal corporation — ordinance — fire limits — exceptions.

1. Statutory power to establish limits within which no building composed of combustible material shall be erected does not authorize an ordinance establishing limits within which no such building shall be erected without permission of the mayor and council.

Same — ordinance — void in part.

2. A provision in an ordinance establishing fire limits within which buildings composed of combustible materials cannot be erected, which permits the mayor and council to permit such buildings within the prohibited limits, cannot be eliminated, so as to permit the ordinance to be enforced as an absolute prohibition of such buildings.

Constitutional law — special privileges — permission to erect non-fireproof building.

3. A municipal ordinance prohibiting the erection of buildings composed of combustible materials within certain limits without permission of the mayor and council is unconstitutional as granting special privileges.

Municipal corporations — ordinance — delegation of legislative power.

4. A provision in a municipal ordinance requiring consent of neighboring property owners to the erection of non-fireproof buildings within fire limits is invalid as a delegation of the legislative power of the municipality to such property owners.

Injunction — to prevent the destruction of buildings.

5. Injunction lies to prevent the destruction of buildings under a void municipal ordinance.

(February 9, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wayne County in plaintiff's favor in an action to enjoin defendants from enforcing an ordinance condemning a certain building and to restrain them from destroying such building and interfering with plaintiff's enjoyment of his premises. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

The opinion of the court in division No. 1 is as follows:

Brown, C.:

The petition was filed in the circuit court for Butler county, March 26, 1910, impleading with the city, as defendant, George Luther, its street commissioner. It states that on April 27, 1908, the defendant city, by its city council, granted plaintiff permission to erect a building of wood and iron on the west half of lot 61 in said city, of which he was seised as owner; that on the 20th day of September, 1909, the mayor and council granted him the further permission to construct on said building, which had then been erected, an iron roof, which he constructed in accordance with such permission. The plaintiff's right to erect and maintain the building under the ordinances pleaded, as well as the acquiescence of the city therein, and its continued and present use for business purposes by plaintiff and his tenants, are fully and particularly set forth, and the petition proceeds as follows:

Note. — The validity of statutes or ordinances conferring upon local authorities discretion in granting permits to repair wooden buildings within fire limits is discussed in the note to State v. Lawing, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 64. Generally as to the power of a municipality to require permit to construct or repair building within its limits, see note to Fellows v. Charleston, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 737.

"Plaintiff, however, states that, notwithstanding all of the matters hereinbefore pleaded and set forth, the said city of Poplar Bluff, by and through its duly elected, qualified, and acting mayor and city council, on the 21st day of February, 1910, caused to be passed and enacted, the following ordinance, to wit:

"Ordinance No. 240. Bill No. 264. An ordinance declaring the building located on the west half of lot 61 of the original town (now city) of Poplar Bluff, Missouri, to be a nuisance, and ordering its abatement and removal.

"Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Poplar Bluff, Missouri, as follows:

"Section 1. That the building located on the west half of lot 61 of the original town (now city) of Poplar Bluff, in Butler county, Missouri, be and the same is hereby condemned and ordered abated and removed within ninety days after the service of notice of the passage of this ordinance on the owner, or agent, in charge of said building, for the reason that said building is constructed of combustible material and therefore a nuisance, and was built in violation of §§ 313, 314, and 315 of the revised ordinances of the city of Poplar Bluff, of the revision of 1898, and ordinance No. 24.

"Section 2. That if said building shall not be abated and removed within the time provided in this ordinance the street commissioner of the city of Poplar Bluff is hereby ordered and directed to abate and remove said building, after the lapse of the time provided in this ordinance.

"Section 3. That the owners, or agent in charge of said building, failing to abate and remove said building within the time specified by this ordinance, after notice herein provided for, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not less than $5 nor more than $100 for each offense."

the ordinance is void for lack of power under the city charter to pass it; because the city is estopped to deny the plaintiff's right to maintain the building; because it is in violation of that provision of § 10 of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States, which forbids the states to pass any ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts; also of the 5th and 14th Amendments to the Constitution of the United States; and of §§ 15, 20, 21 and 30 of article 2, and § 53 of article 4, of the Constitution of the state of Missouri. That the building is not constructed of combustible material, nor is it a nuisance, as stated in the ordinance quoted, but, although the ordinance is void, the city and defendant Luther, its street commissioner, are threatening and preparing, under its provisions, to not only tear down said building and destroy said building, but to arrest and prosecute plaintiff under the provisions of the third section thereof, all to his irreparable damage and injury, for which he has no adequate remedy at law. That the building is worth $10,000, and is occupied by tenants of plaintiff engaged therein in lawful and proper lines of business. The prayer is as follows: "Wherefore, plaintiff prays that a writ of injunction issue from this court enjoining and restraining said city of Poplar Bluff and its codefendant, George Luther, the duly appointed, qualified, and acting street commissioner of said city, and all other officers, agents, and employees of said city, from further proceedings to enforce the provisions of said ordinance No. 240 hereinbefore set forth, and from abating, tearing down, removing, or destroying plaintiff's building hereinbefore described, and from trespassing upon or in any wise interfering with plaintiff's enjoyment of his said premises, and from interfering in any manner with the possession or title of plaintiff of, in, or to said lot and tract of land and the building situate thereon, and for such other and further relief as to the court shall seem meet and just."

A preliminary restraining order was granted, and the cause progressed so that on November 3d the defendants filed an amended answer denying each and every allegation not therein expressly admitted, and stating that defendant city is a city of the third class, and as such on March 6, 1890, passed a revision of its ordinances containing the following sections, also set out in the petition:

"Section 313. All that part of the city of Poplar Bluff comprised within the following described boundaries shall be known as the fire limits of said city: Beginning at the northeast corner of lot 21, in the city of Poplar Bluff, Missouri, running thence west with the south boundary line of Oak street to Fifth street; thence south along the east boundary line of Fifth street to Ash street; thence east along the north boundary line of Ash street to the main line of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railroad; thence northeasterly with the St. Louis, Iron Mountain, & Southern Railroad to the western line of Water street; thence north along the west line of Water street to the northeast corner of lot 21, to the place of beginning.

"Section 314. Hereafter it shall be unlawful for any person, without obtaining a special permission from the mayor and city council, to construct, build, or place, or cause to be constructed, built, or placed, any edifice, building structure, or shed, the outer walls of which are in whole or in part made of wood, in that part of the city embraced within the fire limits, as described in the preceding section.

"Section 315. Whenever any person or persons shall desire to construct, build, or place any wooden building within the fire limits of the city of Poplar Bluff as hereinbefore described, such person or persons shall file with the mayor and council an application in writing, setting forth the location, size, and manner of construction of the proposed building, and the purposes for which it is to be used. Such application must be accompanied by the written consent of all persons owning property within the block in which such proposed building is to be erected or placed. Upon the filing of such application and written consent of the property owners aforesaid, the council may, by resolution, authorize the construction or erection of the desired wooden buildings within the said fire limits: Provided, that the names of the members voting for and against said resolution shall be entered on the journal, and a vote of a majority of all the members elected to the council shall be necessary for its passage.

"Section 316. Any person who shall build, construct, or place, or suffer any wooden building to be constructed, built, or placed within the fire limits of the city of Poplar Bluff contrary to the provisions of the preceding sections, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof be fined not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, and a like fine for every week that he shall continue in violation of the said section.

"Section 317. Whenever any wooden building shall be constructed, built, or placed within the fire limits of this city contrary to the provisions of this ordinance, it shall be the duty of the mayor to issue an order requiring the owner, occupant, person in charge, or builder thereof, to cause such building to be taken down or removed outside of the fire limits. If the person so notified shall refuse or neglect for the space of ten days to comply with the requirements of the order issued by the mayor as herein provided, then the mayor shall cause such building to be taken down or removed beyond the fire limits, and the expenses incident thereto may be recovered of the owner of such building by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction."

"Section 342. Whoever shall violate any provision of this ordinance wherein no specified penalty is provided shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than one nor more than one hundred dollars."

Also, an amendment to § 313, passed November 20, 1899, only changing the description of the boundaries.

Whether the property in question was within the original boundaries does not appear in the pleadings, and makes no difference. The answer then proceeds as follows:

"Defendants further state that on the 20th day of April, 1908, and while the above ordinances were in full force and effect, the plaintiff, W. B. Hays, being desirous of erecting a wooden structure which he called an 'air dome' upon the west half of lot 61 in the original town, now city of Poplar Bluff, Missouri, and which said lot was within the fire limits of defendant city, filed with defendant's city clerk the following document, to wit:

"April 6, 1908.

"To the Mayor and City Council.

"Gentlemen:

"We, the undersigned property owners are willing for W. B. Hays to erect an air dome on lot 61—stage to be built of iron.

"[Signed] W. B. Hays; Mrs. J. L. Parham, by W. B. Hays, Agt.; Geo. D. Kirkhoff; W. J. Kennedy; State Bank of P. B., by W. W. Turner, Cashier; J. H. Dates, by E. Bacon, Agt.; Mrs. K. M. Arrendale; Mrs. Etta C. Blatt, by C. E. Kinder, Agt.

"Defendants further state that said plaintiff, W. B. Hays, failed and neglected to file with the mayor or city council an application in writing for permission to erect said wooden structure, setting forth its location, size, and manner of construction, and the purpose for which it was to be used, as required by the ordinances of the defendant city; but, on the contrary, defendants aver that said plaintiff, W. B. Hays, filed no application whatever for said permit other than the document set out in full above, which purports to be the written consent, to the construction of said building, of all persons owning property in the block in which said wooden structure was to be erected, but which in truth and in fact was not signed by all persons owning property in said block and square in which said building was to be erected, but on the contrary was signed by but a small number of the persons who owned property in said block; and defendants aver that the plaintiff at no time filed with the proper officers of the city the 'written consent of all persons owning property in the block in which said proposed building was to be erected' as required by defendant city's ordinances."

It then states, in substance, that the following entry appears upon the journal of the proceedings of the city council as of April 27, 1908: "W. B. Hays presented to the council the consent of all the property owners in lot _____ of the old town, and asks for permission to build an 'air dome.' W. B. Hays now presents to the council the consent of all the property owners in lot 61 of the old town for him to build an 'air dome' on said lot, and now asks permission of the council, which is granted." It is alleged that this entry was made by the clerk without entering the names of members voting for and against it on the journal, without the consent of all the property owners as required by law, and without a vote having been taken thereon as required by law, and in violation of the ordinances of the defendant city in that behalf, and of his duties as city clerk, and that it was void. That after the entry of this order the plaintiff, without the consent of the mayor and city council, and without the consent of all persons owning property in the block, wrongfully, in violation of the city ordinances, and in disregard of the lives and property of the inhabitants, built on said lot a wooden structure, the outer walls of which were made of wood, with a wooden stage, chairs, and benches, a wooden confectionery stand, and other combustible articles too numerous to mention; and afterwards in the same fall, wrongfully and without permission of the city or consent of all the property owners, put in a wooden floor, stretched a tent over it for a roof, and changed the name of the structure to "Tanguay Skating Rink," and operated it as a skating rink until the fall of 1909, when he appeared before the council and deceived it by saying that if it would give him permission to cover the structure with an iron roof he would remove it from the lot the "next spring," and that he intended to use it in the meantime only as a skating rink.

The council once more confided in him, and were again deceived. They were so impressed by his persuasive diction that it did not occur to them to ask him to put it down in black and white, but without any L.R.A.1915D.

written application they proceeded to write upon their journal as follows: "September 20th, 1909. L. & Brandon. On Application of W. B. Hays to permit him to put an iron roof on Tanguay Skating Rink. Permission is granted and carried if the proper petition of property owners is filed. And which said journal entry was recorded upon the record of the council proceedings as follows: 'Building Permit. On motion of Langley and seconded by Brandon. It is ordered by the council that a permit be granted to W. B. Hays to erect and place an iron roof on the Tanguay Skating Rink. Said permission is granted if the proper petition of the property owner is secured and filed before commencing the work.'" This order, the answer states, was obtained by deceit, and is void.

Afterwards, on September 28th, he filed in the office of the city clerk the following:

"To the Honorable Mayor and City Council of the City of Poplar Bluff:

We, the undersigned citizens and property owners, owning property in lots sixty-one (61) and sixty-two (62) of the city of Poplar Bluff, in which is located the Tanguay Skating Rink, hereby petition your honorable body to permit and grant Mr. W. B. Hays, manager of the Tanguay Skating Rink, the privilege of placing upon the Tanguay Skating Rink an iron roof.

[Signed] State Bank of P. B., by W. W. Turner; Etta Goss Blatt; John H. Dates, by E. Bacon, His Agt.; Bacon Realty Co., by E. Bacon, Prest.; Mrs. J. J. Parham, by W. B. Hays, Agt.; C. M. Ducker and Sons; Kate M. Arrendale.

The answer then states that this paper contained the names of only a small portion of the persons owning property in the block, and that its filing conferred no right upon the plaintiff; but, notwithstanding this, the plaintiff proceeded to put on his iron roof, put in permanent wooden partitions, and rented the rooms to divers persons who are conducting in it a saloon, a bowling alley, a billiard and pool room, and a gambling house. As soon as the city learned (so runs the answer) "that said plaintiff intended disobeying his agreement to remove said building, but on the contrary maintaining the same as a permanent structure, to wit, on January 17, 1910, that the proper officers of the defendant city duly passed, and the mayor duly approved," the ordinance we have already copied in connection with the petition, and which constitutes the motive of this action. The answer then proceeds: "Defendants further state that, immediately after the passage and approval of the above ordinance, the defendant city's mayor, John W. Berryman, issued an order on the plaintiff to abate and remove said building, by having served on plaintiff a true copy of the above ordinance, ordering plaintiff to abate said building and to remove the same without the fire limits of the defendant city within ninety days after the passage of said ordinance, but defendants state that the plaintiff, although thereto requested according to law and the ordinances of the defendant city, neglected and refused to remove said building within said time, but stated, averred, and threatened that he intended keeping and maintaining said building on said lot permanently, and still refuses and neglects to remove the same."

The plaintiff replied by general denial. A trial was had and testimony taken which fills about 340 pages of the abstract. It will be unnecessary to examine this. The preliminary injunction was made perpetual.

The defendants, in their joint answer, admit that the city, before the institution of this suit, by ordinance passed and approved February 21, 1910, ordered the plaintiff's building in question to be abated and removed within ninety days after the service of notice of its passage, "for the reason that said building is constructed of combustible material, and therefore a nuisance, and was built in violation of §§ 313, 314, and 315 of the revised ordinances of the city of Poplar Bluff of the revision of 1898, and ordinance No. 24." Also, that it immediately served an order and notice on plaintiff to abate and remove said building "without the fire limits of the defendant city" within ninety days. It has therefore, in the most solemn and effective form in which it can express itself, threatened to enforce the fire-limit ordinance by abating and removing the plaintiff's building; and the street commissioner joins it in a justification of both under the same ordinance. Neither in the pleadings nor in the briefs of their common counsel does he attempt to evade any responsibility assumed by the city, and we cannot make a discrimination in his favor which he does not deign to make for himself. We will therefore consider the case against both as if the city were the only defendant. This brings us at once to the question: Are the provisions of the city ordinance purporting or attempting to establish fire limits for Poplar Bluff, a city of the third class, valid?

In considering such questions, we usually begin with some form of the ancient and indubitable proposition that, under our system of government, municipal corporations possess no powers or faculties not conferred upon them, either expressly or by fair implication, by the law which creates them, or by other statutes applicable to them. As we said in St. Louis v. Dreisoer, L.R.A.1915D.

ner, 243 Mo. 217, 223, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 177, 147 S. W. 998, 999: "'Any fair, reasonable doubt concerning the existence of power is resolved by the courts against the corporation, and the power is denied.' St. Louis v. Bell Teleph. Co. 96 Mo. loc. cit. 623, 2 L.R.A. 278, 9 Am. St. Rep. 370, 10 S. W. 197; Nevada use of Gilfillan v. Eddy, 123 Mo. loc. cit. 557, 27 S. W. 471; Independence v. Cleveland, 167 Mo. 388, 67 S. W. 216."

The power upon which defendants have planted themselves for justification in this case is contained in § 9228 in article 4 of chapter 84 of the Revised Statutes of 1909, relating to cities of the third class, and is as follows: "The council may also provide, by ordinance, limits within which no building shall be constructed except of brick or stone or other incombustible materials, with fireproof roofs, and impose a penalty for the violation of such ordinance, and may cause buildings commenced, put up, or removed into such limit, in violation of such ordinance, to be removed or abated."

That this provision gives ample power to the legislative department of the city government to establish districts in which no building of other than incombustible materials shall be constructed is evident; but to construe it to give power to establish districts in which buildings of combustible or incombustible materials may be constructed, as may be arbitrarily determined by the mayor and council in each particular case, requires us to reject its broadly prohibitive words, thus rendering it meaningless and inoperative, or to add words of permission which would defeat the evident object of the enactment, which is that all persons owning property within the limits established, and the general public as well, should be protected against the menace of combustible structures within such limits. It bears no evidence, as does the ordinance, that the legislature had in mind the idea that each block should stand alone in the matter of such protection, and the record of disastrous fires in cities furnishes no foundation for such a theory. Nor is there any evidence in the act of a legislative notion that those who might have the necessary influence, the "pull," as it is often called in the expressive language of our time, might obtain special permission not open to others, to build combustible structures within the designated limits. It laid down a rule applicable alike to all, of government by law, and not by special privilege or favor. An attempt of the general assembly to authorize the ordinance in question would have been an attempt to confer upon the agent of its own creation a law-making power which the Constitution had expressly withheld from itself. Clause 26 of § 53 of the 4th article of our Constitution forbids the passage by the general assembly of any local or special law granting to any person any special right, privilege, or immunity. It would, of course, be absurd to say that, in the face of this constitutional inhibition, it might, by special law, permit such individuals as it should select from time to time to violate a penal law, and grant them immunity therefor. It would be still more absurd to say that the general assembly could give itself the power to grant such special privileges and immunities by the clumsy subterfuge of inserting in all prohibitive and penal laws a condition that the forbidden act might only be done with its permission expressed by statute. But it would be the most absurd of all to contend that, although the Constitution had withheld from the general assembly the power to pass such laws, that body might give its own agent, the legislative body of a municipal corporation, the power to make them.

It is suggested that although such a condition may be unconstitutional and void, yet the court should simply strike it out, so that in its mutilated condition the ordinance would denounce its penalty against all alike. Thus the court could make an ordinance changing the conditional prohibition of the municipal mayor and council into an absolute one, avoiding the quicksands of the Constitution. The supreme judicial court of Massachusetts answered this proposition in Austin v. Murray, 16 Pick. 121, 126, as follows: "A by-law being entire, if it be void in part, shall be void for the whole. The reason is obvious, for, if a part of a by-law might stand good, while another essential part could not be sustained, the object of the by-law might be defeated, and injurious consequences might follow against the intention of the framers." The by-laws so held to be entire consisted, like this ordinance, of a general prohibition to do a certain thing without the consent of the selectmen.

The mayor and city council of Poplar Bluff, under the charter power we have quoted, undertook to establish fire limits within which they attempted to make it unlawful, without a special permission from the mayor and city council, "to construct any edifice, building, structure, or shed the outer walls of which are in whole or in part made of wood." The combustible character of the structure seems to be entirely ignored. A shed with metal angles or gas pipe for framework and tarred paper for walls and roof would evade the description of the prohibited structures as completely as brick or stone with fireproof roof. But the vice most important in this ordinance is its general scheme by which the city council places its paternal hand upon the interests of the people of the city with the manifest intention of gathering to itself the undefined and arbitrary power to determine who shall have the special privilege of erecting buildings of combustible materials in these areas, and who shall be denied, without being entitled to the courtesy of a reason. This cannot be done. The reason is well expressed by the supreme court of Indiana in Elkhart v. Murray, 165 Ind. 304, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 940, 112 Am. St. Rep. 228, 75 N. E. 593, 6 Ann. Cas. 748, as follows: "If an ordinance upon its face restricts the right of dominion, which the owner might otherwise exercise without question, not according to any uniform rule, but so as to make the absolute enjoyment of his own depend upon the arbitrary will of the city authorities, it is invalid, because it fails to furnish a uniform rule of action and leaves the right of property subject to the will of such authorities, who may exercise it so as to give exclusive profits or privileges to particular persons." The wealth of authority opened by the court in its citations in that case has been of great assistance in the investigation of the subject. This court also, in St. Louis v. Russell, 116 Mo. 248, 257, 20 L.R.A. 721, 22 S. W. 470, 472, held an ordinance of the city of St. Louis invalid "for the reason that by its provisions one citizen is permitted to erect a livery stable in a certain locality by obtaining the written consent of the owners of one half the ground in the block, while another of like merit would not be permitted to do so for the want of such consent." In that case the court cites, with its approval, numerous authorities; among others, Barthet v. New Orleans (C. C.) 24 Fed. 564, in which an ordinance of that city was held invalid which made it unlawful to maintain a slaughterhouse "except permission be granted by the council of the city of New Orleans;" State v. Mahner, 43 La. Ann. 496, 9 So. 480, in which an ordinance forbidding the keeping of more than two cows by any person within certain prescribed limits in the city without a permit from the city council was held void; Richmond v. Dudley, 129 Ind. 112, 13 L.R.A. 587, 28 Am. St. Rep. 180, 28 N. E. 312, in which an ordinance forbidding the storing of inflammable or explosive oils within the limits of the city of Richmond, without the permission of the common council, was held void; State v. Dubarry, 44 La. Ann. 1117, 11 So. 718, in which an ordinance of the city of New Orleans was held void because it prohibited the setting up of any private market without permission of the city council; Newton v. Belger, 143 Mass. 598, 10 N. E. 464, in which an ordinance permitting the board of aldermen to exercise their discretion in granting or refusing permits for the erection of buildings within the fire limits was held invalid; and State v. Tennant, 110 N. C. 609, 612, 15 L.R.A. 423, 28 Am. St. Rep. 715, 14 S. E. 387, in which a like fate befell an ordinance of Asheville, North Carolina, forbidding the erection of a building in the city without having first applied to the aldermen and obtained permission for that purpose. All these cases were decided upon principles stated in Elkhart v. Murray, supra, and repeated by the supreme court of North Carolina in the case last cited, as follows: "If an ordinance is passed by a municipal corporation, which upon its face restricts the right of dominion which the individual might otherwise exercise without question, not according to any general or uniform rule, but so as to make the absolute enjoyment of his own depend upon the arbitrary will of the governing authorities of the town or city, it is unconstitutional and void, because it fails to furnish a uniform rule of action and leaves the right of property subject to the despotism of aldermen, who may exercise it so as to give exclusive profits or privileges to particular persons." The sentence quoted is followed by a long list of authorities to the same effect. The same principle is restated, with a liberal citation of authorities, by this court in St. Louis v. Atlantic Quarry & Constr. Co. 244 Mo. 479, 487, 148 S. W. 948.

Our conclusion is that the ordinance in question is void because it is not within the legislative powers delegated to the city by its charter; because it violates the fundamental principle inherent in our constitutional system that when a municipal corporation seeks by ordinance to restrict for the public good the rights of the individual otherwise incident to the ownership of property, it must do so by a rule applicable to all alike under the same circumstances, and cannot make his enjoyment of his own depend upon the arbitrary will or caprice of the municipal legislature; and because its refusal to consider applications for relief from the enforcement of its prohibitory terms, unless accompanied by the written consent of the property owners of the block, amounts to a delegation of the legislative power of the city to such property owners.

We have considered these questions at greater length than we would otherwise think necessary, because the decision of this court in St. Louis v. Fischer, 167 Mo. 654, 64 L.R.A. 679, 99 Am. St. Rep. 614, 67 S. W. 872, is, we think, inconsistent with the conclusion at which we have now arrived. Although that case is irreconcilable with the Russell Case, supra, in which the learned judge who wrote it concurred, and which brings to its support many well-considered adjudications of this and other courts, it does not overrule nor even mention it. The one case cited in the Fischer Case to the points we have considered is St. Louis & M. River R. Co. v. Kirkwood, 159 Mo. 239, 53 L.R.A. 300, 60 S. W. 110, in which a condition contained in an ordinance of the town of Kirkwood giving a railroad company the right to build and operate its road upon a street was held to be valid. There is evidently no similarity between the two cases. In the Kirkwood Case the town is giving the use of its own street which it may give or withhold to any extent it pleases. In this case the city has nothing to give, but is appropriating the property of the individual to the use of the people through the exercise of the police power of the state, and must look to the grant of that power for the exact limits of its right. So far as the Fischer Case conflicts with the Russell Case, supra, it is disapproved, and the doctrine of the latter, as well as of St. Louis v. Dreisoerner, 243 Mo. 217, 223, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177, 147 S. W. 998, 999, and St. Louis v. Atlantic Quarry & Constr. Co. supra, is approved.

II. There is nothing in the objection that the respondent is not entitled to injunctive relief because he has an adequate remedy at law. The injunction forbids the tearing down of the building, interference with the plaintiff's possession or title to the land and building thereon, and the molesting of plaintiff or his tenants.

Our statute (Rev. Stat. 1909, § 2534) declares, probably in conformity to the rule of the common law, that the remedy by writ of injunction shall exist in all cases where an irreparable injury to real or personal property is threatened, and to prevent the doing of any legal wrong whatever whenever in the opinion of the court an adequate remedy cannot be afforded in damages. One of the most common uses of the writ is to prevent injury to or destruction of property by the unauthorized or wrongful exercise of police powers by municipal corporations. In Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. St. Louis, 98 Mo. 422, 11 S. W. 969, it was successfully used to prevent the destruction of a building by the city in opening or improving a street. In Boyd v. Frankfort, 117 Ky. 199, 213, 111 Am. St. Rep. 240, 77 S. W. 669, 673, it was used to prevent the destruction of a church without the consent of the common council as required by ordinance. The court said: "There can be no doubt of the right of appellants to maintain this action. The law authorizing it has been repeatedly declared by this court. Thus in Newport v.

Newport & C. Bridge Co. 90 Ky. 193, 8 L.R.A. 484, 13 S. W. 720, it was held that "if a city ordinance is invalid, one who is affected by it has the right, in order to prevent irreparable injury and a multiplicity of prosecutions, to go into a court of equity for relief." In Barthet v. New Orleans, supra, in sustaining this remedy, the court said: "It is not enough that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate; or, in other words, as practical and efficient to the ends of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity." The excellence of the equitable remedy in a case like this is that it admits of the doing of complete justice by preserving the status without the destruction or loss of property which must precede and sustain the action for damages. Its selection in such cases is commendable.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the circuit court for Wayne county is affirmed.

The foregoing opinion by Brown, C., is adopted as the opinion of this division. All the judges concur except Bond, J., who dissents. The cause is transferred to the court in banc because it conflicts with the decision in banc of St. Louis v. Fischer, 167 Mo. 654, 64 L.R.A. 679, 99 Am. St. Rep. 614, 67 S. Messrs. N. A. Mozley, Leslie C. Green, and Ernest A. Green, for respondent:

The general ordinances of the city of Poplar Bluff pertaining to fire limits are all void, invalid, in excess of the charter powers of said city of Poplar Bluff, and unconstitutional; therefore, plaintiff was not required to comply with them in erecting the building in controversy, and did not have to secure the consent of the municipality to build the "air dome," as provided by the ordinances of said city.

Even were the general fire-limit ordinances valid and constitutional (as we deny), nevertheless plaintiff has complied with all the provisions thereof, in erecting the air dome, and is therefore entitled to maintain the same.

The injunction was correctly made perpetual, because special ordinance No. 240, condemning the air dome building, under which defendants are acting, is void, invalid, in excess of the charter powers granted to the city of Poplar Bluff, and unconstitutional.

Brown v. Carrollton, 122 Mo. App. 276, 99 S. W. 37; St. Louis v. Edward Heitzberg Packing & Provision Co. 141 Mo. 375, 39 L.R.A. 551, 64 Am. St. Rep. 516, 42 S. W. 954; Rice v. Jefferson, 50 Mo. NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

RE APPLICATION OF JAMES McINTOSH for a Writ of Mandamus against Joseph Johnson, Fire Commissioner, et al., Constituting the Municipal Explosives Commission of the City of New York.

(211 N. Y. 265, 105 N. E. 414.)

Constitutional law — forbidding garage permit — existing buildings.

No constitutional property rights are interfered with, even with respect to existing plants, by forbidding the issuance of any garage permit allowing the storage of volatile inflammable oil, for a building within a prescribed distance of any school, place of public amusement, or assembly, tenement house, or hotel.

(May 5, 1914.)

APPEAL by applicant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming an order of a Special Term, Part I., for New York County, denying an application for a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to issue a garage permit. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Theodore B. Chancellor, with Messrs. Olcott, Gruber, Bonyng, & McManus, for appellant:

The regulation forbidding the granting of a permit for petitioners' garage because it is within 50 feet of a building occupied as a school is an arbitrary and unreasonable enactment; and it is invalid because it deprives him of his liberty and property

Note. — Prohibition or regulation of garages.

This note is limited to public regulations, and does not include restrictive covenants. As to whether garage is within restrictive covenants in conveyances of real estate, see 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 730.

Generally as to regulations for fire protection, other than building regulations, see note to State v. Wittles, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 456.

On storage of oil, gasoline, or gas as nuisance because of explosive or combustible quality, see 52 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930.

The regulation which was upheld in Re McIntosh would seem to be clearly within the police power, even as applied to buildings used as garages before its adoption.

In People ex rel. Busching v. Ericsson, post, 607, a statute empowering the city council to direct the location and regulate the use inter alia of garages within the limits of the city or village was upheld as a legitimate exercise of the police power, that power not being dependent upon the question whether a garage is a nuisance per se; and it was further held that an ordinance declaring it unlawful to construct or maintain any garage within 200 feet of any building used as a hospital, church, or school, or the grounds thereof, or to construct or maintain any garage in any block in which two thirds of the buildings on both sides of the street are used exclusively for residence purposes, or within 100 feet of any such street in any such block, without securing the consent of a majority of the property owners, according to frontage on both sides of the street,—was a reasonable exercise of the power conferred by the statute.

And, in Storer v. Downey, 215 Mass. 273, 102 N. E. 321, it was held that an ordinance providing that "no building shall be erected for or converted to use of a garage unless such use is previously authorized by the board of aldermen" was a valid exercise of the police power on the ground that oil and gasoline which were stored and used in garages were so highly inflammable and explosive that they might increase the danger of fire, no matter how carefully the buildings might be constructed or how non-combustible their materials might be.

In O'Hara v. Nelson, 71 N. J. Eq. 161, 63 Atl. 836, a preliminary injunction was granted, restraining the owner of a public frame garage from filling automobiles with gasoline inside the building, and from storing automobiles filled with gasoline inside the building, where he has a permit for the storage of 1 barrel of gasoline only, and the garage is in close proximity to other frame buildings, including occupied residences. And the injunction was continued upon final hearing (71 N. J. Eq. 629, 63 Atl. 842.)

In People ex rel. Corn Hill Realty Co. v. Stroebel, 209 N. Y. 434, 103 N. E. 736, reversing 156 App. Div. 467, 141 N. Y. Supp. 1014, it was held that an ordinance providing that "no person, firm, or corporation shall hereafter maintain or conduct a public garage for the storing, maintenance, keeping, caring for, or repairing of automobiles or motor vehicles within the city limits without permission of the superintendent of buildings," although forbidding the maintenance of a public garage, did not prohibit the erection of a building which, though adapted to such a use, could be used for other purposes not forbidden, such as the sale of vehicles, automobiles, and without due process of law, and denies to him the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. Terence Farley, with Mr. Frank L. Polk, for respondent:

Under its general powers in relation to public safety, good, and welfare, health, etc., or under an express or implied grant of power for that purpose, a municipality may unquestionably regulate the keeping, using, and selling of explosives, etc., within the corporate limits.

It may also prohibit the location of garages in certain localities.

Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953.

Under its police power, the state or the representative to which it has delegated its authority may regulate or even prohibit the transaction of business in such a manner or place that noise, smoke, dust, odors, and other similar discomforts or dangers result, so as to amount to an injury to the community.

Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 48

motorcycles, especially in the absence of evidence that it was in fact to be used as a public garage. The court remarked that any attempt to limit the right to erect and occupy buildings for the sale of vehicles, automobiles, and motorcycles would be unconstitutional, on the ground that the business of selling such vehicles was as lawful as the sale of groceries or dry goods.

Subsequently to the decision of the Illinois supreme court in People ex rel. Busching v. Ericsson, post, 607, the same court in People ex rel. Keller v. Oak Park, 266 Ill. 365, 107 N. E. 636, upheld the validity of an ordinance rendering it unlawful to construct or maintain a building for a public automobile garage on any street where two thirds of the buildings within a radius of 500 feet are used exclusively for residence purposes, without the written consent of the majority of the property owners according to frontage within such radius, as against objections that the ordinance was void for unreasonableness because it requires the written consent of the owners, even though the garage may be built on a purely business street; because it requires the written consent of an unreasonably large number of property owners; because, by reason of the size of the territory specified, the distinction between a residence street and a business street is wiped out; because property is included that cannot be affected. The court, in considering the objection of unreasonableness because of the size of the area in which the property owners' consent must be obtained, said that, admitting that the territory was large, it did not appear from an inspection of the ordinance itself, nor from the testimony in the record, that the ordinance was such an unreasonable exercise of the power of the city council as to be invalid; and observed in this connection that it was incumbent L.R.A.1915D.

upon the party attacking the ordinance as an unreasonable or oppressive exercise of the police power, to show affirmatively and clearly its unreasonableness.

The further objection that the ordinance was void because it discriminated in favor of those persons engaged in a like business at the time the ordinance became effectual was disposed of on the ground that the ordinance, by its terms, applied as much to the maintenance of a public garage previously established as to the one subsequently sought to be established.

As bearing on the question of reasonableness of the ordinance as applied to the particular case, the report shows that the site of the proposed location of the garage was on the north side and facing Madison street; that there were no residences or other buildings of any kind in that block facing Madison street on that side; that in the block facing that street on the south side and opposite the proposed site were five business buildings and no residences; that north of the proposed site and in the same block and within much less than 500 feet were nine residences, and immediately south of the business buildings on the other side of Madison street and within the 500-foot limit were nine residences, and that other residences east and west of the block referred to were located within the 500-foot limit.

The court in the above case rejected as unreasonable the contention made by the party seeking to establish the garage that only buildings occupied as residences were entitled to be counted as being used for residence purposes, and that private garages and barns used in connection with those residences were to be counted as buildings in determining the proportion of buildings used for residence purposes. Hinckley, 40 Wash. 468, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 398, 82 Pac. 747.

Cuddeback, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Chapter 899, Laws of 1911, authorized the municipal explosives commission of New York city to make regulations for "the better prevention of fires." The act also provided that such regulations when approved by the fire commissioner should constitute a chapter of the Code of Ordinances of the city. Violation of the ordinances is made a misdemeanor.

Pursuant to the statute the following regulations were duly adopted:

"Section 366. It shall be unlawful for any person to store, house, or keep within the city of New York any motor vehicle containing volatile inflammable oil, except in a building, shed, or inclosure, for which a garage permit shall have been issued by the fire commissioner."

"Section 370. No garage permit allowing the storage of volatile inflammable oil shall be issued for any building, shed, or inclosure: (a) Which is situated within fifty (50) feet of the nearest wall of a building occupied as a school, theater, or other place of public amusement or assembly; (b) which is occupied as a tenement house or hotel," etc.

After these regulations became of force, the relator applied for a permit to use as a garage No. 130 West 102d street in the borough of Manhattan, which he held under lease. The relator set forth in his application that he desired to store on the premises mentioned 200 gallons of gasoline, 100 gallons of lubricating oil, 50 gallons of kerosene, and 35 automobiles.

It appears that No. 130 West 102d street, referred to in the application, adjoins on the west public school No. 179. Over 1,700 pupils attend the school, of whom about 700 are under the age of ten years. On the east and adjoining the relator's premises is a five-story tenement house occupied by ten families. In the rear of that another five-story tenement house, occupied by fifteen families, separated from the garage by a court 5 feet wide. There were three fires in the relator's garage between February 1, 1911, and the time of the commencement of this proceeding.

The application for the permit was denied solely on the ground, as it is alleged in the petition, that the relator's premises are situated within 50 feet of the nearest wall of a school building. The relator seeks in this proceeding to compel the defendants to issue the permit applied for. So far he has been unsuccessful.

He challenges the regulation quoted as being in violation of his constitutional rights, because it deprives him of his property without due process of law, and denies to him the equal protection of the law. It seems to me that the regulation is not objectionable on the score stated by the relator. The object sought is the preservation of public safety and the welfare of the community. The enactment is not an arbitrary interference with the rights of the individual, but is a fair, reasonable, and appropriate exercise of the police power. Frank L. Fisher Co. v. Woods, 187 N. Y. 90, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 707, 79 N. E. 836; Rochester v. West, 164 N. Y. 510, 53 L.R.A. 548, 79 Am. St. Rep. 659, 58 N. E. 873. There certainly can be no criticism of the regulation so far as it relates to new establishments of the kind forbidden. Chicago v. Ripley, 249 Ill. 466, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1186, 94 N. E. 931, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 160; Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953.

The relator's main objection to the ordinance is that it is made applicable to a building that had been used as a garage and for the storage of gasoline, lubricating and other oils prior to the time the enactment took effect. The building on the relator's premises was constructed in 1903. The school was built two years before. From the time of its erection the relator's building has been used as a garage by himself or others, and a permit therefor was issued each year under previous regulations until the year 1910. Since that time the business has been carried on without a permit. The relator holds under a lease which has twenty-one years to run at an annual rent of $300. This rent the relator is under obligation to pay, and his allegation is that the building is not available for any kind of business other than a garage. Hence his grievance.

In Tenement House Dept. v. Moesch, 179 N. Y. 325, 330, 70 L.R.A. 704, 103 Am. St. Rep. 910, 72 N. E. 231, 232, 1 Ann. Cas. 439, Id. 203 U. S. 583, 51 L. ed. 328, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781, it was held that a statute requiring sinks and privy vaults in existing tenement houses to be removed, and to be replaced by individual water-closets, was a proper and constitutional exercise of the police power, though the expense of making the necessary changes was very considerable. The court said: "It is a well-recognized principle in the decisions of the state and Federal courts that the citizen holds his property subject not only to the exercise of the right of eminent domain by the state, but also subject to the lawful exercise of the police power by the legislature; in the one case property is taken by condemnation and due compensation; in the other the necessary and reasonable expenses and loss of property in making reasonable changes in existing structures, or in erecting additions thereto, are damnum absque injuria."

In Laurel Hill Cemetery v. San Francisco, 216 U. S. 358, 54 L. ed. 515, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 301, an ordinance prohibiting the burial of the dead within the limits of the city was sustained. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of a cemetery. The land had been dedicated as a burying ground before it was included in the limits of the city. A great number of burial lots had been sold and a large amount of money had been spent by the owners in embellishing the grounds. There remained unsold lots to the estimated value of $75,000. The court said: "The only question that needs to be answered, if not the only one before us, is whether the plaintiff's property is taken contrary to the 14th Amendment."

The answer was that it was not.

In Union Oil Co. v. Portland (D. C.) 198 Fed. 441, the city council had passed an ordinance defining the limits wherein crude petroleum might be stored within the city. The plaintiff purchased land and began the erection of a storage plant for petroleum outside these limits, whereupon the council amended the ordinance so as to bring the plaintiff's property within the restricted territory. The court sustained the ordinance as amended, saying that "the right to exercise the police power is a continuing L.R.A.1915D.

one and private property and business is always subject to a legal exercise thereof."

In Standard Oil Co. v. Danville, 199 Ill. 50, 84 N. E. 1110, an ordinance made it unlawful to keep or store petroleum or explosive oils within 1,000 feet of any dwelling. The court in upholding the ordinance said: "The fact that the greater number of residences, business houses, etc., now within 1,000 feet of the plant of the appellant company were built after the plant had been located at its present site does not entitle the appellant company to insist that it has become vested with the right to continue to operate its plant and keep on storage the inflammable, explosive, and offensive oils, liquids, and substances specified in the ordinance. The health, safety, and comfort of the people are the controlling considerations, and prescriptive rights to endanger either cannot be acquired."

The relator in his brief says that in the city of New York there are 75 garages, some of them valuable structures, which will come within the provisions of the ordinance under consideration if it is declared valid. To my mind that does not furnish an argument against the enactment sufficient to condemn it. The storing of volatile inflammable oil in garages located near buildings wherein people congregate is plainly a dangerous practice. The legislature has authorized the adoption of this ordinance which will stop that practice. In particular instances some loss will follow the enforcement of the ordinance, but it cannot be avoided on that ground. It must be tested with a view to its general purpose and its efficiency to effect that end.

As was said in the Tenement House Case, supra: "It is well settled in this court and in the Supreme Court of the United States that the constitutionality of a statute may be determined by considering its language and the material facts of which the court can take judicial notice. . . . It is not the hardship of the individual case that determines the question, but rather the general scope and effect of the legislation as an exercise of the police power in protecting health and promoting the welfare of the community at large." (p. 330.)

Read in the light of the decisions cited, the regulation of the municipal explosives commission is valid and should be sustained.

The order appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS
EX REL. HENRY BUSCHING, Appt.,
v.

HENRY ERICSSON, City Building Commissioner, et al.

(263 IH. 368, 105 N. E. 315.)

Municipal corporation — power to regulate garages.

1. Power to forbid the construction of a public garage in a city block without the consent of a majority of the property owners is conferred upon a municipal corporation by statutory authority to direct the location and regulate the use and construction of garages, inter alia, within the city limits.

Constitutional law — requirements for operation of garage — validity.

2. The police power extends to the forbidding of the construction of a public garage within a city block without consent of a majority of the owners of property in such block, without depriving the one seeking to do so of any right of liberty or property.

Municipal corporation — ordinance — reasonableness.

3. A police ordinance passed by a municipal corporation under general authority from the legislature, which does not prescribe its details, must be reasonable.

Same — exclusion of garages — authority.

4. Power to direct the location and regulate the use and construction of garages does not authorize a municipal corporation to forbid their location within the city limits.

Same — consent of property owners — reasonableness.

5. Requiring one who desires to operate a public garage in or within 100 feet of a city block in which two thirds of the buildings on both sides of the street are used exclusively for residences, to secure consent from a majority of the property owners, is not unreasonable.

Same — location near church.

6. Forbidding the location of a public garage within 200 feet of a church is not unreasonable.

Parties — who may attack ordinance.

7. The one seeking to locate a public garage near a church cannot attack the ordinance forbidding it because it also forbids such location near a public school without forbidding it near a private one.

denying a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to issue a permit authorizing the erection of a public garage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller, Gorham, & Wales, for appellant:

The city council has no power to prohibit the erection of a garage within certain localities, on the ground that it is a nuisance, when in fact it is not.

People ex rel. Lincoln Ice Co. v. Chicago, 260 Ill. 150, 102 N. E. 1039; Laugel v. Bushnell, 197 Ill. 20, 58 L.R.A. 266, 63 N. E. 1086; People ex rel. Goldberg v. Busse, 240 Ill. 338, 88 N. St. Rep. 323, 86 N. E. 663.

The fact that express power is given the city by statute to regulate the location of garages does not validate this ordinance, as the statute is contrary to the Constitution of the state of Illinois and to the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The regulation must be reasonable, and certain provisions of this ordinance are unreasonable, arbitrary, and discriminatory.

Restricting the location of garages, as the ordinance in question does, tends to promote the public health, safety, and welfare, and is not an interference with the property rights guaranteed by the state and Federal Constitutions.

Cooke, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The relator, Henry Busching, applied to the building commissioner of the city of Chicago for a permit authorizing him to erect a public garage at 871-877 Chestnut place, between Chestnut street and Delaware place, in the city of Chicago. As he had not complied with an ordinance of the city of Chicago regulating the location of garages, the building commissioner refused to issue the permit. Busching then filed a petition for a writ of mandamus in the circuit court of Cook county against the city of Chicago, the building commissioner, and the city plan examiner to require them to issue the permit. On a hearing before the court the writ was denied, and the petition dismissed. This appeal has been perfected from that judgment, the trial court having certified that the validity of an ordinance was involved.

The only question presented for our determination is the validity of the following ordinance: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to locate, build, construct, or maintain any garage within 200 feet of any building used as and for a hospital, church, or public or parochial school, or the grounds thereof, and it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to locate, build, construct, or maintain any garage in the city in any block in which two thirds of the buildings on both sides of the street are used exclusively for residence purposes, or within 100 feet of any such street in any such block, without securing the written consent of a majority of the property owners, according to frontage, on both sides of the street, as provided by the ordinances of the city of Chicago."

Another section of the Code of the city of Chicago defines the word "garage" to mean any building where automobiles, auto cars, or any similar self-propelled vehicles are let for hire or are kept ready for use upon the payment of fees for such services.

The invalidity of the ordinance is urged upon two grounds: (1) That the city has no power to legislate upon this subject and thus deprive its citizens of their rights under the state and Federal Constitutions; and (2) that if it be held that the city has the power to legislate upon this subject the ordinance is void for unreasonableness.

The city is given express authority by the statute to legislate upon this subject. Clause 82 of § 1 of article 5 of the cities and villages act (Hurd's Rev. Stat. 1913, chap. 24, § 62) is as follows: The city council shall have the power "to direct the location and regulate the use and construction of breweries, distilleries, livery, boarding or sale stables, blacksmith shops, foundries, machine shops, garages, laundries, and bathing beaches, within the limits of the city or village." If the ordinance is invalid it must be for the reason that this clause of the cities and villages act is invalid in so far as it authorizes the municipality to direct the location and regulate the use and construction of garages.

It is conceded that a garage is not a nuisance per se, and it is contended on the part of appellant that it was incumbent upon appellees to prove that this particular garage would, in fact, become a nuisance before the building commissioner would be justified in refusing to issue a permit to construct the building. We have often been called upon to determine when our legislative bodies are authorized to interfere with the business of the citizen by virtue of the police power vested in the state and its municipalities. In Chicago v. Netcher, 183 Ill. 104, 48 L.R.A. 261, 75 Am. St. Rep. 93, 55 N. E. 707, we thus announced the rule as to when such interference or regulation was authorized in cases such as the one under consideration: "In order to sustain legislative interference with the business of the citizen by virtue of the police power, it is necessary that the act should have some reasonable relation to the subjects included in such power. If it is claimed that the statute or ordinance is referable to the police power, the court must be able to see that it tends, in some degree, toward the prevention of offenses or the preservation of the public health, morals, safety, or welfare. It must be apparent that some such end is the one actually intended, and that there is some connection between the provisions of the law and such purpose. If it is manifest that the statute or ordinance has no such object, but, under the guise of a police regulation, is an invasion of the property rights of the individual, it is the duty of the court to declare it void. In the recent case of People ex rel. Friend v. Chicago, 261 Ill. 16, 49 L.R.A. (N.S.) 438, 103 N. E. 609, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 292, we thus announced the same rule: "Even if the municipality is clothed with the whole police power of the state, it would still not have the power to deprive a citizen of valuable property rights under the guise of prohibiting or regulating some business or occupation that has no tendency whatever to injure the public health or public morals or interfere with the general welfare. An act of the legislature which deprives the citizen of his liberty or property rights cannot be sustained under the police power unless the public health, comfort, safety, or welfare demands such enactment (Ruhrstrat v. People, 185 Ill. 133, 49 L.R.A. 181, 76 Am. St. Rep. 30, 57 N. E. 41, 12 Am. Crim. Rep. 453; Bailey v. People, 190 Ill. 28, 54 L.R.A. 838, 83 Am. St. Rep. 116, 60 N. E. 98; Bessette v. People, 193 Ill. 334, 56 L.R.A. 558, 62 N. E. 215), and there must be some logical connection between the object to be accomplished by such legislation and the means prescribed to accomplish that end. The owner of property has the constitutional right to make any use of it he desires, so long as he does not endanger or threaten the safety, health, and comfort or general welfare of the public. This right cannot be wholly taken away or limited by the state except in so far as it may become necessary for individual rights to yield to the higher and greater law of the best interest of the public." Many other cases have announced this rule in substantially the same language; but it will not be necessary to refer to each of them.

Testing the statute here involved by these rules, it becomes necessary to determine whether it has for its object the preservation of the public health, morals, comfort, safety, or welfare, or whether, under the guise of police regulation, it is an invasion of the property rights of the individual. If it is not such an invasion, then individual rights must yield to the higher rights of the public.

Conceding, as the parties do, that the business of conducting a public garage does not constitute a nuisance per se, it is a matter of common knowledge that the automobile propelled by the use of gasoline is a large and sometimes noisy machine, which frequently, when in operation, emits an offensive odor. Automobiles go in and out of public garages at all hours of the day and night, producing noises which must necessarily interfere with the comfort and welfare of those in the immediate vicinity. In the starting of these machines and in, the testing and repair of their engines a considerable noise is unavoidable. Gasolene and oil are used in places of this kind, and it is necessary to keep a considerable quantity of gasolene constantly on hand, which is transferred to the tanks of automobiles propelled by this means. In making this transfer, a portion of it necessarily becomes vapor, thus creating a menace both because of the odor of the fumes and their inflammable character. The power of the legislature to regulate such a business is in no way dependent upon the question whether it is a nuisance per se. It is of such a character that it becomes a nuisance when conducted in particular localities and under certain conditions, and it is clearly within the province of the legislature, in the exercise of the police power, to authorize the municipalities of the state to direct the location of public garages.

While the identical question involved here was not there raised, this same statute, as applied to a livery stable, was held valid in Chicago v. Stratton, 162 Ill. 494, 35 L.R.A. 84, 53 Am. St. Rep. 325, 44 N. E. 853. Since that time it has been amended so as to include garages. The act is not subject to the objection made, and, as the ordinance was passed by the express authority conferred by this statute, it is valid unless unreasonable in its requirements.

Appellees contend that as the ordinance was passed under the express authority given by this section of the statute, the courts will not inquire into the reasonableness of the provisions of the ordinance. This statute, in general terms, empowers the municipalities of the state to direct the location and regulate the use and construction of garages. It gives no detail as to the manner in which this direction and regulation shall be exercised. Under those circumstances, the city availing itself of this statute must be reasonable in the terms which it imposes by its ordinances. In discussing this question in Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Carlinville, 200 Ill. 314, 60 L.R.A. 391, 93 Am. St. Rep. 190, 65 N. E. 730, we said: "The books and reported cases seem to agree that courts may declare void an ordinance passed by a city or village by virtue of its implied powers, if, in the opinion of the court, it is unreasonable; but when the ordinance is passed by express authority conferred upon the municipality, by the legislature such power is not so clear, and there is conflict of authority upon that proposition. Burg v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 106, 48 Am. St. Rep. 419, 57 N. W. 680. The rule adopted in this state is that, where the ordinance is passed in pursuance of power expressly conferred by the legislature, and the details of such municipal legislation are prescribed by the legislature, an ordinance passed in pursuance of such power cannot be held invalid by the courts as being unreasonable; but, when the details of such legislation are not prescribed, an ordinance passed in pursuance of such power must be a reasonable exercise thereof or it will be pronounced invalid. Lake View v. Tate, 130 Ill. 247, 6 L.R.A. 268, 22 N. E. 791; Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L.R.A. 225, 42 N. E. 373; Wice v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 193 Ill. 351, 56 L.R.A. 268, 61 N. E. 1084. It is said in the Tate Case, on page 252: 'Where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred, and the mode of its exercise is not prescribed, then the ordinance passed in pursuance thereof must be a reasonable exercise of the power, or it will be pronounced invalid.' In Hawes v. Chicago, 158 Ill. 653, 30 L.R.A. 225, 42 N. E. 373, Mr. Justice Baker, in speaking for the court, in discussing the question when a court may rightfully hold an ordinance unreasonable on page 658 said: 'Where the power to legislate on a given subject is conferred on a municipal corporation, yet if the details of such legislation are not prescribed by the legislature, there the ordinance passed in pursuance of such power must be a reasonable exercise thereof or it will be pronounced invalid.'"

We do not agree with counsel for appellant that under this statute the city is given the power to prohibit the location of a garage anywhere within its corporate limits. Such legislation by the city authorities would be so unreasonable as to render it invalid. Under this statute the city undoubtedly has the power, if it should see fit, to prohibit the location of a garage in a strictly residential district, and it necessarily follows that an ordinance permitting the location and maintenance of a garage in residential districts under the conditions prescribed by this ordinance cannot be said to be unreasonable. The requirement that the person desiring to construct or maintain a garage in any block in which two thirds of the buildings on both sides of the street are used exclusively for residences, shall procure the written consent of a majority of the property owners, according to frontage, on both sides of the street, is not unreasonable.

In this case the court held, as a question of fact, that Chestnut place was not a residence street, and appellant contends that it is unreasonable to require him to secure frontage consent from the residents in that block on Chestnut street and Delaware place; these two streets being within 100 feet of the place where it was proposed to erect the building. For the reason stated in Chicago v. Stratton, supra, we are of the opinion that this is not an unreasonable requirement.

The place where it was proposed to erect this structure is also within 200 feet of a church, and it is contended that this provision of the ordinance is an unreasonable restriction. The conduct of the affairs of a church, with its various meetings and assemblies in carrying out the purposes for which it is organized, is of such a character that a city is warranted in making such a restriction. The conduct of the business of a public garage would be as offensive to the members of a church as it would be to the occupants of a private residence, and would affect their comfort and welfare to the same extent.

It is urged that the ordinance is invalid because it does not include private schools and other institutions similar to those mentioned in the ordinance. This is a question which does not concern appellant or affect his rights. Whether some institution not named in the ordinance in the class of hospitals, churches, or public or parochial schools should be included is not involved here.

Other reasons are suggested for the invalidity of the ordinance which are not involved, and for that reason will not be noted.

The ordinance is valid, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for unlawful detention in the defendant hospital and for alleged wilful and malicious assault and neglect by defendants. Affirmed.

Statement by Clark, Ch. J.:

This was an action to recover damages on account of the unlawful detention of the plaintiff by the defendants in the defendant hospital, operated by the defendant Carroll, and for assaults committed on her and neglect of her while in the hospital, which acts are alleged to have been wrongful, and committed wilfully, wantonly, and maliciously by the defendants.

The defendants denied that any wrongful acts were committed by them, as alleged by the plaintiff, but aver that she regularly entered herself as a patient and agreed to be governed by the rules and regulations of the hospital; that she was nervous, and not capable mentally of caring for herself, and that what was done was in accordance with the rules and regulations of the institution, and denied that she was assaulted or neglected while under their care.

The jury found for their verdict that the defendants wrongfully imprisoned the plaintiff and restrained her of her liberty, as alleged in the complaint, and that this was done wantonly, wilfully, and maliciously by the defendants, who also wantonly, wilfully, and maliciously assaulted her, as alleged in the complaint, and awarded compensatory petitioned for his discharge, and was therefore likely to become a public charge if discharged, and because the master of his vessel had ordered his detention until he could be returned to the port from which he came. The court stated that if this seaman desired to leave the hospital, he had the right to do so, no matter how imprudent was the step, and regardless of how his health might be affected thereby, and in spite of the consul's disapproval. The court also stated that since the proper immigration official was not a party to the habeas corpus proceeding to obtain the release of this sea-

Messrs. Martin, Rollins, & Wright, for appellants:

If the defendants acted in good faith in the treatment of the plaintiff, and used that degree of care and skill which was ordinarily practised and possessed by average physicians engaged in like practice, plaintiff would not be entitled to recover anything more than nominal damages, at least, because of the professional and medical treatment given her.

Boney v. Atlantic & N. C. R. Co. 145 N. C. 250, 58 S. E. 1082.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a young woman about to be married, who came to Asheville, North Carolina, from Savannah, Georgia, to rid her system of malaria, and for recreation and rest. She was somewhat delicate and nervous, but the evidence is that her mind was perfectly clear. Having heard of the Highland Hospital, operated by Dr. Carroll, as a sanatorium, she entered that institution after visiting it, but it was concealed man, the contention that he was an alien not admitted into the United States, and that to set him at liberty would be a violation of the immigration laws requiring the detention and return of aliens, could not be set up in justification of his detention at the hospital.

It is held in Re Baker, 29 How. Pr. 485, that the superintendent of the New York State Inebriate Asylum, having by statute "power to receive and retain all inebriates who enter the asylum either voluntarily or by the order of the committee of any habitual drunkard," cannot, under such act, forcibly detain a voluntary patient, although the patient upon entering had signed the requisite contract to remain in the asylum a year and the time had not expired. The court said: "He was a voluntary patient in the institution, and all the power the superintendent had under the laws for the government of the institution was to 'receive and retain' him so long as he was willing to remain. No provision has been made for the arrest of any voluntary patient who leaves the institution, who is capable of taking care of himself and of managing his own business affairs, and no principle of the common law is applicable to such a person L.R.A.1915D.

which justifies the arrest and detention of persons who are lost to self-control."

But a railroad company was held not liable in Ollet v. Pittsburg, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 201 Pa. 361, 50 Atl. 1011, for false imprisonment, where the crew of a freight train, acting without the scope of their employment, took a boy whose foot had been crushed by the cars, from a private house where first aid was given, to a hospital, against his will. The court observed that the crew of the train, in doing what they did, were endeavoring to act the part of the good Samaritan; that the circumstances seemed to call for great haste, and one who endeavors to assist his neighbor who is in great danger and distress is certainly not liable for a mistake in judgment, nor does there appear to have been any such mistake made in this case.

The liability for detaining one as an insane person presents a different question. The right of one restrained as insane person, to discharge upon ground of irregularity or invalidity of commitment, is discussed in note to Pierce v. Cobb, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 389, where notes analogous to that question are referred to.

from her that it was in effect a private asylum. The defendant Carroll gave her two pamphlets, one entitled "Diets," describing most delicious and appetizing foods. The other contained a description of sixty different "baths," most elegant and luxurious, and offering most enticing inducements to patients. These pamphlets filed in the record are the ne plus ultra of all that is elegant and luxurious in bathing and diets.

According to the evidence of the plaintiff and her sister, she entered the institution upon these representations and with no other thought than that she would be free to leave at will, could communicate freely with her family, and would receive the baths and diet mentioned in the pamphlets. She contracted for and received a front corner room, and her married sister returned to the hotel. This was on Sunday, August 4, 1912. On the next day she was informed that she would not be permitted to see her married sister nor communicate with her, and was told that she must have her hair shampooed. She testified that her hair had been shampooed just before leaving home, and she was suffering from cold, sore throat, and earache, and that her physical condition just at that time forbade her being subjected to this treatment, and she protested against her hair being shampooed. The nurses gave this information to the defendant Carroll, but he gave imperative orders that the plaintiff's hair "must be shampooed." Her evidence is that, in obedience to this order, two or three nurses took the plaintiff forcibly from her bed, while lightly clad, raised her forcibly from the floor, when she fell upon it, carried her to the bathroom, and shampooed her hair against her will. The plaintiff then demanded to leave the hospital, and to see her sister, and announced that she would not remain. The defendant Carroll was informed of this. He thereupon gave orders that the plaintiff was not to see her sister or leave the hospital. According to the defendant's testimony, the plaintiff stated that she would jump out of the window before she would stay there without seeing her sister. The defendant Carroll thereupon directed that she should be moved into a protected room or padded cell located in the rear, with diamond-shaped wire meshing on the inside and iron bars on the outside, a locked door, and an electric light at the ceiling inclosed with wire and operated from the outside. This room had scant furniture and, according to the report of the nurses, was infected with roaches. Adjoining this locked cell were raving lunatics shrieking to be let out. On each of the days prior to this time, and after the plaintiff was taken to the barred and locked cell, the plaintiff's married sister paid visits to the hospital, but was kept in ignorance of the treatment given to the plaintiff, and was not permitted to see her. The plaintiff was kept immured in the cell, above described, adjoining raving insane people, while her married sister returned to Savannah carrying assurance from the defendant Carroll to the family that the plaintiff was progressing nicely.

After five days the plaintiff was removed from the locked and barred cell to another back room, where she was restrained of her liberty against her will and prevented from communicating with any member of her family for more than three weeks, making thirty-two days in all, until her mother, after receiving a pathetic letter written by the plaintiff, who had bribed a colored maid to secure a pencil and mail a letter, came to the sanatorium and demanded her daughter.

The "Highland Hospital" was incorporated, but the defendant Robert S. Carroll was in sole and exclusive charge and, together with his wife, owned 99 shares out of the 100 shares of the capital stock. During the entire time the plaintiff was in the hospital, the defendant Carroll visited her only three times, according to the plaintiff's testimony, or five times, according to the defendant's testimony. The plaintiff was paying $35 per week for board, and was charged $15 per week extra for half the time of a trained nurse, who was only a student, and who was being paid only $8 per month by the defendants. The plaintiff was subjected to compulsory hypodermic injections twice every day during her stay, against her protest. Her breasts were forcibly massaged each day in such a forcible manner that she groaned under the treatment.

Instead of the luxurious diet described in the pamphlet, the food given the plaintiff was 3 ounces of milk and 1 ounce of lithia water eight times a day at the beginning, which was increased to 6 ounces of milk, 1½ ounces of cream, and two raw crated eggs. She was read "Why Worry" and "Those Nerves" constantly during her stay. The defendant Carroll wrote only one letter to her family during the thirty-two days she was immured under his control. The plaintiff's arm was injured by the force used in dragging her to the bathroom to such an extent that she complained of it constantly during her stay in the hospital. She testifies that she was such a physical wreck by reason of her treatment that she could not make her wedding clothes after her return home, and that she could not hold her baby after it was born. She graphically describes her agony of mind during her illegal restraint among lunatics, in a private asylum, in a distant state, far from home and friends, without means of communication with her family, without money and clothes with which to escape, being forcibly detained against her will, and having entered the institution, according to her testimony, without knowledge of its nature, and being duped into supposing that it was a rest cure, with luxurious diet and baths. She testifies that she returned home a nervous wreck, requiring careful treatment for many months, and indelibly stamped with her experience as a prisoner in a madhouse.

The defendants in their evidence deny the mistreatment, allege that the plaintiff was nervous and hysterical, but admit that she was restrained of her liberty; that she was placed in the "protected" room and afterwards removed to another "protected" room; that her hair was shampooed though she earnestly resisted; and that she was restrained of her liberty and kept in the institution against her will, and that the family were not informed of that fact. The defendant Carroll testified that he restrained her and kept her in the institution against her will; that her lack of self-control had reached hysteria, which was that she was "impulsive and would do unreasonable things." He did not testify that she was insane, but said that hysteria is "the borderland between sanity and insanity."

The judge properly told the jury: "If the plaintiff was twenty-four years of age, unmarried, and was there in the hospital, and she subsequently applied to the authorities of the hospital for, and demanded, her release,—demanded that she be allowed to go from the institution and be allowed and suffered to leave there,—and after such demand made, if you find it, and that it was communicated by the nurses, or through the proper channels, to Dr. Carroll, and after that, that she, either by words, or by locking doors, or by anything that comes up to the definition of imprisonment that I have given you, she was imprisoned, so that she was unable to carry out her desires and wishes in that regard, then if you find these facts,—after that, the court charges you, as a matter of law, that she would be wrongfully imprisoned and restrained of her liberty."

"If you were to find that she was in the institution, and that she was demanding to be released, which was properly communicated to the hospital authorities, but if you were to further find to your satisfaction that she was so nervous from any ailment or disease and so irrational that there was reasonable probability that, if so released at the time, she would do herself some bodily harm, under such circumstances the hospital would have the right to detain her and restrain her, under the law of necessity and humanity, until that condition as to her reasonable apprehension of doing herself bodily harm had passed. And within that rule or limitation it would not be a wrongful and unlawful imprisonment."

"Now it is for you, gentlemen, to say, from the testimony, the facts you find, and how this matter is. Even though she went in under this paper, and if you find, as she contends, that she was perfectly rational, and knew what she was doing—what she wanted and didn't want—and she wanted to leave the institution, and expressed it to the hospital authorities, and the hospital authorities knew of that fact, and then after that restrained her of her liberty, then it would be in law, as I am holding, wrongful detention, unless they were justified in restraining her under those rules of humanity and regard for her welfare, as I have just given you."

There was a conflict of evidence as to the treatment that the plaintiff received, but there is no controversy that the plaintiff was detained in the defendant's hospital against her will, confined for thirty-two days; that she was confined a considerable part of the time in a locked and barred cell; that she was denied all communication with her friends, and subjected to having her hair shampooed and to massage of delicate portions of her body and to hypodermic injections daily against her will.

The defendants contend that they had a right to do these things because the plaintiff signed an agreement upon her entrance that she would be subject to the rules and regulations of the institution, and that she could not be set at liberty without danger to herself. The judge submitted this latter phase to the jury, who found against it. Besides, the defendants did not account for the fact that, though the plaintiff's sister visited the institution, they gave her no information as to plaintiff's condition and treatment, and that, during the whole thirty-two days that the plaintiff was restrained by them of her liberty and subjected to physical treatment against her protest, no information was given by the institution to her relatives, though this was practical, during the entire time, by wire or long distance phone.

The judge properly told the jury that the plaintiff could not thus surrender control of herself to another by signing a paper at her entrance into the institution. 4 Cyc. 365; Re Lambert, 134 Cal. 626, 55 L.R.A. 856, 86 Am. St. Rep. 296, 66 Pac. 851; Re Baker, 29 How. Pr. 488.

The main defense relied upon by the defendants is that, if they acted in good faith, there would be no liability upon their part. Whether or not this would be a defense to a recovery of punitive damages we need not discuss, for the jury in their verdict denied the plaintiff, on the issue submitted for that purpose, any recovery of punitive damages. "Good faith" is not a defense to the recovery of compensatory damages when the jury find that there was illegal restraint of liberty and compulsory massage and hypodermic injections and other physical treatment upon a defenseless woman, who was in the absolute power of the defendants and kept immured under lock and key and with barred windows, without information given by them to her family of her condition, and she denied all communication with them.

It is unnecessary to discuss in detail the exceptions taken, for they are all covered by what we have said.

The plaintiff was not committed as insane, and, if she had been, the defendants do not account for the fact that they accepted her as sane by signing the agreement with her upon her entrance into the institution. If she subsequently became insane, it was the duty of the institution to have at once notified her mother and sister. The testimony of the defendants, however, is that she was not insane. Evidently the defendant Carroll believed that he had absolute control of the plaintiff and the right to imprison her if she opposed his orders or will, and the right to impose on her whatever treatment he thought best, and that the family need not be consulted any more than the plaintiff herself. The effect of being at the head of such institution is very often—too often—to render the person in charge callous and autocratic, and in his own opinion irresponsible to anyone.

In this land, the law guarantees liberty to everyone, subject to restraint only in the modes provided by the law, and even then there is the right to review the conduct of those in charge of those deprived of their liberty. The plaintiff was not committed to the care of the defendants by any legal proceedings adjudging her insane, and her signing the paper agreeing to be subject to the rules and regulations of the institution was not irrevocable. It did not subject her to the irresponsible power and control of the defendant. This is the whole controversy, and requires no further discussion.

If the plaintiff did not abide by her agreement to obey the rules and regulations of the institution, the remedy of the defendants was to discharge her, or, if her condition forbade this, to notify her relatives (neither of which they did), and not to imprison her and to force her to do their will.

As to the amount of compensatory damages due the plaintiff by reason of her illegal detention, and the physical ill treatment that she received, the jury have assessed the amount, and it has been approved by the trial judge, and is not reviewable by us.

The horrors of the imprisonment of a sane person in a private madhouse (and one is not the less such because it may be advertised as a "sanatorium") have never been more graphically related or probably more truthfully than by Charles Reade in "Hard Cash." Like the novels of Charles Dickens, it has aided to correct evils which till then oppressed and afflicted society without hindrance from those who administered the law.

The finding by the judge of the facts upon the motion for misconduct of the jury was based upon the evidence, and is not reviewable by us, and his conclusion of law thereupon to refuse the motion was correct. Lewis v. Fountain, — N. C. —, 84 S. E. 278, at this term, and cases there cited.

MASSACHUSETTS BONDING & INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Insurance — against theft — circumstantial evidence.

That the evidence of theft is wholly circumstantial does not defeat recovery on a policy of insurance against loss by theft, although it provides that assured shall produce direct and affirmative evidence that the loss was due to theft; disappearance of the articles not to be deemed such evidence.

(January 2, 1915.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Allegheny County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of insurance against loss by theft. Affirmed.

Aitkin v. Young, 12 Pa. 15; Dinan v. Supreme Council, C. M. B. A. 210 Pa. 456, 60 Atl. 10.

Stewart, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was on a policy of insurance against direct loss of the property described in the schedule attached, occurring by its felonious abstraction from the interior of the building, apartments, or rooms wholly occupied by the assured. The property for the loss of which the action was brought consisted of various articles of personal jewelry. Evidence was introduced by plaintiff to show the circumstances connected with their disappearance, which it is claimed excluded other theory than that the property had been lost by theft. The particulars of the evidence need not here be recited. At the close of plaintiff's case defendant moved for binding instructions. The motion was overruled, and the case was submitted to the jury, with the result that a verdict was rendered for the plaintiff for the full amount of the claim. A motion for judgment non obstante followed, which in turn was also denied. The ground on which binding instructions were asked, and on which the motion for judgment rested, was the insufficiency of the evidence submitted to meet the requirements of a clause in the policy which reads as follows:

"The assured shall also produce direct and affirmative evidence that the loss of article or articles for which claim is made was due to the commission of a burglary, theft, or larceny; the disappearance of such article or articles not to be deemed such evidence."

Appellant's contention is that the evidence adduced by plaintiff to show the felonious taking of the property was wholly circumstantial, and that, conceding the sufficiency of the evidence in ordinary case to warrant an inference of theft, yet, because here the agreement of the parties required for the establishment of this material fact on which defendant's liability was made dependent evidence direct and affirmative, of the former of which there was none, binding instructions should have been given. This contention gives to the words, "direct and affirmative evidence," a meaning so severely technical that, if this meaning alone can be given them, a policy containing the provision we have here would avail the assured only in the rarest and most exceptional cases, so exceptional that the average person would hardly think the contingency in which the policy could operate worth guarding against. Theft may not be described as a deed of darkness; yet it is notoriously one which is rarely, if ever, attempted, except as the thief has reason to believe that he will be undiscovered in the act. He never invites anyone, unless it be a confederate, to witness the operation. To limit the assured's right to recovery to cases where the corpus delicti can be proved by direct testimony—that is, by the testimony of witnesses who saw the actual taking—would make the policy next to valueless. We will not impute to the defendant company any such purpose in the use of these words; nor can we assume that the assured understood them in this narrow and restricted sense, in view of the marked subtraction such construction would necessarily make from his security. Stated plainly, what is contended for is that, the factum probandum being the felonious taking of the property, this could only be established by the testimony of one or more witnesses who were present and saw the theft or larceny actually committed; or it may be stated thus, that the parties intended by the words to exact a higher degree of proof to charge the company with liability for the loss than the law requires to convict the burglar or thief of the crime itself. Admitting that the evidence here was circumstantial, if adduced on the trial of one charged with the theft and found sufficient to exclude all reasonable doubt with respect to the guilt of the party charged, conviction would follow, and imprisonment, and yet, with the guilty one in jail, the evidence would be insufficient for a recovery on the policy, because the thief convicted and in jail had not been seen when perpetrating the crime. We are unwilling to believe that the parties intended by the language used to accomplish such absurd results as those pointed out, and which would necessarily follow were the strict technical construction contended for allowed. Technical terms are ordinarily, but not always, to be given their technical meaning. Where they are obviously used in a different sense, it is the intention that governs. Just what the parties understood by direct and affirmative evidence may not be clear; but of this we feel very certain, they did not employ these words with a view to render the policy frivolous and ineffective. And it would be both were it enforceable only as someone could be produced who had seen the thief at his work. A reasonable construction of the words would ascribe to the parties the single purpose to require something more than the mere fact of loss to entitle the assured to recovery on the policy. The fact that the clause concludes with a provision that the disappearance of the property should not be deemed direct evidence is an indication, more or less strong, that the word "direct" was not used in its strictly technical sense. The provision might well have been omitted had the technical meaning been intended; since under no circumstances could the fact of disappearance have been regarded as direct evidence, understood in its technical sense, of the theft. An examination of the evidence shows that, while circumstantial, it was all distinctly affirmative as to the different facts testified to. Each witness testified as to what he saw for himself, and all the testimony was received without objection. The trial judge in his charge very distinctly instructed the jury that the one question they had to pass upon was whether the property had been feloniously taken. Their answer that it was so taken should have made an end of the case. The effect of a provision in a policy of insurance conditioning recovery on the production of a particular kind of evidence in contradistinction of another kind, which, under the rules of law and evidence, is equally effective and admissible to prove the particular fact in issue, suggests a question that was not raised in the court below, nor argued on the appeal. It therefore calls for no consideration here.

The assignment of error is overruled, and the judgment is affirmed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

GRADY BOWEN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

SMITH-HALL GROCERY COMPANY.

(141 Ga. 721, 82 S. E. 23.)

Highway — refuse in — frightening horse — liability.

1. A petition alleged, in substance, as follows: A firm whose place of business abutted on a much traveled street in a city placed a large quantity of trash and loose sheets of paper on and near the street and sidewalk on a day when the wind was blowing sharply. They did not put it in a receptacle, or confine it in any way. The sheets of paper were light, and were naturally liable to be blown about the street by even a light breeze, and naturally and inevitably tended to excite and frighten not only nervous horses and mules, but even quiet and steady ones. The plaintiff, a capable driver, was driving two reasonably well-broken, steady, and roadworthy horses along the street. The wind blew some of the paper under the horses and against their legs, frightening them and causing them to run away and injure him. Held that such petition was not subject to general demurrer.

(a) Where it was also alleged that there existed in a city an ordinance requiring the proprietor of each business house to keep a covered garbage can outside of his place of business, and to place in it all refuse, garbage, and trash from such place, to be called for by the proper city officers, and that trash and paper were placed on and near the sidewalk by the defendants on the day of the injury, without being confined in such receptacle, and in violation of the ordinance, this did not render the entire petition demurrable on the ground that the ordinance was a sanitary measure, and was not enacted for the purpose of preventing horses from being frightened. The ordinance on its face, as set out in the petition, appears to have been enacted as a sanitary measure; and, so considered, its violation would not be negligence per se as to persons driving along the highway. But, though not negligence per se relatively to the plaintiff because in violation of the ordinance, the acts done might be negligence as a matter of fact.

Proximate cause — fright of horses — rubbish in highway — wind.

2. There was no merit in the ground of demurrer which raised the contention that the violation of the ordinance was not the proximate cause of the injury, but that a separate and independent intervening cause, the blowing of the wind, was the proximate cause, coupled with the fact that the horses became frightened, and that this was the act of God, for which the defendants were not responsible:

(a) If the acts of the defendants constituted negligence with reference to the plaintiff, without regard to whether a violation of the ordinance was negligence per se, the blowing of the wind, which was known, or might naturally be expected, was not an independent intervening cause, so as to prevent the negligence of the defendants from being the proximate cause of the injury.

(b) There is nothing in the petition to show that there was any unforeseen or sudden wind of such a character as to come ERROR to the Superior Court for Whitfield County to review a judgment in defendants' favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

Grady Bowen filed his petition for damages against the Smith-Hall Grocery Company. The petition as amended alleged, in substance, as follows: The Smith-Hall Grocery Company is a partnership doing business in the city of Dalton. Its storehouse and place of business fronted on Hamilton street, the principal business street of the city, upon which at all times of the day there was a large amount of travel by pedestrians and all kinds of vehicles. At the frightened at object in highway, see note to Bowes v. Boston, 15 L.R.A. 365; and generally as to liability for placing near highway object calculated to frighten horses, see note to Davis v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1152.

As to liability for discharge of steam near street or highway so as to frighten horse, see note to Mt. Cooperage Co. v. Page, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 946. As to duty to prevent escape of steam from engine in highway so as to frighten horses, see note to Lane Bros. Co. v. Barnard, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1209.

Annotation of other questions arising from injuries due to fright of horses may be found by consulting the Index to L.R.A. Notes under the title "Horses."

The only case other than BOWEN v. SMITH-HALL GROCERY CO. involving the frightening of a horse by paper blown from a rubbish heap by the wind is McClure v. Feldmann, 184 Mo. 710, 84 S. W. 16. In that case a judgment for defendant was affirmed, the court holding that where the cause of action, as stated in the complaint, specifically charged that the rubbish pile of paper and straw which frightened plaintiff's horses was placed on the highway by defendant, instructions were properly refused wherein plaintiff sought a recovery on the ground of a different character of negligence; namely, that the rubbish was placed on defendant's premises and negligently allowed to be blown by the wind into the highway.

The question of liability in this class of cases depends upon whether the object was calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness; and whether an object in a highway is in its nature calculated to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness is generally a question for the jury to determine. L.R.A.1915D.

time of the injury complained of there was in force in the city the following ordinance:

"The proprietor of each business house must keep a covered garbage can outside of his place of business, in which must be placed all refuse, garbage, and trash from said place of business, to be called for by the proper city officers."

On the day of the injury the defendants through their employees placed upon and near to the street and sidewalk thereof, in front of their place of business, a large amount of trash and loose sheets of paper, without putting it in any receptacle or confining it in any way. The wind was blowing sharply. The pieces of paper were loose and light, and were naturally and easily liable to be blown up and down or across the street by even a light breeze, and, if so blown, the rattling caused by them and their moving toward horses and mules passing along the street and striking them would naturally and inevitably tend to excite and frighten not only excitable and nervous horses and mules, but even quiet and steady ones, and cause them to start, rear, plunge,

Thus, whether dust and shavings blown from a mill over a wall on to the highway were objects calculated to frighten a horse of ordinary gentleness was in Rodgers v. Harper & Moore, 170 Ala. 647, 54 So. 199, 1 N. C. C. A. 78, held a question for the jury.

So, whether a pile of rubbish was of a character calculated to frighten horses, and whether it had remained in a street so long a time that the village authorities should have taken notice of its existence, were held in Barr v. Bainbridge, 42 App. Div. 628, 59 N. Y. Supp. 132, questions of fact for the jury.

A hay cap consisting of white cloth tied by the corners to stakes in the ground, so that it is moved by the wind, may constitute a nuisance for which the party maintaining it will be liable for the frightening of a horse on a highway when it is placed within the limits of the highway, where it is naturally calculated to frighten a horse of ordinary gentleness. Lynn v. Hooper, 93 Me. 46, 47 L.R.A. 752, 44 Atl. 127, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 535.

So (as stated in the syllabus) where a person with a wagon loaded with bicycles, covered with several flags flying and waving from one side to the other, and thereby making such a display, while drawing such wagon as an advertising medium through the principal streets of a populous city, as to frighten a horse of ordinary gentleness, and cause it to run away in such street, whereby the property of another is injured and damaged, the finding of the jury upon the question of the negligence of such person drawing such wagon will not be disturbed. Jones v. Snow, 56 Minn. 214, 57 N. W. 478.

Where horses are frightened by an object and run away. The plaintiff was driving along the street in a buggy drawn by two horses, reasonably well broken, steady, and roadworthy, and he was capable of driving and handling horses. When about 50 to 75 yards from the pile of trash and paper, the wind caught up and blew some sheets directly under his horses. The sudden rattling and fluttering of the papers beating upon the legs of the horses excited them, and, in spite of all that the plaintiff could do, they got beyond his control and ran away, overturning the vehicle, breaking the tongue out of it, and turning it over. The plaintiff was thrown violently to the ground and received serious personal injuries which are permanent. The violation of the city ordinance was negligence per se on the part of the defendants. Without regard to the ordinance, the defendants were guilty of negligence in placing the trash and paper upon the street, because it naturally and reasonably tended to cause the injuries complained of, and did cause them. The plaintiff was without fault or any lack of ordinary care in the matter.

The defendants demurred on the following grounds: (1) Because the petition set forth no cause of action; (2) because the ordinance referred to was enacted as a sanitary measure, and not to prevent horses driven along the street from becoming frightened; (3) because the facts as alleged do not constitute such negligence as the defendants, in the exercise of ordinary care, might have reasonably anticipated would result in the plaintiff's injuries; (4) because the violation of the ordinance was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. The blowing of the wind, which was an act of God, coupled with the horses becoming frightened, was the proximate cause, and for this the defendants were not liable. The judge sustained the demurrer and dismissed the case. The plaintiff excepted.

in the streets of a town or city, having a tendency to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness, if the object was not placed in the street by the corporation or by anyone in privity with it, the corporation is not liable for the injury resulting unless it had notice thereof for a sufficient length of time to have enabled it, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, to remove the object; but this notice may be either actual or implied, and notice is implied where a sufficient length of time has elapsed between the placing of the object or obstruction and the accident for the corporation, using reasonable diligence, to have removed it, or when it was so placed and its nature so notorious that the corporation should have known it. Thus, in Falmouth v. Woods, 16 Ky. L. Rep. 317, a town is held to be liable for injuries resulting from the frightening of horses by a canvas sign which the town had permitted to be stretched across one of its principal streets, the sign being so hung that when blown by the wind it made a noise calculated to, and which did on several occasions, frighten passing horses; these facts being so notorious as to cause general comment.

So, a village was held liable in Champlain v. Penn Yan, 34 Hun, 33, affirmed without opinion in 102 N. Y. 680, for injuries sustained as a consequence of one's horse becoming frightened at a large advertising banner strung across a street. The court said: "We are unable to discover any sensible reason for holding that an object permanently suspended directly over the traveled part of a highway, although fastened to supports outside of the limits of the same, is not an obstruction to travel, if it naturally tends to frighten horses of ordinary gentleness. Such an object drives travel from the street over which it is suspended, because discreet persons will avoid the risk and danger incident to attempt to pass under the same. It endangers travel, and makes it perilous to all travelers riding in conveyances drawn by horses. Such an object placed in a place so conspicuous as this banner was, within the plain sight of horses, is to be distinguished from objects which are suspended over sidewalks and fastened to the face of a building, like a sign or a bracket fastened in the face of a building, on which traders display their goods, or a show case standing in front of a store."

Where plaintiff was injured by his horse taking fright at the noise of a railroad-crossing sign caused to rattle or creak by a sudden gust of wind, the railroad company was, in Thompson v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 164 App. Div. 117, 149 N. Y. Supp. 611, held not liable, being not bound, in the exercise of ordinary care, to anticipate such a result.

So, the owner of premises near a railroad crossing was held not liable in O'Sullivan v. Knox, 81 App. Div. 438, 80 N. Y. Supp. 848, affirmed in 178 N. Y. 565, 70 N. E. 1104, where plaintiff was injured by her horse becoming frightened by the falling of a large sign blown down by the wind; the court stating that "with a signboard of these moderate dimensions, with 85 feet of railroad lands between his own and the highway, and with his structure 15 feet in from his line, he [owner] filled the measure of that reasonable care imposed upon him, and commensurate with any probable or conceivable danger. He could not forecast the uncommon occurrences which resulted in the injuries to the plaintiff, and hence they are not within the compass of the obligation he owed to her." J. D. C.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Whether or not the ordinance requiring the proprietor of each business house to keep a covered garbage can outside of his place of business, and to cause to be placed therein all refuse, garbage, and trash, to be removed by the proper city officers, was purely a sanitary ordinance, or whether the requirement that it should be covered also included the idea of preventing the contents from being blown about the street, is not a controlling question in the case. The ordinance on its face appears to have been enacted as a sanitary measure. So considered, its violation would not be negligence per se relatively to a person driving horses along the highway, who was injured by the horses taking fright. Nevertheless (without constituting as to such a person negligence per se, as being the violation of an ordinance passed for the protection of those driving in the street), if a quantity of trash and loose paper was placed upon and near to the sidewalk and street, which was a public way where many vehicles passed, while the wind was blowing, in such a manner that the natural and probable consequence thereof would be to frighten ordinarily gentle and roadworthy horses which were being driven along the highway, this might, as matter of fact, constitute negligence as to persons thus lawfully driving; and, if injury resulted therefrom, the defendants might be liable. That an act cannot be declared to be negligent per se, or as matter of law, does not necessarily prevent it from being negligent as matter of fact.

In Rome v. Suddeth, 116 Ga. 649, 42 S. E. 1032, a suit for damages was brought against a municipal corporation on account of personal injuries. It was alleged that the municipal authorities allowed to be placed at a certain point in the city "two large stones," and that the plaintiff's horse became frightened at these stones and ran away, causing the injuries. The petition failed to allege the length of time that the stones were permitted to remain in the place described, that the stones were objects naturally tending to frighten an ordinarily roadworthy horse, and that the plaintiff's horse was such an animal. It also did not allege that the city violated any duty in failing to cause the removal of the stones; nor did it make any allegation of fact from which such a violation of duty could be inferred. It was held that such a petition did not state sufficient facts to authorize a recovery, and was demurrable. When the case was returned to the trial court, an amendment was made which supplied the defects pointed out in the original petition, L.R.A.1915D.

and it was held that the petition as amended was good as against a general demurrer. Rome v. Suddeth, 121 Ga. 420, 49 S. E. 300. In the present case the petition alleged that the placing upon and near the street and sidewalk of a large amount of trash and loose sheets of paper, which would be easily liable to be blown about, would naturally tend to frighten not only excitable and nervous horses, but even quiet and steady ones, and cause them to run away; that the wind was blowing sharply, but that nevertheless the defendants so placed such trash and paper without putting it in any receptacle or confining it in any way. It was further alleged that the horses which the plaintiff was driving along the street were steady and roadworthy and reasonably well broken. This was sufficient as against a general demurrer, or one based on the ground that the ordinance was a sanitary measure only, and that the facts alleged did not show negligence on the part of the defendants as to the plaintiff.

This case is not controlled by the decision in Macon v. Dykes, 103 Ga. 847, 31 S. E. 443. In that case the question did not arise upon a demurrer, which admits the allegations of the petition; but it was decided, upon the evidence, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. The undisputed evidence in that case showed that the plaintiff, while driving a horse attached to a two-wheeled roadcart, along a street in which was laid the track of a street railway, attempted to drive, while the horse was in a walk, across the track at an angle of about 45 degrees; that, when the wheels of the cart came in contact with the iron rails of the track, the wheels slipped along the rails and made a scraping noise, whereupon the horse began to kick, jump, and run, and became wholly unmanageable, and ran away, causing the cart to collide with a wagon and throwing the plaintiff to the ground, seriously injuring him. While the height of the rails above the surface of the street was variously estimated by the witnesses to be from 2 to 4 inches, and there was an ordinance of the city prohibiting the laying of rails which should be above the level of the street, it was held that the undisputed evidence as a whole showed that the negligence of the defendants was not the proximate cause of the injuries to the plaintiff. In the case now before us it was alleged in effect that the defendants were negligent in the particulars set out, and that their negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. It cannot be declared on demurrer that this was not true.

2. One ground of the demurrer raised the contention that the violation of the ordinance by the defendants was not the proximate mate cause of the plaintiff's injury, but that a separate and independent intervening cause, the blowing of the wind, was the proximate cause, coupled with the fact that the horses became frightened, and that this was the act of God for which the defendants were not responsible. Regardless of any claim that the violation of the ordinance would constitute negligence per se as to the plaintiff, the contention is without merit. If one does a negligent act, which alone would not cause the injury, but does it under such conditions that it is reasonably and naturally probable that, in connection with the ordinary operations of natural forces, injury will result, the original act will be treated as the proximate cause of such injury, in the absence of the intervention of any independent agency. If he has knowledge that the wind is blowing, or in the ordinary course of nature is likely to blow while the act is in progress, and negligently places large quantities of loose paper where the natural result will be to cause it to be blown against horses in the street, he cannot claim that such a wind is an independent intervening cause. Cheeves v. Danielly, 80 Ga. 114 (2), 118, 4 S. E. 902; Hendley v. Griffin, 101 Ga. 140, 28 S. E. 610, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 357; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Hall, 124 Ga. 322 (8), 330, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 898, 110 Am. St. Rep. 170, 52 S. E. 679, 4 Ann. Cas. 128, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 116; Sedgw. Damages, 9th ed. §§ 118, 121d, 122, 124; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hesters, 90 Ga. 11, 15 S. E. 828; Ft. Wayne Cooperage Co. v. Page, — Ind. App. —, 82 N. E. 83 (20), s. c. 170 Ind. 585, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 946, 84 N. E. 145; Benedict Pineapple Co. v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 92, and note (55 Fla. 514, 46 So. 732); Rodgers v. Harper & Moore, 170 Ala. 647, 54 So. 199, 1 N. C. C. A. 78. If the contention above stated could be sustained, it might also be argued that a tortfeasor might tear the roof from a store, and, if the rain or the dew or the wind should injure the goods of the proprietor, no liability would arise, because the rain and the wind and the dew should be classified as acts of God. Or a person might place a large stone on a hillside, and, if it should roll down and crush a passer on a highway below, escape liability by saying that the stone was caused to roll down the hill by gravity. Or if one should negligently build a fire in a much-traveled street while the wind was blowing and sparks should be blown against a passing vehicle and set it on fire, could the person building the fire say that his act was not the proximate cause of the injury? Can anyone put a thing likely to cause injury into the air (say a L.R.A.1915D.

noxious gas), and contend that he is not liable because the normal wind carries it to the place where the injury occurs? It was alleged the act of the defendants was of such a character as naturally to frighten ordinary horses. Under the facts set out in the petition, neither this court nor the trial court can say, as matter of law, that this is untrue. To state the proposition involved in the contention is to show its fallacy. The ground of the demurrer set up that the violation of the ordinance was not the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injuries. But, as we have held above, the case does not depend upon whether the violation of the ordinance constituted negligence per se as to the plaintiff, but depends upon whether the conduct of the defendants was sufficiently shown by the allegations to be negligent, and to have caused the injury so as to withstand a demurrer.

Judgment reversed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

MARIE ROSS, by Next Friend, Appt.,
v.

ROBERT J. KOHLER et al.

(163 Ky. 583, 174 S. W. 36.)

Appeal — objection to instructions — time for making.

1. Objections to instructions made for the first time upon motion for new trial cannot be considered on appeal.

False imprisonment — liability of officer for acts of others.

2. A police officer who arrests without warrant a person whom the police officials desired to interview, is answerable in damages for mistreatment of the prisoner by such officials while they are subjecting him to examination in the absence of the officer.

Appeal — refusal to direct verdict.

3. Refusal to direct a verdict is not error unless a request for such instruction is offered in writing.

Note. — Condition of place of imprisonment and treatment while in custody as elements of damages in action of malicious prosecution or false imprisonment.

This subject is covered in the note to Seidler v. Burns, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 291, to which the present note is merely supplementary.

Actions for malicious prosecution.

On a subsequent appeal of Seidler v. Burns, in 86 Conn. 249, 85 Atl. 369, it was Same — argument — prejudice.

4. It is not prejudicial error for the attorney for plaintiff in a suit against a police officer for false imprisonment, to refer in argument to the fact that defendant's counsel is assistant city attorney, although that fact does not appear in the record.

Same — objection to argument — when raised.

5. Objection to language used by counsel in argument cannot be considered on appeal if made for the first time on motion for new trial.

Damages — false imprisonment.

6. Damages for false imprisonment may include compensation for all the natural and probable consequences of the wrong, including injury to the feelings, fear, humiliation, indignity, and disgrace, and injury to the person and physical suffering, interruption of business, and loss of time from the restraint.

Same — amount — excess.

7. Seven hundred and fifty dollars is not excessive to allow a seventeen-year-old girl of good family and reputation for arresting her without warrant and taking her to police headquarters to interview her with respect to the commission of a crime of which she was ignorant, merely because her Christian name was the same as that of the one for whom the police were looking.

Appeal — granting new trial — error.

8. The action of the trial court in setting aside a verdict granting a new trial for error of law, which is not in fact error, is error.

Same — scope of review — order on former trial.

9. Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment held in an action for malicious prosecution that circumstances aggravating the plaintiff's bodily pain, etc., were proper elements of damages, and that a verdict of the jury for $500 was not so unreasonable as to warrant an interference by the court.

In Debedant v. Maestri, 134 La. 366, 64 So. 142, it was held that the damages in an action for malicious prosecution should be greater in a case where the plaintiff was placed in jail for some hours than in one where there was no incarceration.

False imprisonment.

In Southwestern Portland Cement Co. v. Reitzer, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 237, it was held that where one is wrongfully arrested he may recover in an action for false imprisonment damages for such injuries as resulted to him on account of the filthy condition of the jail in which he was placed, the defendant in such action being liable for all damages which flow from his wrong as a natural sequence in a continuous unbroken current.

And it has been held that if a storekeeper causes the arrest of a woman, he is liable in an action for false imprisonment for the acts of police officers while she was detained, L.R.A.1915D.

refusing a new trial after verdict for nominal damages upon a new trial granted upon the setting aside of a verdict in his favor, brings before the appellate court the order granting the new trial, if both bills of exception are in the record.

(March 17, 1915.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Common Pleas Branch, Fourth Division, of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County, awarding nominal damages only after a substantial verdict in her favor had been set aside on defendant's motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for alleged wrongful and forcible arrest of plaintiff. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Chesley H. Searcy and Thomas C. Mapother, for appellant:

The court erred in setting aside the first verdict of $750, and granting a new trial, and erred in overruling plaintiff's motion to set aside the last verdict and reinstate the first.

Perkins v. Ogilvie, 148 Ky. 309, 146 S. W. 735.

The first verdict of $750 was not excessive, even with the testimony excluded as to what occurred in the room at police headquarters.

especially where the act of searching her was the natural and probable consequence of her arrest. Simper v. Carroll, 31 Ohio C. C. 386.

And in Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Crawford, 112 Md. 508, 77 Atl. 278, in an action for false imprisonment against a railway company for an arrest made by one of its officers, it was held that in assessing damages the jury might take into consideration the nature of the force applied to the plaintiff and his humiliation.

And in Jacques v. Parks, 96 Me. 268, 52 Atl. 763, where the plaintiff had been arrested under a warrant issued illegally by a tax collector, the harsh treatment to which the plaintiff had been subjected by being exposed on a cold day was considered by the court in fixing the damages.

So, in Sebring v. Harris, 20 Cal. App. 56, 128 Pac. 7, in an action for wrongful arrest and false imprisonment, it was held that in determining the damages the jury might take into consideration the humiliation and mental anguish resulting where the plaintiff, a woman, was arrested and moved through a crowd to a fire engine house, and detained there for an hour pending the arrival of the patrol wagon, upon the arrival of which, however, because of her protests

Messrs. W. J. O'Connor, Pendleton Beckley, and J. M. Lee for appellees.

Hurt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, Marie Ross (née Boutellier), was a girl seventeen years of age, and the daughter of a respectable family, who lived on Milton avenue, in Louisville, Kentucky, at the time of the event hereinafter related. She brought this suit in the Jefferson circuit court against the appellee Robert J. Kohler and the surety upon his official bond, Georgia Insurance Company. The appellee Kohler was a lieutenant of police in the city of Louisville.

The appellant, by her petition and amended petition, complains that about the 20th day of March, 1913, the appellee forcibly and wrongfully arrested her, and compelled her against her will to go with him in an automobile to the city hall, and there delivered her into the custody of other persons who displayed firearms before her in a very menacing way, and quizzed her very offensively; that she had not been guilty of any kind of an offense for which she might be lawfully arrested, and that the appellee did not have any warrant for her arrest, nor reasonable grounds for believing her to have committed a felony, and that she had not been guilty of any misdemeanor or any infraction of the ordinances of the city in his presence. The appellees answered, traversing the allegations as to damages suffered by her, and denied that she was wrongfully arrested, or wrongfully required to accompany the officers against her will from her home to the city hall; but the answer failed to deny that the appellee did arrest her, or did compel her to go with him to the city hall against her will. Upon a trial, the jury found a verdict for the appellant in the sum of $750 in damages. The appellees filed grounds for a new trial. In the grounds for a new trial, they complained that the court was in error to their prejudice, by permitting, over their objection, proof to be made by appellant of what occurred in the city hall after she arrived there, and when Kohler was not present, and also complained of the verdict being excessive, and of misconduct of the counsel for appellant upon the trial. The circuit court sustained the motion to set aside the verdict of the jury, and granted a new trial upon the sole ground that it was in error against riding, she was allowed to walk to the police station escorted by a fireman and policemen.

And the right to take into consideration the harsh or humiliating treatment of the plaintiff while in custody was impliedly upheld in the following cases, brought to recover for false imprisonment, in passing upon the question whether the damages were excessive. Ayres v. Harmon, — Ind. App. —, 104 N. E. 315 (where a woman was roughly treated before a crowd and the officer refused to take her to her friends near by); Davern v. Drew, 153 App. Div. 844, 138 N. Y. Supp. 1017 (plaintiff photographed, measured, and finger prints taken); Rucker v. Barker, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 151 S. W. 871 (plaintiff arrested in presence of crowd, struck with pistol, taken in hoodlum wagon, and locked up with negroes and Mexicans); S. H. Kress & Co. v. Lawrence, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 162 S. W. 448 (where a plaintiff was charged with stealing and pushed through a crowd of negroes and compelled to turn his pockets inside out); Hamilton v. Pacific Drug Co. 78 Wash. 689, 139 Pac. 642 (plaintiff awakened in his stateroom and placed under arrest and accorded same treatment as persons charged with crime).

But it has been held that no recovery can be had against one causing a wrongful arrest on account of the plaintiff's being subjected to a mock trial by his fellow prisoners, since this did not naturally flow from the defendant's wrongful act, but was outside of and beyond the natural current which had its origin in, and flowed from, such act. Southwestern Portland Cement Co. v. Reitzer, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 237, motion for rehearing denied in 135 S. W. 241.

In Ocean S. S. Co. v. Williams, 69 Ga. 251, in an action for false imprisonment, it was held that where the arrest of the plaintiff was legal the party causing it could not be held liable for the acts of the officer or person in charge of the prisoner after the arrest, unless it could be shown that they were done by his authority, or that he caused them. And to the same effect is Kreger v. Osburn, 7 Blackf. 74.

And in Hopkins v. Garthwaite, 28 La. Ann. 325, it was held that where the facts show a probable cause for the arrest of the plaintiff in an action for false imprisonment, and the defendant did not prompt the ill treatment of the plaintiff while in the lockup, he was not legally responsible for it.

in admitting the evidence for appellant complained of, and that without that evidence, the verdict was excessive. This trial occurred in March, and the new trial was granted on the 18th day of April. The appellant excepted to the rulings of the court granting a new trial, and prayed an appeal to this court. On the 8th day of June the case came on again for trial, and resulted in a verdict of the jury for 1 cent in damages in favor of the appellant, and judgment was rendered accordingly. The appellant then filed grounds and moved the court to grant her a new trial and to set aside the last judgment, and to substitute and enter for it the first judgment in the case. The grounds relied upon by appellant for a new trial were that the court erred in refusing to allow the appellant to make proof of the occurrences at the city hall when Kohler was not present; and because of the admission, over her objection, of incompetent testimony offered by the appellee; and refusing to instruct the jury as set out in an instruction that was offered, marked "A;" and because the court erred in instructing the jury; and that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence. The court overruled her motion for a new trial, and to this she excepted. The court also overruled her motion to enter the judgment rendered upon the first trial as the judgment of the court, or to set aside the order granting a new trial after the first judgment. To these rulings she also excepted, and now appeals to this court.

The instructions of the court given upon the last trial are the same as those given upon the first trial, to which no objection was made by the appellant at their giving upon the first or last trial. Not having made any objection to the instructions given until the motion for a new trial, the appellant cannot now complain of the instructions which were given by the court, and, besides, the instructions seem to fairly present the issues raised in the evidence and upon the pleadings, and the measure of damages fixed by the instructions seems to be correct.

Upon both trials, the verdict of the jury has been to the effect that the appellant was arrested by the appellee without right, and forcibly and against her will she was required to accompany him to the city hall, and, besides, as above mentioned, by his answer he fails to deny that he did either of these things. We are, however, of the opinion that the court below was in error upon the last trial, when it excluded from the consideration of the jury, over the objection of the appellant, evidence relating to the things which occurred at the city hall after appellant arrived there, and before she was permitted to leave. For the purpose of determining the correctness of this ruling, as well as others in the case, it will be necessary to give a short statement of the facts which the evidence conduces to prove. The evidence upon each trial was substantially the same, except in the last trial the evidence as to what occurred in the city hall when Kohler was not present was excluded over the objection of appellant.

The evidence for appellant conduces to prove that on the evening of March 20th, 1913, at about 7 o'clock, an automobile marked with letters upon the side "Louisville Police Patrol" came to Milton avenue and stopped about two doors from the door of appellant's father's home. The automobile was accompanied by the appellee, Moritz Stickler, the guard, and the chauffeur, dressed in the uniform of policemen of the city; that appellee first went into the house of one Elfring, and then came out and went into the house of one Haering, who lived next door to Boutellier, and coming out of the house of Haering, he approached the yard gate at the Boutellier home, and inquired if Marie Boutellier lived there. Being answered in the affirmative by one of the family, and the appellant, who was then roller skating upon the sidewalk, coming up at that time, he was told that there she was, and then he commenced to say something to her, when he was invited to come into the house by the sister of appellant, which invitation he accepted, and the appellant then inquired of him what he wanted with her, and he said "that Major Ridge wanted to talk with her, and had ordered him to come and bring her down to the city hall with him." She protested that she had not been guilty of anything, and that there must be some mistake about it, and asked who Ridge was, stating that she did not know him. He informed her that Ridge was the night chief of police. At her request he then stated that if she would accompany him to Haering's house, he would call up Ridge, and talk with him over the telephone. They then went into Haering's house, where the appellee called up someone, appellant did not know who, and said that he had a girl there named Marie, and that the reply to this was "to bring her on down." There were other communications between the appellee and the person to whom he was talking, resulting in appellee asking appellant if she had ever been to Bierod's on First and Market. She answered that she had not; that she worked at Roth's jewelry establishment at First and Market. He then hung up the receiver, and said that she would have to go down to the city hall with him. She asked him to permit her to go on the street car, or said that she would go with him on the street car, but he replied that he had orders to bring her down with him. They went into the appellant's home for the purpose of her securing her cloak and hat, and while there her mother proposed that she would take the appellant down to the city hall on the street car, when appellee said that he had orders to bring her down with him. The automobile was then moved away a square and one-half to avoid attracting attention to the fact that she was being arrested and taken away by the police, but the movements of appellee and the presence of the police patrol had caused quite a number of people to congregate, and when they went out of appellant's home, the appellee had to order the people out of the way, so as to make an exit from the yard. She accompanied him in the automobile to the city hall, where he carried her into an office and delivered her to some other persons in a room, when a person whom she did not know, with two pistols in his hands, took her into another room, and, there presenting the pistols toward her, inquired if she had ever seen them before, and when she stated that she had not, he inquired of her if she was at Liederkrantz Hall on the night of the homicide which had recently occurred, and when she answered that she was not, and never had been there in her life, he then asked her about different men and women of whom she had never heard, and as to whether or not she attended dance halls, and when she answered in the negative, some of the parties present said they had made a mistake; that she was not the party wanted. She was then taken into another room where another officer was, and the statement was made to him that she was innocent, and they had made a mistake, and she was then permitted to leave the city hall. While she was being quizzed by the individual with the pistols, who was dressed in plain clothes, two policemen in uniform were standing around her, and gazing very intently upon her. The appellee was not present in the room to which the individual with the pistols carried her. When she emerged from the room, she again met appellee, who was standing near, and who inquired of her if she had money to pay her car fare back home, and she answered that she had. He then invited her to accompany him in the automobile, as he was going in a square or two of her home. She did accompany him so far as he went in the automobile, and upon leaving it, thanked him. She testified that she was greatly chagrined and mortified and frightened by her experiences, and in addition to that contracted a very severe cold by riding in the automobile, which traveled very fast and she being warm from her exercises in skating. As to the circumstances of her arrest, and what took place before she started to the city hall, she is corroborated by her family and neighbors.

The evidence offered by the appellees tend to show that on the day upon which the arrest occurred, of which the appellant complains, Carroll, who is a sergeant of police and in charge of the switch board in the office of the night chief of police, called up Kohler by telephone, and told him that there was a girl named Marie, whose other name he did not know, and who lived on Milton avenue next door to Haering, and for him to go up there and get her and bring her down to the chief's office, that the night chief wanted to speak to her. Kohler, accompanied by Strickler and the chauffeur, went to Milton avenue, and inquired where Haering lived, and went in and asked him if there was any girl in the neighborhood by the name of Marie. He received information that there were two Marias there, one of whom was Marie Green, and lived on the opposite side of the street, and the other, Marie Boutellier, that lived in the adjoining house. That he went from there to the Boutellier home, where he found the appellant, and told her that Major Ridge wanted to speak to her, and to make sure they would go to the telephone and call him up. That when they went to the telephone, Carroll told him to ask her if she worked at Roth's jewelry store at First and Market, and upon receiving an affirmative answer, Carroll told him to ask her if she knew a certain man, and that she answered, "Yes," and he (Carroll) then said "to tell her to come on down," and that he (appellee) said to her: "You are wanted at the night chief's office; Major Ridge wants to speak to you." That she said, "All right." That she went and got her hat and jacket at her home, and that he and she then got into the automobile and went down to the city hall, and entered into the city hall at a place where one door leading to the south goes into the night chief's office, and the one to the north into the officer's room, and when they got there the night chief's office was closed, and that he went in and said to Sergeant Ridge "that there was the young lady," and at about that time he turned around, and she was gone into the "assembly" room, and that was the last he saw of her, and that the next he saw of her, she and Captain Hogan were standing on the steps, and that he inquired of her if she had money to pay her car fare home, and she answered, "Yes," and he then invited her to get into the machine; that he was going to Preston and Burnett streets, and she could go to Preston and Oak and make better time. She got into the machine and rode to Preston and Oak, and got out, and thanked him.

It is very apparent that the appellee Kohler, although he stated that he did not know for what purpose she was desired at the city hall, knew that he was bringing her to the city hall for the purpose of her being taken in charge by other officers, and there to be quizzed and examined for some purpose or other.

If the appellee Kohler, in the first instance, had had a right to make the arrest, he would not have been liable in any way for subsequent mistreatment which appellant received at the hands of other parties into whose custody she was lawfully delivered by him, and with which mistreatment the appellee had nothing to do. If an officer armed with a warrant executes it by the arrest of the party accused, and, as the law requires, takes him before a magistrate, or commits him to jail if the warrant so authorizes him, the officer making the arrest is not in any way liable for the damages suffered by the party, either by confinement in jail, or by the hands of any other officers into whose custody the accused may be placed; or, if one is justified in having criminal or penal process issued against another, and does so, such person is not liable for any damages which may result to the accused party by the mistreatment of the officer executing the process, or resulting from his confinement in jail, where he is placed by a committing magistrate; but if an officer makes a wrongful arrest, and the arrest and detention are wrongful, he is then responsible for all the damages which are suffered by the arrested party, and which are the direct results of the wrongful arrest and detention.

In the case of Illinois C. R. Co. v. Wilson, 31 Ky. L. Rep. 789, 103 S. W. 364, where it was alleged that a policeman had unlawfully arrested Wilson and accused him of the crime of larceny, and searched his person in a public place in order to find evidence of his alleged guilt upon him, the court held that testimony relating to the effect after his release which such arrest and search had upon his nervous system, as the result of such arrest and search, and evidence to the effect that after he was released from arrest it was necessary for him to have the services of a physician and treatment in a sanatorium, where all facts competent to be proven, touching his claim for damages.

jail. This court held that she was entitled to damages for her deprivation of liberty while in jail, and the impairment of her health arising from her confinement in jail, and her mental and physical sufferings which were the direct and proximate results of her imprisonment. If the officer had had justifiable grounds for her arrest, as, for instance, she had committed an offense in his presence, or if he had had reasonable grounds to believe that she had been guilty of a felony, and as a result had made the arrest, or if he had been armed with a warrant for her arrest, he would have been held harmless from any things which she might thereafter suffer as a consequence of the arrest.

In the case of Hall v. Hall, 3 Allen, 5, Hall was arrested by an officer on a warrant issued by a tax collector, for unpaid taxes, and was committed to jail upon the warrant. The court held that the officer was not justified in making the arrest, because, under the laws in that jurisdiction, he could not take the body by virtue of a warrant of that kind, where there was property which could have been taken for the payment of the taxes, and, as a result of the illegal arrest, that the officer was liable for the damages suffered by Hall for his detention in prison, and the inconvenience and suffering to which it subjected him, as being a direct consequence of the illegal act of the officer in service of the distress warrant, and proof of such inconvenience and suffering was therefore competent.

In the case of Fenelon v. Butts, 53 Wis. 344, 10 N. W. 501, Butts, by means of some preliminary proceeding which the court held to be unauthorized and illegal, accomplished the arrest and imprisonment of Fenelon, and it was held that proof of the condition and circumstances of the Fenelon family, and the filthy condition of the jail in which she was confined by Butts and others, were proper elements of damages to be recovered by her; the arrest in this case having been held to be wrongful.

The cases of Jacques v. Parks, 96 Me. 268, 52 Atl. 763; Scott v. Flowers, 60 Neb. 680, 84 N. W. 81; Abrahams v. Cooper, 81 Pa. 232; Drumm v. Cessnum, 61 Kan. 472, 59 Pac. 1078; and Kindred v. Stitt, 51 Ill. 401, are all in accordance with the authorities above cited.

In Miller v. Fano, 134 Cal. 109, 66 Pac. 185, a police officer having a warrant of arrest for one man, by a mistake as to his identity, arrested another and delivered him to a constable from Los Angeles, who took him to that place and put him in jail. The court held, upon a suit for damages for the false arrest and imprisonment against the officer first making the arrest, that the imprisonment at Los Angeles and the inconveniences of it and the condition of the prison were proper elements of damages to be considered by the jury. The court used the following language: "He placed plaintiff in the custody of the Los Angeles officials, . . . and all the facts and circumstances connected with his unlawful imprisonment were admissible in evidence. 3 Sutherland, Damages, 2d ed. § 1257."

In the case of San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Griffin, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 91, 48 S. W. 542, the court held that in an action for damages for imprisonment on a false charge the plaintiff may give in evidence the facts as to his treatment while in confinement, at the hands of the public authorities, as bearing on the amount of damages.

Ocean S. S. Co. v. Williams, 69 Ga. 251; Kreger v. Osborn, 7 Blackf. 74; and Hopkins v. Garthwaite, 28 La. Ann. 325, are not applicable to the question in issue. In these cases, supra, the court held that the arrest was legal, and for that reason the party causing it was not liable for after-treatment, where they did not prompt the after-treatment.

In the case at bar, the arrest being unlawful, and the detention unlawful and unauthorized, and the proof conducing to show that appellee Kohler delivered the appellant at the city hall into the hands of other officers and persons who displayed the firearms in a threatening way, and quizzed her in an annoying and offensive manner, if they did so, these things directly resulted from the unlawful arrest and detention to which she had been subjected by the appellee. The exclusion of this testimony upon the last trial was very prejudicial to the substantial rights of the appellant, and for that reason the court below should have set aside the verdict and judgment in the last trial and granted her a new trial. It follows that the trial court was in error when it granted a new trial, after the first trial and judgment, on the ground that it had erroneously permitted the appellant to put in evidence the occurrences at the city hall after appellee had taken her there and turned her over to others in the room, and was not present himself.

The counsel for appellees, however, insist that they were entitled to a new trial, because of the misconduct of appellant's attorney by prejudicial statements made by him to the jury in his closing argument, and because the court misinstructed the jury as to the law of the case, and refused to peremptorily instruct the jury to find for appellees at the conclusion of appellant's testimony, and at the conclusion of all of the testimony, and because the verdict was excessive. As to the instructions, it does not appear that appellees offered any instructions in writing which the court was asked to give. They did not offer an instruction in writing directing the jury to find a verdict for them at any time, nor offer any instructions at all. The court did not owe the duty to give such an instruction, unless it was offered in writing. Traders' Deposit Bank v. Henry, 105 Ky. 707, 49 S. W. 536; Webster v. Green, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1456, 60 S. W. 714.

Aside from this reason, however, the evidence was amply sufficient of the forcible arrest and detention of appellant to require the court to submit the issue to the jury. The instructions given by the court to the jury fairly present the issues, and were not in anywise prejudicial to appellees.

The alleged misconduct of appellant's attorney consisted in his reference, in his argument, to the fact that the attorney for the appellees was an assistant city attorney. This statement was objected to by appellees at the time, not because it was not true, but because there was no evidence of it in the record. The court did not pass upon the objection, but the attorney making the statement, at the time of the objection, conceded the fact that it was not in the record. It does not appear how this occurrence could in anywise prejudice the appellees. We do not see how the fact of a litigant's attorney being an assistant attorney for the city could in anywise inflame or prejudice the jury against the cause of the litigant.

The other language alleged to have been used by appellant's attorney, and claimed to have been prejudicial, was not objected to by appellees, and notice of it appears for the first time in the motion for a new trial. No mention is made in the bill of exceptions of any language prejudicial to appellees, as having been made use of by appellant's attorney, and for that reason it is not before us for consideration. An attorney, who, in the presence of the court and jury in the trial of a case, departs from the record and attempts to bring into the trial statements of outside matters which have no connection with a proper determination of the issues and are not legitimate arguments upon an issue in the case, forgets the duty which as an attorney he owes to the court and the pure administration of justice, but we cannot consider such matters unless they are presented to us in the way provided by law. When the party complaining has waived the matter himself by making no objection at the time, he cannot thereafter complain. The language complained of, under the circumstances, was not prejudicial.

In an action for false arrest and imprisonment, the injury to the feelings and mental sufferings arising from the mortification, shame, fear, and humiliation suffered by the arrested party from the circumstances of the arrest and detention, are proper elements for damages to be considered by the jury, as well as the physical inconveniences suffered. The rule applying in such cases is that the successful plaintiff is entitled to compensation for all the natural and probable consequences of the wrong, including injury to the feelings from humiliation, indignity, and disgrace, and injury to the person and physical suffering, interruption of business, and loss of time from the restraint. 19 Cyc. 368. It has been said that no sum which is not per se evidence of prejudice or corruption is excessive for such indignities and suffering, where deprivation of liberty and injury to character result. Holburn v. Neal, 4 Dana, 120. The rule seems to be that in such cases the court will not disturb the verdict of a properly instructed jury on account of the sum of damages allowed being excessive, unless it appears that there is a flagrant abuse of discretion by the jury, or that the jury was actuated by passion or prejudice. Taking into consideration the youth, sex, the entire absence of a legal right to make the arrest, and the probable consequences of it, the sum of $750, the amount of the first verdict, is not excessive.

There being no ground upon which the trial court was authorized to set aside the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court upon the first trial, the order granting a new trial was erroneous. The only ground assigned by the court for its action was founded upon an error as to the law. In the case of Perkins v. Ogilvie, 148 Ky. 309, 146 S. W. 735, this court held that, "while the trial court is vested with a broad discretion in granting a new trial, yet if he grants a new trial solely on the ground of an error of law, which as a matter of fact is not an error, and the other grounds relied upon are not sufficient to justify his action, it is error, under such circumstances, to grant a new trial."

The appeal by appellant from the judgment on the last trial brings before us for consideration the action of the trial court in granting a new trial. Both bills of exceptions are contained in the record. Being of the opinion that the trial court erred in granting the new trial, it follows that the appellant is entitled to have the judgment appealed from set aside, and the judgment rendered on the verdict at the first trial reinstated.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment appealed from be reversed, and this cause remanded to the court below for proceedings in conformity to this opinion.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN T. ARMSTEAD, Respt.,
v.
GEORGE H. LOUNSBERRY, Appt., and
INSURANCE COMPANY OF NORTH AMERICA, Intervener, Appt.

(129 Minn. 34, 151 N. W. 542.)

Automobile—negligent collision.

1. Defendant was driving an automobile on a public street. He saw plaintiff's automobile in front of him, and headed in the same direction, commence to turn in the street. Practically the whole width of the street was required to make the turn. Defendant could have stopped his car and avoided a collision. Instead of doing so, he increased his speed and attempted to pass ahead of plaintiff's car before it should reach the left curb. The result was a collision. Held, the evidence was sufficient to charge the defendant with negligence.

Same—contributory negligence.

2. The evidence sustains a finding that plaintiff was not negligent in making the turn. The law of the road has no application to such a case. Violation of a city ordinance requiring a driver to look to the rear before turning is negligence per se, but if one riding with him looks and then directs him to go ahead, the ordinance is complied with.

Same—absence of registry—effect.

3. The fact that plaintiff's automobile is not registered as required by law does not prevent his recovery. Violation of law on the part of plaintiff which will preclude a recovery for an injury sustained by him must bear to the injury the relation of cause to effect.

automobile as required by the laws of the state will not preclude a recovery in case of a negligent injury by another, is in accord with the generally accepted rule.

This rule was applied in Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Aetna Acci. & Liability Co. 184 Ala. 601, 64 So. 45, where the court held that the fact that an automobile was not registered was immaterial in an action against another for negligently colliding with the machine and causing damage. The court said: "If the automobile was not registered, the owner thereof may be guilty of a violation of one of the criminal laws of the state, but that fact in no way affected the general duty which the defendant owes to the law, to so operate its cars as not to negligently injure the person or property of any person. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the automobile was not registered, had no causal connection whatever with the injury of which the plaintiff complains, and that fact, if it be a fact, in no way contributed to the injury to the automobile."

The same result was reached in Crossen v. Chicago & J. Electric R. Co. 158 Ill. App. 42, and Yeager v. Winton Motor Carriage Co. 53 Pa. Super Ct. 202.

covery for an injury to an unregistered automobile or its occupants can be had against another in the absence of wanton and wilful negligence on the latter's part, it being held that the operation of an unlicensed automobile on the highway constitutes such a trespass as bars a recovery.

This rule was adhered to in Dean v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 217 Mass. 495, 105 N. E. 616, which was an action against a railway company to recover for injuries sustained by reason of a collision between a street car and an unregistered automobile, it being held that all occupants of the unregistered machine were trespassers upon the highway, and had no rights against other travelers except to be protected from reckless or wanton injury.

It was held in this case that the evidence, which among other things showed a failure of the motorman to see the automobile and bring his car to a stop before the collision occurred, did not show such wanton and wilful conduct on the part of the defendant's motorman as to render the company liable. Ibid.

The burden of proving that the plaintiff's automobile was unregistered at the time of collision was held to be upon the defendant. Ibid.

Hallam, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff and defendant Lounsberry, each driving an automobile, came into collision on London road, in Duluth. Both sustained some damage. Each lays the whole blame on the other. Plaintiff sued to recover his damage from defendant. Defendant had insurance in intervener insurance company, and intervener paid to him the amount of his damage, and in this action it asks to be reimbursed by plaintiff. The court submitted the case to the jury and a verdict was rendered for plaintiff. The jury must have found defendant negligent and plaintiff free from negligence. Defendant and intervener contend the evidence does not sustain such finding.

1. Plaintiff's car stood on the right-hand side of the street, facing east. In company with an automobile salesman plaintiff boarded the car. Either at the time of starting or soon thereafter he commenced to turn in order to go west. The street was 48 feet wide and he required 45 feet in which to make the turn. Defend-

And it was held that it should be ruled as a matter of law that the plaintiff's automobile was unregistered at the time of the accident, where there was testimony that the plaintiff was the owner of an automobile which was identified by the manufacturer's number, and that it was the only car he owned or had registered at the time the accident occurred or the year before, and that he was unable to find his registration certificate, and where the records of the highway commission covering the time in question were produced, which showed that the machine in question was registered the year preceding the accident, but failed to show an application by the defendant for registration the year of the accident, prior to its occurrence, and where the accuracy of the records was not attacked. Ibid.

In Gould v. Elder, 219 Mass. 396, 107 N. E. 59, it was held that if an automobile which was negligently operated and caused an injury was not lawfully registered as provided by the statute of 1909, which required registration and made the operation of an unregistered machine a criminal offense, the owner could not legally operate it upon the highway, nor lawfully authorize or permit any other person to so operate it, and that if he did permit his unregistered car to be driven on the highway by his son, he was liable for an injury resulting from its negligent operation, whether the son was acting within the scope of his employment or was using it in connection with his own business or pleasure.

ant was coming from behind; that is, from the west. Defendant's own testimony is that he was coming at 13 miles an hour; that he saw plaintiff start to turn when he was still 40 feet away. Defendant could, without doubt, have avoided a collision by then stopping his car. Instead of doing so, he speeded his car to 25 miles an hour and made an attempt to pass in front of plaintiff's car before it should reach the left curb in the course of its turn. He did not quite succeed. The rear wheel of his car collided with the right front fork of plaintiff's. The jury were justified in finding defendant negligent.

2. Whether plaintiff was also negligent is a more difficult question. He had recently purchased his car and had taken but three lessons in its operation. He was then operating it under the direction of one Maxon, the salesman from whom he bought it. There is evidence, however, from which the jury might find that he was operating the car with reasonable care and skill. He had a right to turn around in the street and take as much space as necessary for that purpose so long as he used due care. The law of the road does not apply to such a case. Lyford v. Jacob Schmidt Brewing Co. 110 Minn. 158, 124 N. W. 831.

There is an ordinance of the city of Duluth which requires every person using any vehicle on the street, before turning around, to look to the rear, and which makes violation of the ordinance gross negligence. This ordinance is for the protection of such as

car to be driven on the highway by his son, he was liable for an injury resulting from its negligent operation, whether the son was acting within the scope of his employment or was using it in connection with his own business or pleasure.

But it was held that the owner would not be liable for an injury resulting from its negligent operation if his son took the machine and used it without his consent or permission, either express or implied. Ibid.

It was further held in this case that where the statute provided: "'Dealer' shall include every person who is engaged in the business of buying, selling, or exchanging motor vehicles, on commission or otherwise, and every person who lets for hire two or more motor vehicles," an automobile registered in the name of a son carrying on a garage as agent and employee of his father, the owner, was illegally registered. Ibid.

In McNeil v. Webeking, 66 Fla. 407, 63 So. 728, it was held that where the pleadings set forth an action at common law against the operator of an automobile for negligently frightening the plaintiff's horse and causing an injury, the absence of an allegation that the automobile was registered was not fatal.

J. T. W.

defendant, and if plaintiff failed to obey it such failure was negligence per se. Schaar v. Comforth, 128 Minn. 480, 151 N. W. 275. Plaintiff's evidence is that Maxon, knowing that plaintiff intended to turn, did look to the rear, and upon doing so directed plaintiff to go ahead. Maxon testified to the same effect, and testified that defendant's automobile was not then in sight, had not yet rounded a curve which was some 700 feet away. If Maxon looked and gave direction to plaintiff as claimed, the ordinance was complied with. It was not indispensable that plaintiff himself look. Schaar v. Comforth, supra. If the ordinance was complied with, it does not necessarily follow that plaintiff was exercising due care. The ordinance does not prescribe the full measure of care required of the driver of an automobile. He is under the constant duty of exercising ordinary care. But what is ordinary care is, within reasonable limits, a question of fact for the jury to determine. There is some conflict in the evidence. It is by no means certain that plaintiff was exercising due care. The jury might have found either way. Its finding that plaintiff was not negligent has some evidence to sustain it, the trial court approved it, and we think this court should not set it aside.

3. Defendant contends plaintiff is barred of recovery in this action because his automobile was not registered as provided by law. Laws 1909, chap. 259, § 8, provides: "No person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle on the public highways of this state . . . unless such vehicle shall have been registered . . . and shall have the tag of registration assigned to it by the secretary of state conspicuously displayed on the rear of such vehicle. . . ."

Plaintiff had not complied with this law. Defendant contends that he was therefore a trespasser upon the street, and that the only duty the traveling public owed to him was a duty not to wilfully or wantonly injure him. We do not concur in this contention. The fact that a person who sustains injury at the hands of another is at the time engaged in violation of some law may have an important bearing upon his right to recover. His violation of the law may be evidence against him, and in some cases may wholly defeat recovery. Ericson v. Duluth & I. Range R. Co. 57 Minn. 26, 58 N. W. 822; Oddie v. Mendenhall, 84 Minn. 58, 86 N. W. 881, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 297; Day v. Duluth Street R. Co. 121 Minn. 445, 141 N. W. 795. But it is not every violation of the law that is even material evidence against him. The right of a person to maintain an action for a wrong committed upon him is not taken away because he was at the time of the injury disobeying a statute law which in no way contributed to his injury. He is not placed outside all protection of the law, nor does he forfeit all his civil rights, merely because he is committing a statutory misdemeanor. The wrong on the part of plaintiff which will preclude a recovery for an injury sustained by him must be some act or conduct having the relation to that injury of a cause to the effect produced by it. Sutton v. Wauwatosa, 29 Wis. 21, 9 Am. Rep. 534; Philadelphia W. & B. R. Co. v. Philadelphia & H. de G. Steam Towboat Co. 23 How. 209, 16 L. ed. 433. Plaintiff's violation of the law, in order to affect his case, must, like any other act, "be a proximate cause in the same sense in which the defendant's negligence must have been a proximate cause in order to give any right of action." 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 94. A collateral unlawful act not contributing to the injury will not bar a recovery. Hughes v. Atlanta Steel Co. 136 Ga. 511, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 547, 71 S. E. 728, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 394, 1 N. C. C. A. 429.

Plaintiff's violation of law in this case is of this collateral character. There was no relation of cause and effect between the unlawful act and the collision. The registration of plaintiff's automobile was of no consequence to defendant. The law providing for such registration was not for the prevention of collisions and had no tendency to prevent collisions. There is no pretense that the registration of plaintiff's automobile would have had any tendency to prevent this collision. Plaintiff's failure to obey the law in no way contributed to his injury and could not bar his right of recovery. This rule is sustained by the great weight of authority. Birmingham R. Light & P. Co. v. Aetna Acci. & Liability Co. 184 Ala. 601, 64 So. 44; Hemming v. New Haven, 82 Conn. 661, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 734, 74 Atl. 892, 18 Ann. Cas. 240; Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Weir, 63 Fla. 74, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 307, 58 So. 641, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 126; Hughes v. Atlanta Steel Co. supra; Crossen v. Chicago & J. Electric R. Co. 158 Ill. App. 42; Luckey v. Kansas City, 169 Mo. App. 666, 155 S. W. 873; Shaw v. Thielbahr, 82 N. J. L. 23, 81 Atl. 497; Hyde v. McCreery, 145 App. Div. 729, 130 N. Y. Supp. 269; Yeager v. Winton Motor Carriage Co. 53 Pa. Super Ct. 202; Elliott, Roads & Streets, § 1115.

The contrary rule obtains in Massachusetts. Dudley v. Northampton Street R. Co. 202 Mass. 443, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 561, 89 N. E. 25; Feeley v. Melrose, 205 Mass. 329, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1156, 137 Am. St. Rep. 445, 91 N. E. 306; Chase v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 208 Mass. 137, 94 N. E. 377;

Dean v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 217 Mass. 495, 105 N. E. 616. It is held in these cases, under a statute similar to ours, that failure to register an automobile is a cause which directly contributes to any injury received in its operation; that the statute was "intended to outlaw unregistered machines, and to give them . . . no other right than that of being exempt from reckless, wanton, or wilful injury. They were to be no more travelers than is a runaway horse" (Dudley v. Northampton Street R. Co. 202 Mass. 447, supra; that "everything in the conduct of the operator that enters into the propulsion of the vehicle is under the ban of the law. In going along the way . . . the machine is an outlaw. The operator, in running it there and thus bringing it into collision, . . . is guilty of conduct which is permeated in every part by his disobedience of the law" (Chase v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 208 Mass. 158, supra; that "any person on the street as an occupant of the automobile, participating in the movement of it," is for the time being a trespasser (Bourne v. Whitman, 209 Mass. 155, 172, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 701, 95 N. E. 404, 408, 2 N. C. C. A. 318). It is even held that lady passengers who accept the courtesy of a ride in such an automobile, with no knowledge of the matter of registration, do so "at their peril;" that they are not travelers, but trespassers, and "unlawfully upon the way," and under the same disability as to recovery for injuries received as the owner or driver. Feeley v. Melrose, 205 Mass. 329, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1156, 137 Am. St. Rep. 445, 91 N. E. 306. This doctrine was adopted in Massachusetts by a divided court (Dudley v. Northampton Street R. Co. 202 Mass. 443, 447, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 561, 89 N. E. 25; Bourne v. Whitman, supra), and much force is taken from the weight of these cases as authority by a late decision that "the law of these . . . cases should not be extended to the provision of the statute requiring every operator to have a personal license to operate the car" (Bourne v. Whitman, 209 Mass. 172, supra). It appears to us the weight of argument, as well as the weight of authority, is against the rule of the Massachusetts cases, and in accordance with the rule we have above laid down.

Rogers v. Greenwood, 14 Minn. 333, Gil. 256; Bisbee v. McAllen, 39 Minn. 143, 39 N. W. 299, and Leuthold v. Stickney, 116 Minn. 299, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 231, 133 N. W. 556, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 405, are plainly distinguishable from the case at bar. They were actions upon contract. In each case the illegality in question consisted in the violation of some statute designed to protect parties making such contracts, and the L.R.A.1915D.

defendant in the action was within the class which the statute was designed to protect.

An ordinance of Duluth provides that before any person shall operate a motor vehicle upon the streets of the city, he must obtain a license from the city. Plaintiff had no such license. For reasons similar to those stated above, we think this fact cannot bar recovery. See also, Lindsay v. Cecchi, 3 Boyce (Del.) 133, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 699, 80 Atl. 523, 1 N. C. C. A. 88.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

ELIZABETH McM. GODLEY

v.

CRANDALL & GODLEY COMPANY et al.

Corporation — action by minority stockholder to compel accounting for money distributed to employees.

1. A minority stockholder may maintain an action on behalf of the corporation to compel directors to account for money which they have distributed to employees under the guise of dividends upon stock held by them, above the rate of dividend declared on such stock, in accordance with the amount of stock held, and not of services rendered.

Pleading — variance — absence of objection — effect.

2. The variance caused by proof without objection, or money paid employees in addition to that paid the directors themselves, in an action to compel the directors to account for money paid themselves, may be disregarded.

Same — recovery for years not claimed.

3. Recovery cannot be allowed in an action to compel directors of a corporation to account for salaries alleged to have been illegally paid for years prior to the time claimed in the complaint or set up in plaintiff's evidence.

Corporation — action to compel directors to account for salary.

4. A minority stockholder of a corporation may maintain an action on behalf of Note. — Right of directors to vote bonus to officers as compensation for services.

This note does not include cases where there was an implied contract to pay for services, and the resolution fixing the amount was passed after the services had been rendered; nor cases which hold that an officer cannot recover for services unless such services followed a by-law or resolution authorizing payment therefor. See, for example, Danville, H. & W. B. R. Co. v. Kase, 41 W. N. C. 411, 39 Atl. 301; Ellis v. Ward, 137 Ill. 509, 25 N. E. 530.

For ratification of acts of directors by the corporation to compel directors to account for salaries voted themselves out of profits for services already performed.

Same — ratification of acts.

5. The majority stockholders of a corporation who have received preferential payment out of profits of the concern, through the acts of the directors, cannot ratify such acts after the beginning of an action by minority stockholders to compel the directors to account for the money so misappropriated.

Same — services against interest of corporation.

6. Directors of a corporation may, at the suit of minority stockholders, be compelled to account for money paid one of the officers for winding up the business, where the required majority did not agree to discontinue the business, and the services were destructive of the true interests of the corporation.

Same — discontinuance of business — exclusion of minority.

7. Majority stockholders cannot vote to discontinue the business of the corporation for the purpose of turning it over to another corporation and excluding minority stockholders from participation therein.

Same — closing business — duty to account for good will.

8. Directors of a corporation who attempt to close the business do not discharge their fiduciary duties simply by accounting for its tangible assets if it possesses a valuable good will.

Same — appropriation of good will — accounting.

9. A corporation and its directors who appropriate the good will of another corporation through collusion with its directors, without making compensation therefor may be compelled to account for its value to complaining stockholders.

Pleading — failure to give notice of claim — right to recovery.

10. Directors of a corporation against whom an action is brought to compel an accounting of funds of the corporation illegally appropriated by them should not be compelled to account in the action for the expenses of defending it, if they had no notice of such claim and the evidence is meager that they paid the expenses out of corporate funds.

Evidence — consent of prior stockholders.

11. Upon the question of liability of di-themselves grants of large sums for past services.

Directors may not vote themselves property for services when they had no claim for services which they could enforce against the company. Voorhees v. Mason, 245 Ill. 256, 91 N. E. 1056, supra. They may not vote back salary to officers for services gratuitously performed. Miller v. Crown Perfumery Co. 57 Misc. 383, 109 N. Y. Where directors allowed compensation to an officer for past services which did not call for compensation under the law when rendered, it was held that they had no authority to charge the assets for a debt where there was no debt; that their action was ultra vires. Ravenswood & S. G. R. Co. v. Woodyard, 46 W. Va. 558, 33 S. E. 285, supra, where the decision, however, takes the broad ground that a by-law or resolution preceding the services is required, and where there was also a statute providing that "there shall be no compensation for services rendered by the president or any director, unless it be allowed by the stockholders."

An issuance of an order for compensation for past services of directors gives no validity to the claim, which, being without legal or binding force or obligation before its allowance by the directors, and before the issuing of an order, remains so afterward. Maux Ferry Gravel Road Co. v. Branegan, 40 Ind. 361, supra.

Corporations — Liability of directors under resolutions adopted before their election.

12. Directors of a corporation may be compelled to account for money improperly paid out with their consent while they were directors, although the payments were made under resolutions adopted before they became such.

Suburban Gas & Fuel Co. v. Johnson, 81 N. J. Eq. 351, 88 Atl. 163, supra.

A mere moral obligation or gratuitous service performed by a party in the line of his legal duty and in an exuberance of good faith imposes no legal obligation which the board of directors have any right to turn into an actual obligation. Accommodation Loan & Sav. Fund Asso. v. Stonemetz, 29 Pa. 534, supra, where there was an attempt to compensate a director of a loan association for past services. But the court placed its decision further on the ground that a director as such ought not to be compensated; that if he wished to enter the employment of the corporation, he ought to resign and enter as any other man, unless the statute creating the corporation provided for compensation for directors.

A mutual life insurance company has no authority to contract to give a pension to the retiring president in recognition of his past services and of his agreement to serve the company in the future in an advisory capacity as far as his strength and health permit, where the true consideration for the pension was the idea of compensating him for his past services beyond what his salary had already been. Beers v. New York L. Ins. Co. 66 Hun, 75, 20 N. Y. Supp. 788. But it was further held that under the charter the trustees had no power to make a perpetual contract.

Where a railroad company in recognition of the services of a director in getting subscriptions for the capital stock, performed before the complete organization of the company, passed a resolution that he and his family should ride free during his life, it was held that the company might rescind the resolution as this was a mere gratuity. New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Ketchum, 27 Conn. 170.

In Re Dr. Voorhees Awning Hood Co. 187 Fed. 611, modified on other grounds in 110 C. C. A. 215, 188 Fed. 425, it was held that the president of a company had no right to commission on sales, either of stock or of material, except as there was a distinct agreement to that effect, which was not shown.

CROSS APPEALS from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, modifying a judgment of a Special Term, Part VI., for New York County, in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover certain moneys and the value of certain property alleged to have been fraudulently misappropriated by defendants. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Decker, Allen, & Storm and Edgar T. Brackett, for defendants:

The discontinuance of the business was not fraudulent. Under the circumstances the stockholders had a legal right to decline to re-establish the business; and the judgment is erroneous in awarding any re-

See also Martindale v. Wilson-Cass Co. 134 Pa. 348, 19 Am. St. Rep. 706, 10 Atl. 680, holding that a president and director of a corporation cannot recover for services rendered to the corporation performed in his capacity as director or as president, where he claims in excess of the regular salary as president, it not appearing, however, whether the board had made any resolution on the subject or not.

In Blair v. Telegram Newspaper Co. 172 Mass. 201, 51 N. E. 1080, it was held that a director and officer who had taken an excess of salary for many years, and then procured a vote of the board of directors ratifying it, must answer a bill to compel him to restore the money, the court not passing on the merits.

It would appear by the foregoing case of Voorhees v. Mason, 245 Ill. 256, 91 N. E. 1056, that it is still the general rule in Illinois that directors may not vote gratuities, notwithstanding the case of Rosehill Cemetery Co. v. Dempster, 223 Ill. 567, 79 N. E. 276, where a stockholder employed by a syndicate of stockholders rendered great services to the corporation at a time when it had no board of managers in control, and was afterward compensated by a vote of a board of managers for his services, before which time, however, he had been chosen treasurer with a salary. The court held that his services were begun before he was an officer, and were without the scope of his duties as officer, and that the board of managers had a right to pass the resolution compensating him, but it would seem to be at least doubtful whether he had any right of compensation against the corporation as such prior to the vote of the board of managers. The court said: "The rule . . . which prohibits the payment to an officer of a corporation for services, except where a by-law or a resolution provides for such compensation before the services were rendered, has no application to any other agent whom the corporation may employ in good faith and for a legitimate purpose; nor does it apply to an officer respecting duties not devolving on him by virtue of the office held."

covery on account of the loss of good will, trademarks or tradenames.

E. 363; Continental Ins. Co. v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 103 App. Div. 282, 93 N. Y. Supp. 27, affirmed in 187 N. Y. 225, 79 N. E. 1026; Wallace v. Long Island R. Co. 12 Hun, 460; Flynn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 158 N. Y. 493, 53 N. E. 520; Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Raymond, 70 Fed. 376;

Reference may be made to a number of other cases where the disallowance of back pay was supportable on other grounds, as—

—where the directors present when back pay was voted to the president were himself, his son, and the secretary, who was a mere clerk, Doe v. Northwestern Coal & Transp. Co. 78 Fed. 62;

—where the secretary and treasurer procured the election of his son as director, and induced his son and the other director to vote back pay to such secretary and treasurer, Monmouth Invest. Co. v. Means, 80 C. C. A. 527, 151 Fed. 159;

—where the court disallowed compensation or salary voted by directors to those of them who were officers for their services for the past year, on the ground that the services were not proven satisfactorily, Graves v. Mono Lake Hydraulic Min. Co. 81 Cal. 303, 22 Pac. 665;

—where the court held that it was illegal for the president of a company to vote to ratify his act in taking a larger amount for salary than he was entitled to, his vote being necessary to pass the ratifying resolution, Ward v. Davidson, 89 Mo. 445, 1 S. W. 846;

—where the treasurer's vote was necessary to pass the resolution for more than his agreed pay, and the court seems to have considered the vote void for this reason, and also because the officer could not have enforced his claim against the corporation, Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 317.

In Kleinschmidt v. American Min. Co. 49 Mont. 7, 139 Pac. 785, where it was held that the board of directors had no power to ratify the taking of money as compensation by the secretary, who was a member of the board, although he did not vote on the resolution, the court seems to proceed both upon the theory that the court had no power to recompense a secretary who was also a director, except by prearrangement, and also upon the theory that there was no express or implied contract in the case.

In Sears v. Kings County Elev. R. Co. 152 Mass. 151, 9 L.R.A. 117, 25 N. E. 98, where a verdict for an officer against the corporation was set aside on other grounds, L.R.A.1915D.

If the "additional salaries" were in fact dividends in which the plaintiff was not permitted to share, the judgment directing their repayment is erroneous because the payment of a dividend to some stockholders and not to all, is not an injury to the corporation.

Kavanaugh v. Commonwealth Trust Co. 181 N. Y. 121, 73 N. E. 562; Peckham v. Van Wagenen, 83 N. Y. 40, 38 Am. Rep. 392.

If the payments were in fact salaries, the plaintiff has not shown, and the court has not found, that their payment constituted the court did not in terms advert to the circumstance that the resolution on which the action was brought related to services prior to the passage of the resolution as well as to those in the future, it being considered that the resolution was not an absolute contract, but only a tentative one under certain circumstances.

In Carr v. Kimball, 153 App. Div. 825, 139 N. Y. Supp. 253, it was probably held that officers should not vote themselves back salaries when the salaries they are already receiving are excessive; but this feature of the case was comparatively insignificant and does not seem to be very clearly brought out.

In McConnell v. Combination Min. & Mill. Co. 30 Mont. 239, 104 Am. St. Rep. 703, 76 Pac. 194, s. c. subsequent hearing in 31 Mont. 563, 79 Pac. 248, the question seems to have turned chiefly on the vice of voting for one's own salary.

—statements of the rule.

In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. People's Mut. Ben. Asso. 42 Ohio St. 579, supra, the court said: "The new members of the association had a right to assume that the sums appropriated and paid by and to the trustees as for their services in former years were in full compensation therefor, and this scheme of voting back pay to themselves, by the trustees, cannot be justified by the most liberal construction of the statute under which the defendant was chartered."

In Jones v. Morrison, 31 Minn. 140, 16 N. W. 854, supra, the court, in holding that a voting of back pay by directors to some of their number as officers, either in excess of a fixed salary or in a case where there had been an understanding that there should be no compensation, is void and a mere gratuity, said: "The corporation owed them nothing; therefore was under no legal or moral obligation to pay them any part of the sums so appropriated to them. If such a transaction is to be sustained,—if the directors can legally, upon such pretexts, appropriate to themselves the corporate funds,—then the rights and interests of a an injury to the corporation, or that any reason exists why the corporation ought to require the money to be restored.

Brooklyn Lumber Co.* 184 N. Y. 152, 76 N. E. 1075.

There being no actual fraud shown in the payment of the salaries, regular or special, and it not being shown that they were excessive, the corporation had a right to ratify their payment, and the same directors who benefited by the payments had a right to vote their stock in favor of such ratification.

The payment of the salaries and the dis-stockholder rest on a very precarious footing," the court stating further that the authority of directors "does not extend to dividing the property of the corporation among themselves, nor giving it to others."

In National Loan & Invest. Co. v. Rockland Co. 36 C. C. A. 370, 94 Fed. 335, in holding that the president of a corporation was entitled to compensation voted him by the board of directors under an implied contract, the court said, inter alia: "Officers of a corporation who are also directors, and who without any agreement, express or implied, with the corporation or its owners, or their representatives, have voluntarily rendered their services, can recover no back pay or compensation therefor."

In Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland, 120 N. Y. 134, 8 L.R.A. 253, 17 Am. St. Rep. 619, 24 N. E. 381, it appeared that a resolution was passed by the board of directors that the president should be paid a salary of $25,000 per annum from the time of his election as such, and by a separate resolution it was resolved that the president might issue notes of the corporation for his salary, under which nearly two years arrears of salary were paid by way of promissory notes of the corporation. In holding that the directors who voted for the second resolution were liable for the notes, and that those who voted for the first resolution, while it was wrongful, were not so liable, unless they also voted for the second resolution, the court said: "They had no power, express or implied, to pass that resolution, or its predecessor, which provided a salary for the president. They could not thus give away the property of the corporation. They could not bind the stockholders by voting to appropriate the assets of the company to an illegal purpose. . . . Their action, as admitted on the record, was a violation of their duty as directors, a breach of trust, and a fraud upon the plaintiff."

There are some cases upon gratuities to servants or employees which are interesting in this connection.

In Cyclists' Touring Club v. Hopkinson, [1910] 1 Ch. 179, it was held that a club L.R.A.1915D.

might pay an annuity to a former "secretary" who was probably a mere employee, the memorandum of the association providing: "Nothing herein contained shall prevent the payment in good faith of remuneration to any officers or servants of the club, or to any member of the club or other person in return for any services actually rendered to the club." The court said: "In my opinion, in promoting the objects of a club such as the present one, it is most desirable to encourage faithful service amongst the officers and servants. This is a club with some 20,000 members, and it must obviously rely in great measure upon the services of its employees. It is of as much importance to a club as to a trading company to be able to hold out such inducements to officers and servants as will secure the best assistance. . . . In my opinion, the payment to a retired servant of the club by way of an annuity, or by way of pension, or by way of gratuity, is within the powers of the club as being a payment in furtherance of the best objects of the club. The fact that the payment is made by way of gratuity, and not under any legal liability, does not make it a payment outside the objects of the club. . . . Under the head of a payment for services actually rendered, a gratuity in respect of past long and faithful services may be awarded."

In Hampson v. Price's Patent Candle Co. 24 Week. Rep. 754, 45 L. J. Ch. N. S. 437, 34 L. T. N. S. 711, it was held that the directors had the power to give a gratuity of one week's wages to workmen at the end of the year, as it was reasonable thus to encourage the workmen to increased exertion.

Back pay allowed in a compromise of other disputes may be supported although it was not earned. Thus, in Jones v. Johnson, 86 Ky. 530, 6 S. W. 582, it was held that the directors of a bank, having removed the cashier, upon making a settlement with him to secure his overdrafts to the bank, had a right to allow him some-continuance of the business were acts of internal management, neither fraudulent in fact, nor ultra vires, which have been approved by a majority of the stockholders, and the plaintiff, a minority stockholder, cannot call them into question.

In Russell v. Henry C. Patterson Co. 232 Pa. 113, 36 L.R.A. (N.S.) 199, 81 Atl. 136, where there was a small question in the case whether the salaries for a year had been fixed by resolution to begin some eight days before the time of the resolution, the court thought it was not very clear that any salaries had been taken for these few days, but if so, that the principle of de minimis might apply.

It may be noted that in Francis v. Brigham-Hopkins Co. 108 Md. 233, 70 Atl. 95, where the annual meeting of a corporation and the first meeting of its directors were held in August, and the fiscal year began in July, it was held that the provision in the by-laws that the salaries were to be fixed before the officers were appointed was not mandatory, as the meeting of the board for the fixing of the salaries did not occur until a month after the beginning of the fiscal year of the company.

In Klein v. Independent Brewing Asso. 231 Ill. 594, 83 N. E. 434, it was held that while the increasing of a salary nearly at the end of the year to cover the period of the whole year was illegal, and a vote by the board of directors was illegal for that purpose, a director who had afterward participated for a considerable time in the directors' meetings, and had not raised any objection for a long period, was estopped from objecting.

In Reed v. Hayt, 109 N. Y. 659, 17 N. E. 418, stock was issued to the president of a corporation ostensibly in consideration of advances which he had made to the corporation and of his services as president, where it appeared that he had never claimed any compensation for his services. The case as stated is somewhat obscure, but the court seemed to hold that the transaction was legal as the amount advanced was a good consideration.

In Re Schaefer, 65 App. Div. 378, 73 N. Y. Supp. 57, affirmed in 171 N. Y. 686, 64 N. E. 1125, the division of extra compensation between officers is evidenced by the facts set forth in the report, but the probability is that all that was decided in the case was that the surrogate had no jurisdiction to determine the question.

Salaries of officers varying with profits.

There seems to be no question raised in the books but that an officer of a corporation may be paid a percentage of the profits. Such a circumstance is treated as a matter of course. Loewer v. Lonoke Rice Mill. Co. 111 Ark. 62, 161 S. W. 1042; Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 317; Young v. United States Mortg. & T. Co. 214 N. Y. 279, 108 N. E. 418, reversing 156 App. Div. 515, 141 N. Y. Supp. 364; Lummis & Co. v. Devine, 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 349.

In Fraker v. A. G. Hyde & Sons, 135 App. Div. 64, 119 N. Y. Supp. 879, the court approved a contract by which the treasurer of a corporation was to receive besides his salary a percentage of the net profits after allowing for the annual dividend. See also Fraker v. A. G. Hyde & Sons, 205 N. Y. 574, 98 N. E. 1103.

In Giveen v. Gans, 91 App. Div. 37, 86 N. Y. Supp. 450, affirmed in 181 N. Y. 538, 73 N. E. 1124, the court sustained a judgment for the plaintiff, an officer of the corporation, upon a contract with the corporation for a certain proportion of its profits in a certain line of business besides his salary, pointing out, however, that the plaintiff and the individual defendant were the sole stockholders of the corporation, and that the case under the circumstances was for the jury.

In Re Spanish Prospecting Co. [1911] 1 Ch. 92, 80 L. J. Ch. N. S. 210, 103 L. T. N. S. 609, 27 Times L. R. 76, 55 Sol. Jo. 63, 18 Manson, 191, 20 Ann. Cas. 677, the court sustained a contract for salary at a certain rate per month, not to be drawn "except only out of profits, if any, arising from the business of the company, which may from time to time be available for such purpose, but such salary shall nevertheless be cumulative, and accordingly any arrears thereof shall be payable out of any succeeding profits available as aforesaid."

Thus, in Mutual Adjustment Co. v. Ouellette, 70 Wash. 693, 127 Pac. 301, it was held that the salaries were payable only in case of profits, where the resolution fixing the salaries stated, "it being understood that the said salaries would be paid out of the net proceeds of the business."

In Jennery v. Olmstead, 36 Hun, 536, affirmed in 105 N. Y. 654, it was held that the president and actuary of a savings bank selves and others. It is the typical case of a dispute arising from the incorporation of a trading partnership followed by the death or incapacity of one of the members, and the adoption by the others of measures to limit the dividends of the inactive shareholder to what they conceive he ought to have. I shall consider under separate heads the objections to the judgment earnestly pressed by the learned counsel for the defendants, appellants.

1. The stock of the defendant corporation and of its predecessors, a New Jersey corporation, was substantially all owned by the partners upon the organization of the corporation, William D. Godley, the husband of the plaintiff, and Lyman F. Pettee, the testator of the defendants, Mary E. Pettee, Harry E. Pettee, and William C. Pettee. A small amount of stock was allotted to favored employees under an arrangement by which they were permitted to pay for the same from dividends. The defendant corporation was organized in May, 1895. Said Godley became ill and incapacitated soon thereafter and died in December, 1897; the plaintiff succeeding to his ownership of the stock. The said defendants' testator succeeded Godley as president and, together with the employee stockholders, held a majority of the stock and controlled the corporation. Godley had been president and said testator vice president of the New Jersey corporation. They had divided the earnings so that, in addition to salaries of $5,000 and $3,000 respectively, equally divided between them, they and the other common stockholders had each received 15 per cent for the year 1892, 15 per cent for the year 1893, and 13 per cent for the year 1894, which was credited to the stock account on the books of the company. On the 8th of July, 1896, and on the 1st of March, 1897, the directors adopted the following resolutions respectively:

"In order to show due appreciation to some of our best and trusted employees, be it resolved that we make to those an increase in salary for the year 1895, an amount that we can agree upon, to those we deem worthy according to their ability and service to the company, as has been the custom heretofore."

could not claim a compensation as out of profits by estimating advance above cost and interest on an unsold investment.

In Frames v. Bultfontein Min. Co. [1891] 1 Ch. 140, it was held that profits made on the winding up and sale of the assets of a corporation could not be looked to by a director as a part of his compensation, where the provision for remuneration of directors provided that, "as remuneration for their services, the directors shall be paid in each year, out of the funds of the company, either a sum of £300, or a sum equal to 3 per cent of the net profits of the company of such year, whichever shall be the larger sum," as this related to the profits as a going concern, and not to profits on the closing up of the business.

In Burland v. Earle [1902] A. C. 83, 71 L. J. P. C. N. S. 1, 50 Week. Rep. 241, 85 L. T. N. S. 553, 18 Times L. R. 41, 9 Manson 17, it was held that the manager was not included in the word "staff" in a resolution that "an increase of salary be given to the staff equal to 5 per cent on the capital stock held by each of them" to meet certain difficulties of removal of the corporation.

But an agreement between the officers of a corporation, while they are acting as such, that each shall have a salary for a term of years, and that the profits shall be distributed in a certain way, irrespective of the stock held by them, would be void as against public policy. Abbott v. Harbeson Textile Co. 162 App. Div. 405, 147 N. Y. Supp. 1031 (obiter).

Where the other holders of stock excluded the plaintiff from the management of the company, and absorbed substantially its earnings in excessive salaries, they were ordered to refund the excess to the corporation. L.R.A.1915D.

Miller v. Crown Perfumery Co. 57 Misc. 383, 109 N. Y. Supp. 760, modified on another ground in 125 App. Div. 881, 110 N. Y. Supp. 806, where the court points out that the understanding had been from the first, and before the breach between the parties, that if the profits did not warrant the payment of the salaries voted, "they would be proportionately reduced to such an amount as the profits would satisfy. In other words, for some undisclosed reason, the net profits, which were to be divided equally among them, were termed salaries. They treated 'salaries' and 'net profits' as synonymous terms."

See also Ziegler v. Hoagland, 52 Hun, 385, 5 N. Y. Supp. 305, for an example of a case of successive increases of salaries made to coerce a stockholder to sell his stock, which action was held to be spoliation of the company for an unworthy purpose.

It may be noted that in Williams v. McClave, 154 N. Y. Supp. 38, it was held that the vice president who performed no services must account to the trustee in bankruptcy of the company for her large salary in the years when the company was run at a loss but not in the years when it was run at a profit, where she owned almost all the stock of the company and the salary was really a provision made for her instead of dividends.

Of course, officers of a corporation cannot rightly take its funds for their services under the fiction that such an appropriation is in payment of salary or commissions on profits, unless in some proper form their action is authorized by the corporation. Von Arnim v. American Tube Works, 188 Mass. 515, 74 N. E. 680, where the facts are not fully stated, the case arising upon demurrer.

B. B. B.

"Be it resolved that in order to show due appreciation to some of our best and trusted employees, we make to those an annual increase in salary to continue until revoked by the board of directors."

Acting thereunder, they paid to themselves and the employee stockholders each year, from 1895 to 1908 inclusive, 9 per cent upon the common capital stock held by each, except in the years 1906, 1907, and 1908, when said amounts were paid only to the employee stockholders. During those years the directors received additional amounts under another resolution, to be considered under the following head. Neither the plaintiff nor her husband shared in that distribution. A dividend of 6 per cent to all common stockholders was declared and paid each year except in 1907, when 7 per cent was paid, and in 1908, when none was paid. The additional amounts of 9 per cent per annum paid to themselves and to the employee stockholders were called by the directors "additional salaries." But the amounts were determined solely by the amount of stock held by the distributees, and were not measured by the services performed by them for the company. They were paid without any action of the board of directors save for the two resolutions hereinbefore quoted. Said amounts were paid at the end of each year from the surplus profits, and were charged on the books against profit and loss. The special term required the defendants who were directors to account for and pay over all of the sums thus paid out as additional salaries during the period of their several directorships. The appellate division modified the judgment by limiting the recovery to the sums paid to the directors themselves, on the theory that they could be held accountable for increases of salaries voted to themselves, but not for increases voted to mere employees. Both parties appeal from that part of the judgment. The argument of the defendants, stated with much plausibility and force, is based on the premises that the complaint alleged, and the special term found, that the extra amounts of 9 per cent on the capital stock were paid as discriminatory dividends, and that the appellate division held them to be additional salaries. It is concluded from one premise that the plaintiff, not the corporation, was injured, and that her remedy is an action against the corporation to compel it to set off and pay to her her share of the dividends (see Peckham v. Van Wagenen, 83 N. Y. 40, 38 Am. Rep. 392), and from the other, that the judgment is erroneous both because no such issue was presented by the pleadings, and because there is no proof that the additional salaries were not earned.

We think that some confusion of thought has resulted from the use of terms. A stockholder may not maintain an action against a corporation to recover a dividend until one has been declared. If a dividend had been declared, but withheld from the plaintiff, her remedy would doubtless have been the one suggested by Judge Rapallo in the case just cited, supra. In the case at bar, however, no dividend was declared except the 6 per cent dividend paid to the plaintiff as well as to the other stockholders. There is at least some evidence to sustain the finding that the directors distributed the surplus earnings of the corporation among themselves and certain employee stockholders under the guise of additional salaries, but upon the uniform basis of 9 per cent of the common capital stock held by each, and not according to the services rendered the corporation by the distributees. Plainly, such a distribution of assets was without consideration and a wrong to the corporation itself, and it is immaterial that the plaintiff called the payments dividends and that the directors called them additional salaries. The facts were sufficiently pleaded to present the question, and the facts found are sufficient to sustain a recovery. However, the judgment should be modified by striking out the recovery for the years prior to 1897.

It is plain both from the complaint and the proof that the plaintiff sought to recover only the sums paid since 1897. There is a general allegation that since the organization of the defendant corporation the said defendants' testator entered into a plan with the other directors and officers, whom he controlled, and caused to be paid to himself and them various sum of money called extra salary or compensation which they illegally voted to themselves. But the specific allegation is that the said defendants' testator caused dividends amounting to 15 per cent to be paid to the employees since the year 1897, claiming that 6 per cent thereof only was dividend, and the balance, or 9 per cent, additional salary, and that he and the other officers caused unlawfully increased salaries to be paid to themselves since the year 1897; and the prayer for relief is that the defendants be required to account for and pay over the sums paid from the year 1897 to the end of the year 1906, together with increases of salary voted for the years 1906, 1907, 1908, and 1909. Indeed, the prayer for relief was limited to the sums alleged to have been improperly paid to the officers themselves. But the plaintiff without objection proved the sums paid the employee stockholders, so the variance in that respect may be disregarded. However, the plaintiff proved under this head the payment of only $103,248, as so-called additional salaries beginning with the year 1897, and yet she was allowed to recover $125,928 and interest going back to and including the year 1895. The defendants as a part of their case, for the purpose of justifying the payments after 1897 by showing a continuous course of conduct, proved the payments made prior thereto, both by the defendant corporation and its predecessor. But there was nothing in the pleadings or the plaintiff's proof, or by way of motion or suggestion on the trial, or indeed until the findings were made by the trial judge, to warn the defendants that the plaintiff sought to recover anything except the payments made under the resolution of 1897 and after the death of her husband, when she succeeded to his stock ownership. Payments made during Godley's lifetime may possibly have stood on a different footing. The defendants say that the complaint should not be treated as amended without giving them an opportunity to plead the statute of limitations. The recovery demanded was for a period of more than ten years prior to the commencement of the action. The court found that the payments were concealed from the plaintiff, and not discovered by her until about January, 1909. It is unnecessary now to decide whether that fact would constitute an answer to the defense of the statute of limitations if pleaded. While we construe pleadings liberally, and amend them to conform to the proof where no prejudice can result to the defeated party, a defendant is still entitled to some warning of the claim made by the plaintiff. A recovery should not be permitted for matters not demanded by the complaint, not proved by the plaintiff, and not even requested by counsel during the trial by appropriate motion or otherwise. We conclude that the appellate division erred in limiting the recovery under this head to the sums paid the officers, and that the special term erred in permitting the plaintiff to recover more than she proved. The order of the appellate division and the judgment of the special term should be modified in the respect under consideration, so as to provide for the recovery of the sum of $103,248, with interest on the several sums paid, from the time of payment.

2. On November 14, 1906, the directors, who were respectively the president, vice president, and secretary, voted to themselves and to the defendant William C. Pettee, the treasurer, but not a director, increases of salary for the year 1906. Said increases to the directors were paid for that year, and for the years 1907 and 1908, and amounted in all to the sum of $42,330. The special term allowed a recovery for the entire salaries paid during those years. The appellate division properly modified the judgment by limiting the recovery to the amount of the increases. It is strenuously insisted that, in the absence of proof and a finding of fraud, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover even the increases of salary voted by the directors to themselves; that there is no proof or finding that the services rendered were not worth the salaries paid; that, while the action of the directors was voidable at the option of the corporation, it was not ultra vires or fraudulent; that the corporation, acting by a majority of its stockholders, could ratify the voidable act; and hence that the plaintiff, a minority stockholder, could not exercise the corporation's right of disaffirmance, without proving that it should have been exercised by the corporation. It is undoubtedly the general rule that acts done in the interest of the corporation, which are voidable only, i. e., not fraudulent or ultra vires, may be ratified by a majority of the shareholders, and that those who object must correct them within the corporation. Leslie v. Lorillard, 110 N. Y. 519, 1 L.R.A. 456, 18 N. E. 363; Gamble v. Queens County Water Co. 123 N. Y. 91, 9 L.R.A. 527, 25 N. E. 201; Flynn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 158 N. Y. 493, 53 N. E. 520; Continental Ins. Co. v. New York & H. R. Co. 187 N. Y. 225, 79 N. E. 1026; Pollitz v. Wabash R. Co. 207 N. Y. 113, 100 N. E. 721. That rule results from the necessity that the majority must determine the policy of the corporation, with whose internal management the courts wisely refrain from interfering. Whether increases of salaries voted by the directors to themselves come within the rule may well be doubted. Only one case in this state holding that they do is cited. MacNaughton v. Osgood, 41 Hun, 109, reversed on another point in 114 N. Y. 574, 21 N. E. 1044.

Doubtless the directors may appoint and fix the compensation of the ministerial officers of the corporation, but the payment of salaries to themselves as mere incidents of their office is a different matter. There is authority and sound reason in support of the proposition that, in the absence of some provision of statute, by-law, or charter, the directors have no authority to vote salaries to each other as mere incidents of their office. Kelsey v. Sargent, 40 Hun, 150; Mather v. Eureka Mower Co. 118 N. Y. 629, 23 N. E. 993; Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. v. Kneeland, 120 N. Y. 134, 8 L.R.A. 253, 17 Am. St. Rep. 619, 24 N. E. 381. And there is ample authority to sustain the right of a minority stockholder to maintain a representative action to recover salaries voted by the directors to themselves. Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 317; Jacobson v. Brooklyn Lumber Co. 184 N. Y. 152, and see cases cited on page 163, 76 N. E. 1075. It is said that there was the element of actual fraud in all of the cases relied upon by the plaintiff; but it is plain that the fraud relied upon in the two cases just cited consisted in the officers helping themselves to the funds of the corporation under the guise of salaries voted by themselves. The court found in this case that there was no by-law of the corporation authorizing the directors to vote salaries to themselves as officers. Doubtless, the directors of a corporation may employ one of their number to perform services outside of the usual duties pertaining to his office, and agree to pay him a salary therefor, and it may be that the act would not be wholly void, though he voted for the resolution.

The precise nature of the services for which the increases were assumed to be voted does not plainly appear. The court found that the services rendered were substantially the same as before the resolution of 1906, and that thereafter they discontinued the 9 per cent annual payments to themselves. The increases of salary amounted to more than said payments, but the court did not expressly find that they were made in lieu thereof. In this connection, it may not be amiss to call attention to the practice, which is becoming too common, of pleading and finding evidentiary facts. Of course, it requires some discrimination and a due appreciation of the principles of law applicable to the case, to state the ultimate facts upon which the judgment must rest; but if, instead of the 163 so-called findings of fact and conclusions of law, the few essential ultimate facts and conclusions of law had been found and made in this case, the plaintiff would have encountered less danger of reversal in this court. The judgment must be sustained, if at all, by the ultimate facts found or established by uncontradicted evidence. We may not choose between conflicting inferences arising from evidentiary facts, and the refusal of the trial court to find a fact is not, as seems to be supposed, the equivalent of an affirmative finding.

Among the conclusions of law there are express findings of fraud. Some of them explicitly relate to the 9 per cent payments of so-called "additional salaries," others may possibly be construed to relate to the increase of salaries under the resolution of 1906, although it is equally possible that they were intended to relate to the destruction of the good will, to be considered later. L.R.A.1915D.

However, one fact is found which indubitably stamps the resolution of November 14, 1906, as fraudulent. Whatever the power of directors to vote salaries may be, they certainly had no power to vote increases of salary to themselves for services already performed under a stipulated salary. Under that resolution the directors paid to themselves an increase of $14,310 for services already performed. That constituted nothing less than a gift to themselves of corporate funds, and of course was a fraud, and it was perforce of that resolution that the increases were paid in subsequent years. In view of the other findings bearing on the question of actual, as distinct from constructive, fraud, dubious as they are, we are not disposed to hold that the resolution of 1906 was fraudulent as to past services and honest as to the future. Manifestly the increases paid for all of the years rested on the same basis. The resolution was tainted with fraud and wholly void.

A majority of the stockholders, consisting of those who had received the preferential payments, voted, after the commencement of this action, to ratify the acts of the directors. But even majority stockholders may not for selfish purposes act in hostility to the interests of the corporation, with the intention of defrauding the non-assenting stockholders. Gamble v. Queens County Water Co. 123 N. Y. 91, 9 L.R.A. 527, 25 N. E. 201; Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. New York & N. R. Co. 150 N. Y. 410, 34 L.R.A. 76, 55 Am. St. Rep. 689, 44 N. E. 1043; Flynn v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 158 N. Y. 493, 53 N. E. 520; Continental Securities Co. v. Belmont, 206 N. Y. 7, 51 L.R.A. (N.S.) 112, 99 N. E. 138, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 777. The recovery under this head, as modified by the appellate division, was proper.

3. On the 7th of January, 1909, the premises of the corporation were destroyed by fire. A majority of the stockholders, but less than two thirds necessary to dissolve the corporation, decided to discontinue business and liquidate the affairs of the corporation. For his services in thus liquidating the affairs of the company, the directors voted and caused to be paid to the said defendants' testator the sum of $13,750, for which sum, with interest, a recovery has been allowed. That is objected to on much the same ground as the recovery under the preceding head. There is no specific finding as to the value of his services, or that he voted for the resolution authorizing the payment to him of said sum. However, it plainly appears from the findings referred to under the next head, that his services in that regard were not rendered in good faith in the interest of the corporation, but were in bad faith, and destructive of its true interest. It thus conclusively appears that the payment of compensation therefor was a fraud upon the corporation and the dissenting stockholders. The recovery of the sum thus paid was therefore proper.

4. After the fire the defendant Pfeiffer resigned as director of the defendant corporation, and he and the defendant William C. Pettee, the son of said testator, organized a new corporation, known as the Crandall-Pettee Company, for the purpose of continuing the business theretofore conducted by the defendant corporation. The court found that the decision to discontinue the business of the old corporation was made in bad faith, and that said testator and defendant Finckenstadt in bad faith conspired with the defendants Pfeiffer and William C. Pettee to turn over to the Crandall-Pettee Company the business and good will of the defendant corporation for the purpose of excluding, without compensation, the plaintiff and all other stockholders similarly situated from further participating in such business, and that that purpose was accomplished. I need not refer to the evidentiary facts found which support that conclusion. Suffice it to say that there is evidence to support it.

It is said that the evidence established the fact to be that said testator became ill and physically incapacitated to carry on the business after the fire; that the court erred in refusing to so find, and that fraud cannot be predicated on the refusal of a sick man to imperil his life for the plaintiff's benefit. If the findings requested had been made they would not alter the case. The acts complained of were affirmative acts destructive of the true interests of the corporation, not negative acts in refusing longer to serve it. Said testator could with propriety have resigned as an officer and director of the corporation. It may be assumed that a majority of the stockholders could, each in his own interest, vote to discontinue the business. But they could not lawfully do that in bad faith for the purpose of turning its business and good will over to another corporation without compensation, so as to exclude minority stockholders from participating therein.

The court found on sufficient evidence that the good will was worth $90,000. It was the duty of the directors if they decided to discontinue the business, to make an honest effort to realize on the good will. Doubtless it is true, as contended, that good will cannot exist apart from an established business. But the business was not destroyed by the fire. The corporation had assets of $534,439.13, exclusive of good will. The directors did not discharge their fiduciary duties simply by realizing on and honestly accounting for the tangible assets. The business, the organization, the list of customers, the brands and tradenames,—everything pertaining to good will,—were turned over without compensation to the new corporation. Being unable to secure the consent of a two-thirds majority of the stockholders to dissolve the corporation, the defendants accomplished their purpose by reducing the capital to $15,000, and by turning over the business and good will without compensation to a new corporation. Directors may not thus, as against dissenting stockholders, in effect terminate the existence of a corporation. People v. Ballard, 134 N. Y. 269, 17 L.R.A. 737, 32 N. E. 54.

But it is objected that in any event the recovery against the defendant Pfeiffer, who had ceased to be a director, William C. Pettee, who never was a director, and the Crandall-Pettee Company, was improper as neither owed any fiduciary duty to the defendant corporation. However, the recovery against them may be sustained on another theory. It is unnecessary at this day to cite authority in support of the proposition that the assets of a corporation constitute a trust fund. This must be true of intangible, as well as tangible, assets. Whoever, therefore, wrongfully appropriates such assets, may be charged therefor as constructive trustees. The said defendants, Pfeiffer and Pettee, had the right to organize another corporation. It had the right within the limits of fair trade, to engage in a competing business with the old corporation. But neither they nor it had the right to enter into and carry out a conspiracy with the directors of the old corporation to acquire the latter's business and good will without paying therefor.

5. Two other small items and a ruling on evidence remain to be considered.

The court found that the defendant corporation paid $6,991.71 for legal services in the defense of this action, and a recovery was allowed for that sum and for $1,000 alleged to have been paid as premium on a bond given to discharge the receiver appointed herein. There is no finding of fact that the latter sum was paid, unless it be found in the conclusion of law on the subject. There is proof of a resolution authorizing the payment of said premium; but there is no proof at all that it was paid, or, if it was paid, that it was not included in the said item of $6,991.71. The plaintiff made no proof at all as to the latter item. The only evidence on the subject was brought out on cross-examination of an expert accountant, and was to the effect that the books showed the payment of expenses after the fire amounting to $9,739, and that "$6,900 of it is in the legal proceedings." If there were no other objections to allowing the recovery, we might assume what appears to be manifest, that everybody understood that the "legal proceedings" referred to this action. However, there was no claim in the complaint for those items. Necessarily, there could have been none, as the expenses were incurred after the commencement of the action. But, in view of the manner in which the evidence was elicited, the defendants should have had some warning before they were cast in judgment, that a recovery for those items was sought. There is no evidence whatever as to the one item, and very slight evidence at the best as to the other. It was stated by the learned counsel for the appellants on oral argument, that some of the items at least, included in the sum of $6,900, were for matters outside of the defense of this action. If seasonably warned that a recovery was sought for those items, the facts would doubtless have been developed fully. Under the circumstances, we think that fairness to the defendants requires that they should have some notice of the claim made against them before the rendition of a judgment, and that said items should be eliminated from the recovery, without prejudice, however, to the plaintiff's right to bring a new action therefor if so advised.

It is next urged that the court erred in excluding evidence of a conversation between the defendant Finckenstadt and said Godley prior to the organization of the defendant corporation, which it is claimed would tend to show that as president of its predecessor, the New Jersey corporation, he assented to the practice of distributing earnings as salaries. The evidence was excluded as incompetent under § 829 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it is argued that the admissibility of the evidence is to be determined precisely as though the corporation itself were the plaintiff. Without deciding that question, it is sufficient to say that the conversation related to the affairs of another corporation, and occurred, at a time when, if earnings were distributed nominally as salaries, there was no attempt at discrimination between shareholders. We do not think that in any aspect of the case the evidence, if received, could have affected the result.

We are also of the opinion that no error was committed in allowing recoveries against the defendants Fickenstadt and Pfeiffer for moneys improperly paid out while they were directors, even though the resolutions purporting to authorize such L.R.A.1915D.

payments were adopted prior thereto.

The judgments of the Appellate Division and of the Special Term should be modified in accordance with this opinion, and, as modified, affirmed, with costs to the plaintiff.

The circumstances surrounding the execution of a contract limiting a common carrier's liability for the loss of stock to a certain sum per head held such that it could not be held to be just, fair, and reasonable, within the rule announced in Ostroot v. Northern P. R. Co. 111 Minn. 504, 508, and hence the court did not err in excluding it from the consideration of the jury in an action wherein the shipper sought a recovery upon the carrier's common-law liability.

I. Burden on carrier.

a. Generally.

Greenleaf on Evidence, 16th ed. vol. 2, § 219, says: "And if the acceptance of the goods was special, the burden of proof is still on the carrier to show, not only that the cause of the loss was within the terms of the exception, but also that there was on his part no negligence or want of due care," citing cases from South Carolina, Minnesota, and Georgia. The annotator adds, "This is probably not now the law in most states."

This quotation from Greenleaf has been the rule adopted in several cases, some proceeding on the theory that he who knows best the reason should be called on to explain, notwithstanding the contract. As a rule it seems to make no difference where the contract provides that the carrier shall not be liable for specific matters, whether the words "not caused by its negligence" are added or not. The cases seem all to agree that it cannot contract for relief against its negligence, and this is read into all the contracts. The case of Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. 279, 13 L. ed. 987, is the leading case on the rule that the burden of proof as to negligence is on the shipper, on the theory that by contract the common carrier became a simple bailee for hire. This was adopted in New York in Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 46 N. Y. 271, 7 Am. Rep. 327, and followed in York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 3 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170. But in New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 624, it was said: "It is argued that a common carrier, by entering into a special contract with a party for carrying his goods or person on modified terms, drops his character and becomes an ordinary bailee for hire, and therefore may make any contract he pleases. . . . We are unable to see the soundness of this reasoning."

The majority of the states and cases are in favor of placing the burden of proof as to negligence on the shipper. There is a strong and consistent minority, which are set out below, holding that the carrier is called upon to prove that injury to goods while in its care came from an excepted cause, and also that there was no negligence on its part.

So, where the risks or accidents for which a common carrier was liable were limited by a special contract, it was held that the burden of proof rested on the carrier to show, not only that the cause of loss was within the terms of the limitation, but also that on its own part there was no negligence. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Little, 71 Ala. 611.

In Southern R. Co. v. Levy, 144 Ala. 614, 39 So. 95, it was said that "in an action against the carrier as such, to recover damages for the loss of goods, a prima facie case is made by proof that the carrier received the goods for transportation and failed to deliver them safely; and if the carrier claims exemption from liability under a special contract, he must show to the reasonable satisfaction of the jury, not only that the cause of loss was within the limitation of the contract, but also that the loss and the cause of loss were without negligence on his part."

A bill of lading provided "not accountable for rust or breakage." A shipment of stoves and pots was badly damaged. It was held that proof of injury made a prima facie case of negligence against the carrier, and that it would not bring the injury within the exception until it showed the exercise of due vigilance on its part to prevent the injury, unless the nature of the injury or of the property be such as to furnish of itself evidence that due care and diligence could not have prevented the injury. Steele v. Townsend, 37 Ala. 247, 79 Am. Dec. 49.

And the burden of showing how the loss occurred was held to be on the carrier, where the bill of lading provided "at the owner's risk." It was held that the carrier should make a prima facie showing that the injury was not caused by its neglect. Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Jarboe, 41 Ala. 644.

Where shipper and carrier have previously made a contract as to the transportation of goods, the person who delivers them to the carrier in pursuance of such contract is not presumed to have authority to waive its terms.

was held that the plaintiff could rest his case on proof of loss and would prevail unless the defendant showed the loss to be occasioned by one or more of the excepted causes. Duncan v. Great Northern R. Co. 17 N. D. 610, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 952, 118 N. W. 826. The court said: "The burden of proof changes from plaintiff to the defendant when plaintiff has proven the delivery and the failure to redeliver. . . . He is not required to show negligence on the part of the railway company."

In Union Exp. Co. v. Graham, 26 Ohio St. 595, the rule is stated that "it is also settled that where a common carrier claims immunity for the loss of goods with which he has been intrusted, on the grounds of a special contract securing such immunity, the burden is on him to prove that the loss was occasioned without fault or negligence on his part." A foot rest shipped at "owner's risk" was broken.

Tobacco was shipped from Cincinnati to Philadelphia, and the bill of lading provided exemption for any damage "if receipted at Sandusky in good order." It was damaged by water. It was held that the burden of proof rested on the carrier to show that the loss or damage occurred without its fault, and when a loss was shown to exist the law raised the presumption of negligence against the carrier. Fatman v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 2 Disney (Ohio) 248.

A bill of lading exempted from loss from damages of river, fire, and unavoidable accident. It was held that proof of delivery to the carrier, and nondelivery to the consignee, was prima facie evidence of loss by negligence. Davidson v. Graham, 2 Ohio St. 131. The court approved the rule laid down by Greenleaf on Evidence, vol. 2, § 219, that the burden was on the carrier to disprove negligence.

Goods were shipped on a boat, "dangers of the river navigation, fire, and unavoidable accidents excepted." The boat was sunk. It was held that the burden of proof was upon the carriers to show that there was no negligence. Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. 362, 62 Am. Dec. 285.

Adams Exp. Co. 77 N. J. L. 19, 71 Atl. 683; Wabash R. Co. v. Curtis, 134 Ill. App. 409.

Philip E. Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action to recover $3,820 for the loss by fire of a carload of horses numbering sixteen, and eight sets of harnesses. The case was tried to a jury, who returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $3,205.12. The defendant appealed from an order denying a new trial.

The case comes here upon a bill of exceptions, which, according to the trial court's certificate thereto, contains a complete record of all proceedings had, including all the evidence offered on the trial, "except that most of the evidence relative to the cause of the fire which destroyed the carload of horses and responsibility therefor has been omitted." An understanding of the questions to be determined requires a statement of the issues made by the pleadings, with the evidence adduced in the course of the trial.

The complaint is based squarely upon a breach of the defendant's common-law duty as a common carrier in the transportation of the property mentioned, and alleges in substance the plaintiff's possession of the horses and harnesses near Willow River, Minnesota, under a contract of hire with their owner, coupled with a condition that the plaintiff was to return them to him at Stillwater, Minnesota; that for the purpose of performing this obligation the plaintiff,

In Wardlaw v. South Carolina R. Co. 11 Rich. L. 337, it was said: "In this state the rule on the subject of limiting the liability of a carrier has been relaxed, though the onus still rests to bring himself within the exceptions and to discharge himself of negligence."

And the onus was held to be on the carrier to show that the injury to a broken stove was within the exception of the bill of lading exempting for breakage, and also that there was no negligence. Baker v. Brinson, 9 Rich. L. 201, 67 Am. Dec. 548. This was on the ground that it is a sound rule which devolves the onus on him who best knows what the facts are.

And where earthenware and hardware were shipped under a contract exempting from dangers of seas and navigation, and were injured, it was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that the damage proceeded from an excepted cause. Cameron v. Rich, 4 Strobh. L. 168, 53 Am. Dec. 670.

A bill of lading exempted from liability for leakage of oil. It was held that where oil was lost the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that there was no negligence on its part. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Oriental Oil Co. 51 Tex. Civ. App. 336, 111 S. W. 979.

A diamond was sent by express and lost. The contract provided that the carrier would not be liable for loss unless caused by its fraud or gross negligence, and not for any amount over $50 unless otherwise specified. It was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that the loss was within the exception, and also that it was not negligent. Brown v. Adams Exp. Co. 15 W. Va. 812. And the same was held where a watch was lost. Southern Exp. Co. v. Seide, 67 Miss. 609, 7 So. 547.

In Mahony v. Waterford, L. & W. R. Co. [1900] 2 I. R. 273, where goods were shipped over connecting lines, at the owner's risk, and were damaged, it was held that the onus of proving that they were not damaged by the wilful misconduct of the servants of the contracting company was on the contracting company. This was L.R.A.1916D.

on the ground that where the subject-matter of the allegation was peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties, he should prove it. Distinguished in Graham v. Belfast & N. C. R. Co. [1901] 2 I. R. 13.

And where the acceptance of the goods was special, it was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show, not only that the cause of loss was within the exception, but that there was no negligence on the part of the carrier. Shea v. Minneapolis & St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 63 Minn. 228, 65 N. W. 458. Oranges were shipped, and the bill of lading exempted for loss from heat or frost.

And where apples were frozen, and the bill of lading provided that the carrier would not be liable for damage from frost, it was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that it was not negligent. Hinton v. Eastern R. Co. 72 Minn. 339, 75 N. W. 373.

b. Fire.

In McGRATH v. NORTHERN P. R. Co. it was held that where a carload of horses were burned the burden of proof as to negligence was on the carrier, where the contract provided that the company should not be liable for damage unless it was caused by negligence of its employees. The loading of the car was finished about 9 p. m., and the man loading went to the village for lunch, and in the meanwhile the car was burned. This rule is supported by a considerable number of cases.

The shipper was held to make a prima facie case against the carrier when he showed that the goods were not delivered. This cast the onus on the carrier to show that the loss occurred from a danger of the river or fire, excepted in the bill of lading; and it should also prove a prima facie case of diligence on its part. Grey v. Mobile Trade Co. 55 Ala. 387, 28 Am. Rep. 729. In this case a steamer loaded with cotton was burned because the cotton was not covered with tarpaulin, and sparks from a match or pipe came in contact with it.

in March, 1912, delivered to the defendant, and the defendant as a common carrier received, such property for the purpose of transporting it from Willow River station to the plaintiff at Stillwater for a reasonable compensation; that the defendant failed to transport any of the property, but, on the contrary, so conducted itself in regard thereto that it was destroyed by fire while in the defendant's possession at the station mentioned. No negligence is charged. The answer admits that the defendant received from one Matson the carload of horses mentioned, and that the same were consigned to the plaintiff at Stillwater; alleges that Matson and the defendant entered into a contract for the transportation of the horses, a copy of the same being made a part of the answer; denies the receipt of the harnesses; admits the destruction of the horses by fire; denies that the fire was caused by any act or omission on the defendant's part, or that it was due to its negligence; alleges that the destruction of the horses was caused solely by the negligence of the shipper, consignee, and their servants and agents; and denies all other allegations of the complaint. The reply put in issue all the allegations of the answer. The relevant portions of the contract referred to will be stated later in this opinion.

The plaintiff, during the trial, withdrew his claim for the destruction of the harnesses. To establish the allegations of his complaint he offered evidence conclusively

Where the liability of the defendant was that of a carrier when the cotton was burned, it was held that it was incumbent on the carrier to show that the burning was without negligence on its part. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Oden, 80 Ala. 38. The bill of lading exempted from loss by fire.

So where the bill of lading exempted from loss by fire, it was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that it had used due care and reasonable diligence to prevent loss. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gidley, 119 Ala. 523, 24 So. 753.

A bill of lading released from all liability for damages arising from fire not the result of negligence of the carrier. It was held that where the goods were lost by fire, the burden of proof was on the carrier to show absence of negligence. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cowherd, 120 Ala. 51, 23 So. 793.

This rule was adopted in Mouton v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 128 Ala. 537, 29 So. 602; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Burton, 165 Ala. 425, 51 So. 643; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Touart, 97 Ala. 514, 11 So. 756; Merchants' Dispatch Transp. Co. v. Hoskins, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 927 (in this case the plaintiff assumed the burden); Southard v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. 60 Minn. 382, 62 N. W. 442, 619; Newberger Cotton Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 75 Miss. 303, 23 So. 186; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Bath, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 697, 44 S. W. 595; Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Efron, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 38 S. W. 639, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 192; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Payne, 15 Tex. Civ. App. 58, 38 S. W. 366; Missouri P. R. Co. v. China Mfg. Co. 79 Tex. 26, 14 S. W. 785; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. McFadden, 91 Tex. 194, 42 S. W. 593; Ryan v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 65 Tex. 13, 57 Am. Rep. 589. This latter case held this on the ground that "the burden of proof is on him who best knows the facts."

A shipping contract for cotton authorized the use of flat cars, and exempted from loss by fire. It was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that it was not negligent. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Moss, 60 Miss. 1003, 45 Am. Rep. L.R.A.1915D.

428. The court said: "All the authorities hold that it devolves upon the carrier to show the loss to have occurred by the excepted cause. In doing this it will add but little to his burden to show all the attending circumstances; and that the burden rests upon him to do so, and disprove his own negligence, we think arises from the terms of the contract, from the character of his occupation, and from that rule governing the production of evidence which requires the facts to be proved by that party in whose knowledge they peculiarly lie."

Goods were shipped, "unavoidable dangers excepted," and were burned. It was held that fire was not an unavoidable danger, and, if intended to be excepted, the contract should have so stated. Then the carrier would be bound to show the origin of the fire. Union Mut. Ins. Co. v. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. 1 Disney (Ohio) 480. The court said: "The presumption founded on public policy will be that the cause or origin of the fire might have been avoided, and the defendant must show what it was, and that it was unavoidable."

And where whisky was shipped by express, and burned on the way, and it was claimed the contract was "subject to the $20 clause," it was held that this clause would not apply in case of negligence, and that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that it exercised due diligence. United States Exp. Co. v. Backman, 28 Ohio St. 144.

A bill of lading exempted from loss by fire from any cause whatever. Cotton was burned. It was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that the loss was within the terms of the agreement, and that it was occasioned without fault or neglect on its part. Gaines v. Union Transp. & Ins. Co. 28 Ohio St. 418.

Goods were burned before they were loaded on the cars. It was claimed that a parol contract exempted from fire, and that the bill of lading to be issued also was to contain such exemption. It was held that a carrier could limit its liability for losses happening without its fault or negligence, and that the burden would be on the carrier establishing that prior to the shipment in question he was conducting extensive logging operations in the vicinity of Willow River, using therein a great many horses; that the horses destroyed, and also certain others in the plaintiff's possession, belonged to one Farmer at Stillwater, from whom the plaintiff had previously hired them, pursuant to a contract whereby he had undertaken to return them; that to that end one of the plaintiff's agents, named McGillen, ordered by phone from the defendant's agent at Willow River several cars, one for Monday and two for Tuesday following the order; that Monday one carload of horses was delivered to the defendant, and that on the next day the horses which were destroyed were sent in charge of the said Matson, the plaintiff's employee, from the plaintiff's camp to the station for shipment. According to McGillen's testimony, Matson's instructions were to take the horses "out to Willow River, load them, and go down to Stillwater with them." Matson testified that his instructions were "to take them horses out to Willow River, and load them and take them to Stillwater, and deliver them to H. C. Farmer." It also appeared that on the journey to the station one Patient, an ex-employee of the plaintiff, joined Matson and was permitted by him to ride one of the horses to the town; that when Matson reached the station he was advised by the defendant's agent that a car would be spotted for him, and that in the afternoon of the same day he loaded the to establish such limited liability, and to show that the loss fell within such limitation. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Barrett, 36 Ohio St. 448.

A bill of lading for cotton exempted from loss by fire. It was held that where the cotton was burned, the burden of proving that there was no negligence was upon the carrier. Swindler v. Hilliard, 2 Rich. L. 286. The court said: "They were bound to show not only that the cotton was destroyed by fire, but the circumstances under which the destruction took place."

Cotton was burned. The bill of lading exempted from liability for loss by fire. It was held that the burden of proof as to absence of negligence was on the carrier. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Richmond, 94 Tex. 571, 63 S. W. 619, reversing — Tex. Civ. App. —, 61 S. W. 410. The court said: "The law does not require a railroad company, in defending itself under such a contract, to exclude the possibility that the fire occurred from some cause connected with the management of its railroad, nor in fact to exclude the possibility of negligence on the part of its servants. The burden of proof means in this case, as in others, that there must be sufficient evidence introduced to justify a jury in finding a verdict in favor of the party who affirms the issue."

In Fire Asso. of Philadelphia v. Loeb, 25 Tex. Civ. App. 24, 59 S. W. 617, the bill of lading exempted from liability for loss by fire, and also provided that in case of fire the burden of proof as to the negligence would be on the shipper. It was held that the plaintiff, having proved that the fire was caused by a defective spark arrester, made a prima facie case of negligence, and the carrier failed to show that the engine was properly handled or that the fire was not set out by its negligence. The court said: "The plaintiff had the burden of proof to show the negligence of the company, and sustained it by showing that the fire was set out by sparks from the engine. So the provision in the bill of lading was complied with, whether it was such as could have been enforced by law or not." L.R.A.1915D.

Where the contract provided exemption from liability for certain causes, it was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that a loss was occasioned by one of the excepted causes, and also that its negligence did not contribute to the loss. Newport News & M. Valley Co. v. Holmes, 14 Ky. L. Rep. 853.

In Childs v. Little Miami R. Co. 1 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 480, cotton was burned on a side track. The defendant denied that the loss was not among the exemptions in the bill of lading, and also denied all negligence. It was held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, who alleged it in the petition. In United States Exp. Co. v. Bachman, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 251, it was said that this case, so far as it fails to conform to the decision in Graham v. Davis, 4 Ohio St. 374, 62 Am. Dec. 285, is imperfectly reported.

c. Live stock.

1. Generally.

A contract under which horses were carried excepted liability for fire when not caused by negligence of the carrier. It was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show want of negligence. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Dishman, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 85 S. W. 319.

A shipping contract provided that the carrier should not be liable for injury to the live stock except for injury caused by its negligence, and that the shipper assumes all risks of damage from delay. It was held that the burden of proof was on the party possessed of the knowledge to make proof. Jolliffe v. Northern P. R. Co. 52 Wash. 433, 100 Pac. 977. This stock was injured by delay. The court said: "Railroad companies do not usually establish their bureaus of information either in a horse car or a caboose,—the only apartments in the train which were available to the shipper."

That case was distinguished in Bartlett v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 57 Wash. 16, 135 Am. St. Rep. 959, 106 Pac. 487.

horses, finishing about 9 P. M., after which he went to the village for lunch; and that about half an hour or more thereafter the car was discovered to be on fire, and the horses destroyed. Testimony was offered that the value of the horses was $225 each. On cross-examination Matson testified that on the afternoon of the same day he signed the contract, a copy of which was attached to the answer; the original being offered in evidence by the defendant and received. There was also evidence tending to show that Patient was at the car while the loading was being done; that he purchased a lantern on the night of the fire, and was then intoxicated; that he had the lighted lantern that night at about 8 or 9 o'clock; and that someone was burned to death in the car. Save as above stated, the record contains no evidence as to the origin of the fire.

Other material evidence was received, bearing upon questions other than the first two to be discussed, and will be stated later in its proper connection. It is conceded that the plaintiff, although not the owner of the horses, had the right, as consignee thereof, to sue to recover damages for their injury and destruction, and this unquestionably is the law. Grinnell-Collins Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. (Grinnell-Collins Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co.) 109 Minn. 513, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 437, 124 N. W. 377.

1. The effect of the court's charge was to permit a recovery without proof of negligence, and the defendant, predicated its

A mare was injured on the cars and died. It was held that, upon a showing made by plaintiffs that the mare was injured while in the custody of the carrier, the burden was on the carrier to show that the injury happened without fault on its part, or from a cause excepted in the contract. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Gewin, 5 Ala. App. 584, 59 So. 553.

And where the carrier was in exclusive control of stock, the shipper not having accompanied it, and a mare died shortly after delivery, it was held that where the evidence showed that the mare died for want of food and water, this was a sufficient prima facie showing of negligence, casting the burden of proof on the carrier to overcome the prima facie case. Mering v. Southern P. Co. 161 Cal. 297, 119 Pac. 80. The bill of lading exempted from liability except for gross negligence.

The shipper signed a limited liability live stock contract, providing exemption from loss on account of delay, beyond the expense of feed and water. It was held incumbent on the carrier to prove that the shipper assented to the terms of the contract. Shoot v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 145 Ill. App. 532.

Proof of delivery to the carrier of live stock in good condition, and its injury while in the custody of the carrier, was held to make a prima facie case. The carrier could have successfully rebutted the prima facie case against it, by proof that it had provided all suitable means of transportation, and had exercised that degree of care which the nature of the property required. If an animal escaped from the carrier, the co-operating cause of the escape would be presumed to have been the negligence of the carrier, unless it was relieved by proof to the contrary or by the terms of the contract. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. v. Fox, 113 Ill. App. 180.

Where the shipper of live stock proved the delivery to the carrier and the fact that damage occurred during transit by reason of the bumping of cars, it was held that the burden was then on the carrier to show that the loss was not occasioned by his default, but was due to the inherent nature or propensity or "proper vice" of the animal transported. Boehl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 44 Minn. 191, 46 N. W. 333. The court said: "So, in this case the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish by a preponderance of evidence that the animal was thrown down or injured by the violent collision of the cars as alleged, and this unexplained would make a prima facie case of negligence, and it would then devolve on the defendant, as a common carrier, . . . to disprove its negligence." The issue being made as to the specific charge of negligence, the clause of the contract limiting the carrier's liability was considered as eliminated from the case.

In Lindsley v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 36 Minn. 539, 1 Am. St. Rep. 692, 33 N. W. 7, where a lot of hogs died on the cars, and the carrier had exclusive care, it was said: "In general, although the rule that the carrier is absolutely responsible as an insurer of the property is subject to some exceptions, as in cases where the injury or loss is to be referred to the act of God or the violence of public enemies, yet the burden of proof, as respects the cause of loss or injury, is, even in such cases, upon the carrier, who, to exonerate himself from liability, must show that the cause of the loss was of the exceptional kind which the law recognizes as excusing him."

Some cattle were injured and some were missing. It was held incumbent on the carrier to show that it was exempt from liability by reason of risks assumed by the shipper, and it was also held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that none of the injury complained of was caused by its negligence. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Heard, 87 Miss. 378, 39 So. 1011.

And the burden was held to be on a carrier relying on a contract stipulating for a restricted liability, to prove it, if it was not proved by the other party, and to show that the injury complained of resulted without fault on the part of the carrier, from some cause excepted by the contract. Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Abels, 60 claims upon a stipulation contained in the special contract mentioned, contends that such was reversible error, for the reason that under the contract the plaintiff was bound to prove the defendant's negligence; the provision thereof relied upon in this connection being that "the company shall not be liable for delay in transit or for the loss of, death of, or injuries to the stock, unless the same is caused by the negligence of the company, its agents or employees." For the purpose of the discussion of this point, and also for all other matters considered in this opinion, we will assume, notwithstanding the plaintiff's contention to the contrary, that the answer was sufficient. We will also assume, for the purposes of the present inquiry, that there was no oral contract for the transportation of the horses, and that the written one was valid and binding upon the plaintiff in accordance with its terms.

At common law the defendant was an insurer of the property, and in the absence of an express contract, leaving out of account the question of contributory negligence, the plaintiff was entitled as a matter of law to recover the value of the property destroyed without proving negligence on the part of the defendant; and even if there was an express contract, which we now assume as above stated, no duty devolved upon the plaintiff to plead it, it being his right and privilege to do just what he did,—that is, to base his action upon the defendant's common-law liability, and leave

Miss. 1017. The court said that "the carrier in such case must show, at least prima facie, that the injury did not result from neglect." In this case the shipper had assumed all risk.

In Louisville, M. O. & T. R. Co. v. Bigger, 66 Miss. 319, 6 So. 234, a mule was injured. The court left the special contract out of view, and held that the burden was on the carrier to acquit itself, which was done.

Sheep were injured by delay and storm. The jury were instructed that if the evidence did not show that the sheep died or were injured from inherent want of vitality, or from injuries inflicted on each other, the carrier would be liable unless it proved that the injury was occasioned by some other cause than its negligence, and in the absence of such proof the law would presume negligence on the part of the carrier. Nelson v. Great Northern R. Co. 28 Mont. 297, 72 Pac. 642. The agent of the shipper accompanied the stock, but the shipper declared on common-law liability. The exceptions to common-law liability were to be proved by the carrier, and, if the presence of the agent of the shipper prevented the defendant from discharging its duties, the burden of proving this was on the defendant.

A shipper of live stock agreed to exempt the carrier from all claim for loss except that caused by the negligence of the carrier. It was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that the loss was not caused by its negligence. Davis Bros. v. Blue Ridge R. Co. 81 S. C. 466, 82 S. E. 856.

A live stock contract provided that the shipper accepted the cars furnished. Horses were injured by a defective car and cattle shoot. It was claimed that it was error to refuse an instruction "that plaintiffs should not simply show negligence only, but should also show that the injury complained of resulted from this negligence." The court said: "But in a case against a common carrier, like the one at bar, where the defendant is liable unless he proves that the injury was occasioned by a cause which, under the principles above, he is exempt from, it has no application." Wallingford L.R.A. 1915D.

A shipping contract for cattle provided that, for damage through negligence, the value by the schedule of $75 each should control; that in case of negligent delay the damage should be the value of food and water purchased by the shipper while so detained. An unusual delay having been proved, it was held that it devolved upon the defendant to show that the delay was from a cause for which it was not responsible. It was held that the carrier could not exempt itself from negligence of its servants. Bosley v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 54 W. Va. 563, 66 L.R.A. 871, 46 S. E. 613. The court said that the later decisions do not regard the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Rathbone, 1 W. Va. 87, 88 Am. Dec. 664, as the law of the state.

A carload of jacks was shipped under a contract exempting from liability for loss from burning of hay, straw, or material used by the owner. It was held that plaintiffs having shown the burning and the damages and the absence of the negligence of their employees, a prima facie case was made against the carrier, and on failure to rebut it plaintiffs should recover. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Parmer, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 1109.

A carrier was not to be liable for injuries to live stock "by reason of any inherent vice" "or disposition to hurt each other." It was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that the injury arose from this cause. Ft. Worth & D. C. R. Co. v. Great-house, 82 Tex. 104, 17 S. W. 834.

And where the owner did not accompany stock shipped by express, it was held that a prima facie case was made where ownership, shipment, and damage were proved, and that the carrier had the burden of proving facts relieving it from liability. Swiney v. American Exp. Co. 144 Iowa, 342, 115 N. W. 212, 122 N. W. 957, distinguished in Colsch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 149 Iowa, 176, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1013, 127 N. W. 198, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 915.

And where it was understood that the shipper would not go with live stock al-it to the defendant to allege any special contract attempting to limit its liability. It is true that the cases are in conflict upon this proposition; but the later, and in our opinion the better, considered cases, decided under the more liberal modern practice, sustain the view announced. In 6 Cyc. 514, it is stated that "the better rule is that the special contract containing conditions in favor of the carrier is properly a defensive weapon, to be used by the carrier when sued, and that the shipper may disregard it, and sue for breach of common-law duty." This seems to be the rule in the Federal courts. See Southern P. Co. v. Arnett, 50 C. C. A. 17, 111 Fed. 849, approved in Empire State Cattle Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (C. C.) 129 Fed. 480. The same rule has also been laid down in Bartlett v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 57 Wash. 16, 135 Am. St. Rep. 959, 106 Pac. 487, decided in 1910, and also in Nelson v. Great Northern R. Co. 28 Mont. 297, 72 Pac. 642, where it is said: "We are aware that the decisions on this question are somewhat at variance, but believe the better rule to be that the existence of a special contract for the shipment of live stock, with stipulations therein exempting the carrier from certain liabilities, is no obstacle to the maintenance of an action in tort, based upon the violations of the carrier's common-law liabilities, and that the plaintiff has an election to bring his action on the contract or in tort for damages arising from a violation of the carrier's duties." To the same effect, see though he had agreed to go, it was held that the presumption of negligence existed where the stock was injured. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCarty, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 683; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Kern, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 556.

And where the shipper was not in actual charge of live stock, although he had agreed to take charge, and the stock was injured, it was held that the carrier was prima facie liable. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Spalding, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 355.

And where live stock was injured, it was held that the presumption was that the carrier was negligent, unless the owner agreed to accompany the stock and did so. Then the burden of proof would be on the owner, as, having care of the stock, he would be presumed to know how the injury occurred. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hawley, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 117.

The exemption in a contract applied to such injuries as were not occasioned by the negligence of the carrier's servants. Where the carrier claimed that delay in delivering live stock was due to a mob, the burden of showing that the mob was without fault of the carrier was held to be upon the carrier. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Thompson, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 973.

In Patterson v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 24 Okla. 747, 104 Pac. 31, hogs died in the cars. Cold water had been poured on them while they were in a heated condition. The shipper agreed by the bill of lading to accompany the stock, but did not. The carrier set up the contract limiting the common-law liability, and voluntarily assumed the burden of proof on the question of negligence.

Cattle were injured on the cars, the floors of which were defective. The contract provided that no recovery for injury could be had unless notice in writing was given before the stock was unloaded. It was held that the carrier should show that the injury was not caused by the breakage. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Tabor, 98 Ky. 503, 34 L.R.A. 685, 32 S. W. 168, 36 S. W. 18.

common-law liability, and a mule sound when shipped arrived at its destination injured by cuts, wounds, or bruises, it was held that, although the shipper had agreed to accompany the stock, the burden of proof was on the carrier to show absence of negligence. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Brosius, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 647, 105 S. W. 1131. But it was held that where an animal arrived sick with pneumonia, the presumption of negligence would not apply.

And in Weed v. International & G. N. R. Co. 21 Tex. Civ. App. 689, 53 S. W. 356, it was held that the burden of proof was on the owner of horses to show negligence of the carrier, where it was claimed that the horses contracted pneumonia from water leaking from water tanks. The case does not show a special contract, and does not show that the sickness was caused by the leaking water. The court said: "We have no means of knowing whether the condition of the water or the leakage of the tanks, or either, produced the pneumonia and catarrhal fever."

The statements in the contract as to the character and condition of the car were held to be admissions that it was suitable and sufficient, and to place on plaintiff the burden of showing that it was unsafe and unsuitable. These admissions prima facie show that the carrier performed its duty. One of a carload of mules was injured. Western R. Co. v. Harwell, 91 Ala. 340, 8 So. 649. The court said: "Ordinarily, the rule as to the burden of proof is thus stated in general terms: The onus is primarily on the defendant to show that the injury did not result from negligence on its part, and the cause thereof was in the terms of the exception. The rule, however, should not be rigidly applied. That injury was not caused by neglect on the part of the carrier, and that it was within the terms of the exception, are relative propositions. The rule, accurately and reasonably interpreted, does not mean that the carrier must establish both of these propositions independently of each other. When the carrier makes a prima facie showing that the injury occurred without negligence on his Southern R. Co. v. Webb, 143 Ala. 304, 111 Am. St. Rep. 45, 39 So. 262, 5 Ann. Cas. 97. This conclusion is in logical accord with the proposition stated in the next subdivision of this opinion, and indeed this court has already practically aligned itself with those adhering to the rule as above stated. See Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Home Ins. Co. 64 Minn. 61, 66, 66 N. W. 132.

2. The question, then, on this branch of the case, resolves itself into one of burden of proof, and may thus be stated: Did the existence of the special contract limiting the defendant's liability to losses occurring through its negligence cast upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that the loss was so caused, or was the burden upon the depart, this prima facie brings its cause within the exception."

2. Where shipper is in charge.

The shipper by the bill of lading assumed the care and risk of a carload of horses. It was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that it was not negligent. Hull v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 41 Minn. 510, 5 L.R.A. 587, 16 Am. St. Rep. 722, 43 N. W. 391. The train bucked snowdrifts. The court said the carrier must prove that the loss occurred by reason of an excepted cause. "If the contract, instead of specifying certain exceptions to the liability, is general in its terms, and excepts from the liability all causes of loss or damage but the carrier's negligence, how does the carrier show that the loss or damage was within the exception but by proof that it occurred from a cause other than his negligence."

Hogs were shipped, the owner agreeing to accompany the stock, and releasing the carrier from all damages which were not caused by the negligence of the carrier. Some four hogs died. It was held that, as the carrier failed to negative negligence by proof, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment in some amount. Johnstone v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 39 S. C. 55, 17 S. E. 512.

The court followed Hart v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 112 U. S. 331, 28 L. ed. 717, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, as to valuation.

Cattle and hogs were in a car, and the cattle were injured and some hogs were lost. The contract required the shipper to care for the stock, and exempted the carrier except for gross negligence. It was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that the loss occurred from an excepted cause, and that it was not negligent. Johnson v. Alabama & V. R. Co. 69 Miss. 191, 30 Am. St. Rep. 534, 11 So. 104.

Where a special contract was made and a loss occurred, it was held that the carrier could not claim exemption from liability unless he showed, not only that the cause of the loss was within the limitation of the contract, but that it was without defendant to negative the same? We do not consider this an open question. "If the goods were shipped under a special contract exempting the carrier from its common-law liability," says Mr. Dunnell in § 1360 of his Minnesota Digest, "the burden is still on the carrier to prove, not only that the loss or damage was within the terms of the exemption, but also that there was no negligence on its part." This proposition is supported by the cases cited thereto, of which see, especially, Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. v. Home Ins. Co. supra; and there are numerous authorities from other states to the same effect, of which see St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Pape, 100 Ark. 269, 140 S. W. 265, 269.

It may be contended that the introduction negligence on its part. South & North Ala. R. Co. v. Henlein, 52 Ala. 606, 23 Am. Rep. 578. In this case the owner of the stock shipped agreed to assume care of the stock, and to feed and water the same. A steer died in transit.

A shipper of live stock agreed to accompany the same and assume charge of loading. S. C. Stat. 1893, § 1678, provided that no railroad company in transportation of animals shall overload the cars. It was held that the burden of proving that injury to the stock was within an exemption clause, and that the carrier was not negligent, was upon the carrier. Crawford v. Southern R. Co. 56 S. C. 136, 34 S. E. 80.

But in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Arnold, 16 Tex. Civ. App. 74, 40 S. W. 829, where the shipper of live stock agreed to take care of the same, and did accompany them, it was held that the burden was on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier in failing to feed and water. The court said: "But in shipments of live stock, where the owner accompanies the stock under a special contract to take care of them himself, and is given an opportunity to do so, the reason for the rule that the facts are peculiarly, if not exclusively, within the knowledge of the carrier, does not apply, and hence the rule itself is held to be inapplicable."

That case was distinguished in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Dishman, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 277, 85 S. W. 319.

II. Burden on shipper.

a. Generally.

Where goods are damaged while in the possession of the carrier, it is required to show that such injury came from an excepted cause. The majority of cases hold that then the burden of proof is on the shipper to show that the damage was caused by the negligence of the carrier.

In an action against a steamship company for loss of money shipped by express on a steamer which burned, it was held that, the carriers having succeeded in restricting their liability as carriers by spe-of the special contract in evidence before the plaintiff had rested changed the rule, or rather rendered it inapplicable. No such result followed, however, as this was done by the defendant, and the plaintiff, during the entire trial, based his claim to a recovery solely upon the common-law liability. This distinction is clearly pointed out in Johnson v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 78 N. J. L. 529, 138 Am. St. Rep. 625, 74 Atl. 496, 20 Ann. Cas. 228.

The only evidence disclosed by the record as to the origin of the fire was that above recited concerning the man Patient and his conduct, and this we think was manifestly insufficient to require the court to submit to the jury the question of whether the defendant had sustained the burden upon it to establish the absence of negligence on its part. Furthermore, the evidence in question seems to have been offered upon the issue of contributory negligence, which was submitted to the jury, and of which we will treat in its place. But if it may be claimed that the conclusions above stated are erroneous, the same result must nevertheless follow, for the settled case shows that most of the evidence relative to the cause of the fire and responsibility therefor is not contained therein. Error is never presumed, and what this evidence was we know not.

We hold, therefore, that the verdict cannot be disturbed on the ground that the instructions allowed a recovery without proof of negligence. A new trial should never be cial agreement, the burden of proof that the loss was occasioned by the want of due care or by gross negligence was on the libellant. New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344, 12 L. ed. 465. The carriers gave notice in bills of lading that the expressman was alone responsible, and that the steamboat company assumed no risk.

That case and Selby v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 113 N. C. 588, 37 Am. St. Rep. 635, 18 S. E. 88, were distinguished in Mitchell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 124 N. C. 236, 44 L.R.A. 515, 32 S. E. 671.

And where the carrier proved that gold coin was stolen before leaving port, by a person not belonging to the ship, and the bill of lading excepted loss occasioned by "thieves," it was held that the burden of proof was on the libellant to prove that the loss might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable and proper care on the part of the ship. The Saratoga, 20 Fed. 869. The ship was held negligent in not securing the hold with proper lock, and also in not preventing this man from carrying such a heavy load of coin in daylight from the ship.

The burden of proof was held to be, first, on the carrier to show that the damage was occasioned by one of the excepted causes; then, the burden of proof was held to be on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier. Turner v. The Black Warrior, 1 McAll. 181, Fed. Cas. No. 14,253; The Rocket, 1 Biss. 354, Fed. Cas. No. 11,975.

In Western Transp. Co. v. Newhall, 24 Ill. 466, 76 Am. Dec. 760, it was said that "we understand the law to be that when goods are received by a common carrier, to be carried under the usual bill of lading, it is incumbent on him to show that the injury resulted from one of the causes excepted in it. In this case the defendants were bound to show that the injury was caused by the weather, accidental delays, or by the natural tendency of the powder to decay, neither of which was shown. Had that been shown, then the burden of proof would have been shifted on the plaintiff to prove negligence, but not until then." L.R.A.1915D.

After the damage to goods had been established, it was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that it was occasioned by one of the exempted perils. When this was done, the burden was shifted on the shipper to show that the damage might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the carrier. Mitchell v. United States Exp. Co. 46 Iowa, 214.

And where the express company's receipt stipulated for exemption from liability beyond $50, for losses occurring through its negligence, it was held that negligence was to be proved affirmatively by the plaintiff. Magnin v. Dinsmore, 56 N. Y. 168, distinguished in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Little, 71 Ala. 611.

And where a shipper was held bound by the valuation fixed in an express receipt, it was held that the company was not bound to inquire as to the true value; that the burden of bringing to the shipper notice of the change of common-law liability was on the carrier, but that when that was established the burden of proving negligence in the carrier was on the shipper. Kallman v. United States Exp. Co. 3 Kan. 205.

In Adams Exp. Co. v. Loeb, 7 Bush. 499, where a contract with an express company provided that they were forwarders only, and should be liable only for fraud or gross negligence, it was held that in an action to recover for lost goods, not delivered in New York, the burden was on the plaintiff to show such fraud or negligence.

A bill of lading provided, "Nor shall negligence be presumed against any carrier." It was held that the burden of proof was upon the shipper to show that injury occurred, and that negligence caused the injury. Merchants' & M. Transp. Co. v. Eichberg, 109 Md. 211, 130 Am. St. Rep. 524, 71 Atl. 993. A shipment of paper bags was damaged.

A special contract exempted the defendant from liability on account of delay. It was held that the burden of proving negligence of the carrier was upon the shipper. Anderson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 93 Mo. App. 677, 67 S. W. 707. The evidence granted in a civil action for errors in instructions, however egregious they may be, where the verdict was the only one warranted by the law applicable to the case. Dunnell's Dig. § 7170.

3. The special contract contained a provision to the effect that the shipper declared that the value of the horses did not exceed $100 each, the shipper agreeing to pay for the carriage at the published rate applicable to shipments of live stock value at not more than the sum stated. The defendant insists that this was a valid limitation of its liability as to amount, and that in no event could the plaintiff recover a greater sum. For the purposes of discussion we will assume that Matson had authority to bind the plaintiff by a contract of limited liability, to the same extent as if the plaintiff himself had executed it. It must also be conceded on this branch of the case that the necessary preliminary steps to establish the tariff specified in the contract, and also others, had been taken. Unless, therefore, it conclusively appeared from the evidence that this contract was invalid by reason of the circumstances under which it was entered into, then the verdict cannot stand, and there must be a new trial; for the instructions in effect took the special contract out of the case, and left only the right to recover at common law.

These circumstances are practically undisputed, and we will state them as favorably to the defendant as the testimony will of delay was sufficient to raise the presumption of negligence.

In Kirby v. Adams Exp. Co. 2 Mo. App. 369, where a trunk was lost, the cases of Levering v. Union Transp. & Ins. Co. 42 Mo. 88, 97 Am. Dec. 320, and Ketchum v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 52 Mo. 391, were followed as to the burden being on the carrier to show want of negligence, where the contract exempted from liability except for gross negligence. These cases, on which the Kirby Case relied, were overruled in Witting v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 101 Mo. 631, 10 L.R.A. 602, 20 Am. St. Rep. 636, 14 S. W. 743.

In Canfield v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 93 N. Y. 532, 45 Am. Rep. 268, the court said: "When the liability of a party is predicated upon his negligence in the performance of a duty which rests upon him by virtue of a contract or otherwise, the burden is always upon the plaintiff to establish the fact of negligence to the satisfaction of the jury."

Velours were shipped, the bill of lading exempting the carrier from liability for "wet." It was held that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier was on the shipper, and that evidence that the goods were shipped in good order and were not delivered in the usual time, and that they were wet when delivered, was not proof of negligence. Dobson v. Central R. Co. 38 Misc. 582, 78 N. Y. Supp. 82.

A lot of rails were shipped by boat, 88 tons to one person and 180 tons to another. At delivery one consignee received 20 tons less than billed, and the other 8 tons more. The bill of lading provided, "Vessels not accountable for number of pieces or weight." It was held that where the consignee had undertaken to separate the lot at delivery, and ship it on cars, the burden was on him to show negligence on the part of the ship. Eaton v. Neumark, 37 Fed. 375.

In Memphis & C. R. Co. v. Reeves, 10 Wall. 176, 19 L. ed. 909, where it was held that a carrier was not liable for damages from sudden flood caused by act of God, the court said: "If, after he has excused himself by showing the presence of the overpowering cause, it is charged that his negligence contributed to the loss, the proof of this must come from those who assert or rely on it."

The following cases hold that, before the shipper is required to prove the negligence of the carrier, it is incumbent on the latter to bring the injury within the exemption of the bill of lading: Vonfiglio v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 125 Mich. 476, 84 N. W. 722; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Brady, 32 Md. 333; Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Hamilton, 76 Ill. 393; Mahaffey v. Wisconsin C. R. Co. 147 Ill. App. 43.

The burden of proof was held to be on the carrier to show that the whole of the damage to the cargo came from the excepted cause, exempting from liability, in the bill of lading. If it failed to show the extent and degree of this exoneration, it would be held liable for all the damage. Speyer v. The Mary Belle Roberts, 2 Sawy. 1, Fed. Cas. No. 13,240.

After damage was established it was held that the burden was on the ship to show that it was occasioned by perils that exempted from liability in the bill of lading. The Keokuk, 1 Biss. 522, Fed. Cas. No. 7,721.

The burden of proof was held to be on the carrier to show that a cargo of sugar was damaged by reason of the causes excepted in the bill of lading. Argo S. S. Co. v. Seago, 42 C. C. A. 128, 101 Fed. 999. The evidence of the carrier was to the extent that there was no damage at all.

And where the evidence of the carrier failed to show that the loss and damage to a cargo of tea came from a cause excepted in the bill of lading, it was held that the carrier would be liable. The Mascotte, 48 Fed. 119. On appeal it was held: "The burden of proof is on the steamship to overcome the effect of the acknowledgment in the bill of lading of the reception of the goods on board 'in good order and condition.'" 2 C. C. A. 399, 1 U. S. App. 251, 51 Fed. 605.

The onus was held to be on the master (whether he reshipped the goods or not) to show that the goods were lost, or so in-warrant: Previously to the execution of the contract there was no conversation between Matson and the defendant's agent concerning the kind or value of the horses to be shipped; nor was there any talk about freight rates, tariffs, or charges to be made for the transportation, and nothing was said about any other paper or contract. According to the testimony of the agent, his only thought seems to have been to secure the execution of a contract covering the shipment, and there was nothing even in the nature of a meeting of minds upon the particular contract here involved. The agent testified that he requested Matson to come into the station and fix out the contract,—not a contract,—and that when he came in he (the agent) prepared the contract and said, "You know what this is for; you got to get release to ride with them;" and that Matson replied, "I know all about it; I signed good many of them;" and on cross-examination the agent admitted having said to Matson that he would have "to release the stock in order to go with the stock." It is clear, also, that Matson's purpose in executing the contract was to secure the right to accompany the stock. There was, in short, a total absence of the usual conversation necessarily had between parties preliminary to the execution of a written contract, and of consensus concerning the subject-matter.

It is true that a meeting of minds is usually presumed from the execution of a written instrument, but here all the surjured as to prevent delivery, by the unavoidable accidents of the river. Dunseth v. Wade, 3 Ill. 285. The bill of lading authorized the carrier to reship on "any good boat." It reshipped and the goods were lost.

b. Fire.

The weight of authority is that where the bill of lading exempts for loss by fire, the shipper has the burden of proof to establish that the fire was caused by the negligence of the carrier.

By a bill of lading for cotton the carrier was exempted from liability for loss by fire "unless the same be proved to have occurred from the fraud or gross negligence of the company or companies, their agents or servants." It was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to establish that the cotton was burned by the fraud or gross negligence of the carrier. Platt v. Richmond, Y. R. & C. R. Co. 108 N. Y. 358, 15 N. E. 393.

And where the bill of lading provided no liability for fire unless from gross negligence, it was held that the burden of proof as to negligence in such a case was on the plaintiff. Cochrane v. Dinsmore, 49 N. Y. 249. Church, Ch. J., said: "It cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the fact of the burning of the ship, and the fact that the witnesses called could not account for it and the other circumstances, absolutely established negligence. The most that can be said is that these facts were competent to found an inference of a want of care."

And where the bill of lading exempted for loss by fire unless it occurred through the negligence of the carrier, it was held that proof by the carrier that the loss occurred through the excepted peril constituted prima facie a complete defense. The burden of proving negligence of the carrier was held to be on the owner. Schaller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 97 Wis. 31, 71 N. W. 1042.

This was said to be the first ruling had on this question in this state.

A bill of lading provided for exemption from damage by fire unless caused by negligence of the carrier. On evidence of the shipping of the goods and their destruction by fire while in possession of the carrier, it was held that the court properly directed a verdict for the defendant in the absence of any evidence of negligence. Michaels v. Adams Exp. Co. 71 N. J. L. 41, 59 Atl. 142.

An express bill of lading exempted for loss from fire unless caused by fraud or gross negligence of the carrier. It was held that where the goods were burned, the burden of proving that the loss was caused by reason of the fraud or gross negligence of the defendant was on the plaintiff. Landsberg v. Dinsmore, 4 Daly, 490.

A fire department extinguished a fire on a tug, but destroyed the cargo. The bill of lading contained the usual exemptions from fire risk. It was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show that the fire was the result of negligence. The Buckeye, 7 Biss. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 2,084. The cause of the fire was unknown.

A bill of lading exempted for loss by fire. The freight was destroyed by a mob firing the same. It was held that the burden of proof was on the owners of the freight to show that the loss was caused by the negligence of the carrier. Wertheimer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 17 Blatchf. 421, 1 Fed. 232.

Cotton was in possession of a railroad, at a compress company plant, the bill of lading exempted the railroad from liability for fire. It was held that, after the damage to goods was established, the burden was on the carrier to show that it was exempted by the bill of lading. But then the burden would be on the plaintiff to establish negligence of the defendant. Cau v. Texas & P. R. Co. 194 U. S. 427, 48 L. ed. 1053, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 659, affirming 51 C. C. A. 76, 113 Fed. 91.

And the burden of showing that loss by fire, caused to a shipment of flour on the wharf, was occasioned by the negligence of the carrier, was held to be on the shipper where such loss was excepted in the bill of lading. Washburn-Crosby Co. v. William rounding facts and circumstances speak to the contrary, and the question is whether the contract in question can be sustained under the principles applicable to contracts of its character and kind. Upon the state of facts recited, the court, had it submitted the question of the validity of this contract to the jury, would have been obliged to state the law applicable thereto substantially as laid down by Chief Justice Start in Ostroot v. Northern P. R. Co. 111 Minn. 504, 508, 127 N. W. 177, 178, and as follows: "The alleged contract is an attempt by a common carrier to limit its common-law liability for the loss of the goods. Such contracts are exceptions to the common-law rule of liability, and they should be carefully scrutinized by the courts, and only enforced when it is made to appear that they are just and reasonable, and were fairly entered into by the shipper, with full freedom of choice. It is the settled doctrine of this court that contracts so made, if fair, just, and reasonable, will be upheld as a proper mode of securing a due proportion between the amount for which the carrier may be responsible and the freight charges he receives, and of protecting himself from extravagant valuation in case of loss; but a mere arbitrary valuation, simply for the purpose of limiting the carrier's liability, will not be sustained as just and reasonable within the rule."

If the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract here involved required the court to submit to the jury the Johnston & Co. 60 C. C. A. 187, 125 Fed. 273.

And where the bill of lading exempted for loss by fire, and freight was burned, it was held that the burden was on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier. Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Harper, 44 Ark. 208; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Corcoran, 40 Ark. 375; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Talbot, 39 Ark. 523; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Bone, 52 Ark. 26, 11 S. W. 958.

And the burden of proof was held to be on the plaintiff to show negligence where loss by fire was exempted in the bill of lading. Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. 152 Ind. 333, 53 N. E. 382. The court said: "Neither is any serious danger to be apprehended from the imposition of unfair and unjust terms upon the shipper by the carrier. The form and conditions of the contracts of the carrier are in most cases subject to legislative control, and it is to be presumed that, whenever it becomes necessary to protect the people of the state from imposition, the legislative remedy will be applied."

And where the bill of lading exempted from liability for fire, it was held that the burden of proving negligence causing such loss was on the shipper. The Emily v. Carney, 5 Kan. 645; Otis Co. v. Missouri P. R. Co. 112 Mo. 622, 20 S. W. 676; Indianapolis, D. & W. R. Co. v. Forsythe, 4 Ind. App. 326, 29 N. E. 1138. The court said in the latter case: "We cannot agree with counsel that the mere fact that the goods were destroyed by fire while in the appellant's possession was conclusive or even presumptive proof of negligence."

And, where an express receipt exempted the carrier from loss by fire, it was held that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier was on the shipper. Smith v. American Exp. Co. 108 Mich. 572, 66 N. W. 479.

In Levering v. Union Transp. & Ins. Co. 42 Mo. 88, 97 Am. Dec. 320, where cotton was burned, it was held that it devolved upon the carrier to show, notwithstanding the exception exempting it from loss by fire, that the accident did not occur through any fault, want of care, or negligence on its part or the part of its agents or employees. This case was overruled in Witting v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 101 Mo. 631, 10 L.R.A. 602, 20 Am. St. Rep. 636, 14 S. W. 743.

And where the bill of lading exempted from damage from fire and flood, it was held that the burden of proof as to the carrier's negligence was upon the plaintiff. Johnson v. West Jersey & S. R. Co. 78 N. J. L. 529, 138 Am. St. Rep. 625, 74 Atl. 496, 20 Ann. Cas. 228. It was held that mere nondelivery and proof of fire did not establish negligence. Rags were burned in transit.

In Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 46 N. Y. 271, 7 Am. Rep. 327, reversing 2 Daly, 454, a bill of lading exempted for damage by fire. It was held that to entitle the plaintiff to recover for such a cause he was bound to prove that the fire which consumed the cotton resulted from the negligence of the defendant. Allen and Peckham, JJ., dissented. The latter held that plaintiff proved a prima facie case of negligence in defendant's failure to deliver the cotton. The proof by defendant that the goods were destroyed by fire, and the exemption clause, did not make a prima facie defense. A presumption of negligence is shown by proof of fire. He said: "This precise question as to the burden of showing the exercise or the absence of ordinary care, where goods are consumed by a fire occurring upon the carrier's own premises, is not inconsistent with the position that upon the plaintiff ultimately rests the onus of establishing the negligence." The knowledge is exclusively with the carrier. An ordinary fire does not occur without negligence as a general rule.

In J. Russell Mfg. Co. v. New Haven S. B. Co. 50 N. Y. 121, that case was distinguished.

In Koenigsheim v. Hamburg & A. Packet Co. 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 405, it was said: "The case of Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 46 N. Y. 271, 7 Am. Rep. 327, does not hold that the precise nature of question of whether it was fair, just, and reasonable, and for the purpose of securing a due proportion between the amount of the carrier's liability and the compensation to be received for the carriage, then the court was plainly in error in refusing to submit such question to the jury; but if, on the other hand, it appears that under the facts such was not the case, that the contract was not fairly entered into with freedom of choice, that the valuation was arbitrary and plainly for the purpose of limiting the carrier's liability, and all this to such extent that if the question had been submitted, and the jury had found to the contrary, the verdict could not have been sustained, then the defendant cannot now complain of the failure to submit. This is the general test of the propriety of refusing to submit questions of fact to the jury, and when it is applied to the facts of this case there can be, we think, but one result, and that is that, under the rule announced in Ostroot v. Northern P. R. Co. supra, the action of the trial court must be sustained. It is clear from the case last cited that this court is not prepared to sustain all limited liability contracts regardless of the circumstances under which they were entered into (see also O'Connor v. Great Northern R.

the negligence must be shown, and it is clearly intimated that simply proving the fire in that case would have called upon the defendant for explanation."

A bill of lading contained a general exemption from liability for loss by fire. Loss having occurred from this cause, it was held incumbent on the plaintiff to show that the fire was the result of the defendant's negligence, or that the loss resulted from some breach of the duty. Whitworth v. Erie R. Co. 87 N. Y. 413. The freight house containing the cotton was burned. It was held the occurrence of a fire would not alone justify the inference of negligence.

And where an express receipt exempted for liability from fire, it was held that the plaintiff was required to prove that a fire destroying his goods was due to negligence of the carrier. Proof of a fire did not give rise to the presumption of negligence. It was further held that, before the express company could be held liable for more than $50 value, the plaintiff was obligated to prove some affirmative act of wrongdoing on the part of the carrier. Rowan v. Wells, F. & Co. 80 App. Div. 31, 80 N. Y. Supp. 226. The value was asked, but not given.

And where a bill of lading exempted liability for loss by fire, a dog in a crate escaped and was replaced in the crate in the freight house, which was burned shortly afterwards, from, it was supposed, the dog upsetting a kerosene lamp. It was held that the burden was on plaintiff, whose freight was burned, to establish negligence of the carrier. Van Akin v. Erie R. Co. 92 App. Div. 23, 87 N. Y. Supp. 871.

c. Live stock.

1. Generally.

The general rule is that where the live stock is in the charge of the carrier, the shipper has the burden of proving negligence of the carrier, if the shipping contract exempts the carrier from special liability.

Hogs were injured and some escaped. The contract provided exemption except for negligence. Proof by the shipper that there was a wreck and delay was held sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the carrier. L.R.A.1915D.

McFall v. Wabash R. Co. 117 Mo. App. 477, 94 S. W. 570.

A contract for shipping hogs restricted the carrier's liability to that resulting from negligence. It was held that the burden devolved on plaintiff to show that the unusual delays were the result of negligence. Bushnell v. Wabash R. Co. 118 Mo. App. 618, 94 S. W. 1001. The court said: "Circumstances that even slightly tend to show a negligent origin of the unusual delay will support an inference of negligence."

And where cattle were delayed unreasonably and one was injured, crippled, and bruised, it was held that the burden of proof was on plaintiff to show the carrier's negligence, but not necessarily to show that the injury was caused by human agency. Libby v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 137 Mo. App. 276, 117 S. W. 659.

The special contract was not pleaded and was improperly used before the trial court.

A bill of lading for a horse exempted liability for injury except such as should arise from gross negligence. The horse was badly injured, and in a suit for negligence only the plaintiff was required to prove the allegations. But it was held sufficient where plaintiff alleged that the horse was injured by the careless shifting and colliding of cars, and the evidence showed that the horse's back was broken by suddenly stopping the cars. There was no objection to this evidence. Newman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 33 App. Div. 171, 53 N. Y. Supp. 456, 5 Am. Neg Rep. 73.

Hogs were taken under a contract providing that the carrier was not an insurer; that the carrier would not be liable for injuries caused to the animals by themselves, nor from loading or unloading, nor for injury from delay. It was held that the burden was on the shipper to prove that the injury to the hogs was from the failure to "wet them down." Peterson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 19 S. D. 122, 102 N. W. 595.

And where a carrier restricted the liability for live stock by special contract, the burden of establishing negligence was held to be on the shipper. Kansas P. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 8 Kan. 623.

A clause in a live-stock contract required a claim for damages to be made within a Co. 118 Minn. 223, 228, 136 N. W. 743; O'Malley v. Great Northern R. Co. 86 Minn. 380, 382, 90 N. W. 974); and yet, if this contract is to be sustained, it is difficult to conceive of any state of facts under which such a contract would not have to be upheld, except in case of fraud or duress. Our conclusion is that the trial court did not err in holding that the special contract did not limit the plaintiff's right of recovery in the matter of the value of the horses.

4. The defendant complains of the court's instructions concerning contributory negligence, and of its failure to instruct as certain time. It was said: "But the clause in question is not one exempting the carrier from its common-law liability, or limiting that liability, but one imposing a condition. . . . Hence, when the shipper seeks a recovery he must show compliance with the condition upon which recovery may be had." Kalina v. Union P. R. Co. 69 Kan. 172, 76 Pac. 438.

A horse was injured by reason of being carried on an open car. The bill of lading exonerated the carrier from all damages caused to stock, and the shipper assumed all risk. It was held that this would not excuse negligence, but as to that the burden would be upon the shipper. That if the shipper required a box car, and it was not given, this would be negligence and shift the burden of proof to the carrier to show that the loss was without its fault. Sager v. Portsmouth, S. & P. & E. R. Co. 31 Me. 228, 50 Am. Dec. 659.

And where the shipper of live stock agreed to release the carrier from claim for loss, except for gross negligence of the carrier, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier. Bankard v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 34 Md. 197, 6 Am. Rep. 321. Detached or broken-loose cars, colliding with the cattle cars, breaking of a wheel, collisions, and delays were held of themselves no proof of negligence.

Two head of cattle were missing at delivery. The shipper assumed the risk except for gross negligence. It was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to show that the negligence of the carrier caused the loss. George v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 358.

And, where cattle were carried under a contract by which the carrier was to be liable only in case of negligence, it was held that the burden of proving negligence was on the plaintiff. Harris v. Midland R. Co. 25 Week. Rep. 63. In this case one of the cows was killed, and its spine was injured and shoulder broken.

Poultry was shipped by contract exempting the carrier from all damages not caused by wilful misconduct. The poultry was injured by delays. It was held that the burden was on plaintiff to show evidence requested by the defendant. The court, however, did charge, in effect, that the defendant would not be liable if Matson contributed to the loss by negligence in looking after the horses or in caring for them after they were loaded. Furthermore, a special interrogatory was submitted to the jury upon this question, and the jury returned a special verdict negating negligence in such regards.

From the defendant's brief we gather that it was claimed on the trial that the evidence warranted a finding that Matson allowed a drunken friend to go into the car for the purpose of stealing a ride, and that of wilful misconduct. Graham v. Belfast & N. C. R. Co. [1901] 2 I. R. 13.

The warranty that a ship was fit at the beginning of a voyage to safely carry the cargo received by her was held not implied if the parties contract otherwise. The burden of proof was held to be on the shipper to show negligence. The Tjomo, 115 Fed. 919. In this case the bill of lading accepted the fittings and fastenings for cattle as satisfactory, but some cattle were lost. The evidence showed an unprecedented storm. This put the burden on libellant to prove negligence in the construction of the fittings and stowage of the cattle.

A bill of lading assumed on the part of the shipper of live stock all risks of injury or loss to his stock by reason of defects in the cars. It was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier not only to show that a limited contract was made, but also that the loss in question arose from a cause excepted in the contract. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Lesser, 46 Ark. 236. The court said: "And this fact must be established with reasonable certainty, and not rest upon conjecture or possibility." A horse was injured by nails in the car.

And where the owner of live stock was not with the same, it was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that it was excused from liability by reason of the natural propensity of the stock to injure themselves or each other. Wabash R. Co. v. Priddy, 179 Ind. 483, 101 N. E. 724.

Quite a few Iowa cases place burden on carrier to disprove negligence, but in those cases there does not appear to have been exemptions in the bill of lading.

Live stock were injured and killed in transportation. The defendant claimed that the contract exempted from all liability except for collision or derailment. It was held that such exemption was void; that the burden was on the carrier, which received property for transportation, to show the circumstances which excused or relieved it from liability. McCoy v. Keokuk & D. M. R. Co. 44 Iowa, 424.

2. Where shipper is in charge.

Some cases put stress upon the fact that the shipper agreed to and did take charge, and that the reason of the rule stated by such act was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's loss. The burden of proof to establish this was upon the defendant, and it is very doubtful whether the record contains sufficient evidence to warrant any such conclusion. However, evidently on this theory, the court, at the defendant's request, instructed the jury that "if Matson knowingly permitted anyone to go into the car for the purpose of stealing a ride, or while loading negligently allowed anyone to go into the car for that purpose, and the car was set on fire and the horses destroyed by reason of Matson's doing so, your verdict must be for the defendant." This would seem fairly to cover the defendant's theory in this regard in any event.

The defendant also assigns error upon the failure to give the following instruction requested by it: "You are instructed that, according to the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff, Matson was to load the horses and go with them to Stillwater. If you find that it was the understanding and agreement of the plaintiff and defendant that Matson should care for the horses while in defendant's possession, and you should further find that Matson negligently failed to properly care for the horses, and that as a result of Matson's negligence the horses some authorities that the burden of proving is on him who knows, therefore imposes on the shipper the burden of proving negligence of the carrier.

So, where the contract to carry live stock limited the carrier's liability, and the shipper remained in charge, it was held that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier was on the shipper. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Weakly, 50 Ark. 397, 7 Am. St. Rep. 104, 8 S. W. 134.

The bill of lading provided that the shipper should load the cars, unload, feed, water, and attend to them, see that they were fastened. A tramp was taken out of the car while in transit, and a fine jack died.

A contract to carry live stock provided that the shipper should accompany the same, and that the carrier should not be responsible for care of the stock, but only liable for actual negligence of the employees. It was held that where the shipper accompanied the car and had charge of the stock, there was no presumption of negligence arising from the death of an animal. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Wells, 81 Ark. 469, 99 S. W. 534.

And where live stock was in the care of the shipper, it was held that the rule as to the burden of proof being upon the carrier did not apply. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Dexter, 50 Fla. 180, 111 Am. St. Rep. 116, 39 So. 634.

It was said that Fla. Laws 1891, chap. 4071, providing that a railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to stock or other property by the running of the locomotive or cars or other machinery, or for damages done by any person in the service of the company, unless the company shall make it appear that its agents have exercised care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company, did not apply, until it was shown that the injury was caused by the running of the locomotives or cars or other machinery of the defendant.

The owners of live stock, who agreed to take care of the same on the cars, were held bound to aver and prove that a loss was not attributable to a failure to perform their part of the contract, or to negligence in performing the acts which they expressly L.R.A.1915D.

undertook to perform. Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Sherwood, 132 Ind. 129, 17 L.R.A. 339, 32 Am. St. Rep. 239, 31 N. E. 781.

The shipper agreed to load a jack, and that the carrier should not be liable for any damage from improper loading. It was held that it was incumbent upon the shipper to show that the freight was injured by the carrier's negligence. Crow v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 57 Mo. App. 135.

And where the owner agreed to and did take care of live stock, it was held that the burden of proving negligence was on the plaintiff. McBeath v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 20 Mo. App. 445.

A contract provided that live stock was not to be transported in any specified time, that the carrier was to be exempt from liability for damage not the direct result of negligence, that the shipper should take charge of and assume all risk. It was held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show unreasonable delay and injury caused thereby. Gilbert v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 132 Mo. App. 697, 112 S. W. 1002.

Proof of twenty-four hours' delay supported the inference of negligence.

And where the owner of live stock contracted to take care of them, it was held that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier was upon the shipper. Clark v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 64 Mo. 440. He claimed that the cars were started before he could secure the doors of the cars containing his hogs.

And the burden of proof as to the carrier's negligence was held to be on the plaintiff where the shipper, with a lantern in the car with his stock, was found burned to death. Nunnelee v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 145 Mo. App. 17, 129 S. W. 762. The bill of lading was not noticed.

In Lupe v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. 3 Mo. App. 77, where the live-stock contract provided that the shipper should assume the risk and care of stock, the court followed the rule laid down in Ketchum v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 52 Mo. 395, putting the burden of proof as to negligence on the carrier.

These cases were overruled in Witting v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 101 Mo. 631, 10 L.R.A. 602, 20 Am. St. Rep. 636, 14 S. W. 743.

were destroyed, your verdict must be for the defendant."

We are of the opinion that the instructions given fairly covered the one requested, especially in view of the special interrogatory and the verdict thereon. We find no reversible error upon the issue of contributory negligence, in which connection furthermore, it must be remembered that the record affirmatively shows that most of the evidence relative to the cause of the fire and responsibility therefor has been omitted.

5. Some other errors are assigned, but we find nothing requiring further comment.

A car contained horses and household goods. The bill of lading authorized the shipper to accompany the stock. He was left at a station, and the car was burned subsequently. It was held that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he should establish by a preponderance of evidence that the fire was not occasioned by any act of negligence on his part. Faust v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 104 Iowa, 241, 63 Am. St. Rep. 454, 73 N. W. 623.

And when the shipper of stock agreed to care for same on train, it was held that the burden of proof as to showing that the injury was not caused by the shipper's negligence was upon the shipper, and, if occasioned by failure to do what he had undertaken, then that such failure resulted from an omission on the part of the company to perform some duty devolving on it. Grieve v. Illinois C. R. Co. 104 Iowa, 659, 74 N. W. 192.

Stock was delayed while waiting to be transferred to the fair grounds, and one of the horses died. The shipper agreed to accompany the horses and to feed and take care of them. It was held that, conceding the rule to be that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show that the negligent delay on the part of the carrier and injury therefrom, there was a sufficient evidence to take the case to the jury. McMillan v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 147 Iowa, 596, 124 N. W. 1069.

And when the shipper accompanied the shipment of stock and assumed to perform the duties undertaken by the contract, the burden of proof was held to be upon him, in the first instance, to show that the loss did not occur through any fault on his part. Winn v. American Exp. Co. 149 Iowa, 259, 128 N. W. 663. The court said: "This burden is laid upon the plaintiff, not because he contracted to perform such duties, but because he actually undertook to perform them as a matter of fact."

And where shippers were furnished free transportation, and agreed to feed, water, and care for the stock, and did accompany the stock, it was held that the burden of showing freedom from liability was not cast on the carrier. McManus v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 138 Iowa, 150, 128 Am. St. Rep. 180, 115 N. W. 919. L.R.A.1915D.

Upon the whole case, we are of the opinion that, notwithstanding that the case was tried and submitted upon erroneous theories in some respects, yet the defendant was liable as a matter of law, under the proofs, for the reasonable value of the horses at the time of their destruction, unless the same was caused or contributed to by the negligence of the plaintiff's agent, and upon this issue it must be held, so far as can be ascertained from the record, that the jury properly found in favor of the plaintiff.

Order affirmed.

Bunn, J., took no part.

And where the shipper accompanied the stock, it was held that the burden was upon him of showing that the damage did not result through any fault of his own in loading or caring for the stock. And as a general rule he should also show such a state of facts as made out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of defendant. Colsch v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 149 Iowa, 176, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013, 127 N. W. 198, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 915. The court said that "confusion has sometimes resulted through a failure to consider the fact that the owner was not in personal charge of the goods."

A shipper who accompanied stock under his contract to feed and care for the same was held required to prove affirmatively that injury during transportation was not caused by any act or negligence of the shipper, but from negligence of the carrier. Mosteller v. Iowa C. R. Co. 153 Iowa, 390, 133 N. W. 748.

And where the owner of live stock agreed to take care of the same, and accompanied the stock, it was held that the burden of proof was upon him to establish negligence on the part of the carrier where the stock was injured. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. v. Piper, 13 Kan. 510.

And, where the owner contracted to load and unload his stock and take charge of the same, and did do so, it was held that the burden of proof, where the company was charged with negligence for injury to the stock, was upon the owner. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Hedger, 9 Bush, 645, 15 Am. Rep. 740. This was on the ground that the party who has the care of the property is presumed to know how the injury occurred.

The burden of proof was held to be on the owner of live stock, to show negligence on the part of the carrier, where he had contracted to accompany and take care of the same and did go with it, and the stock was injured. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Grover, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 236. But the mere fact that he was on the same train with the stock was not sufficient to show that he was in care of the stock, although the contract, if read to the jury, might have authorized the presumption.

And the burden of proof was held to be upon the owner to establish negligence, where he had agreed to accompany the live stock, but failed to go, and did not notify the carrier. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Martin, 8 Ky. L. Rep. 432.

And where the owner of live stock agreed to take care of the same, it was held that the burden of proof to show negligence causing injury was upon him. Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Hedger, supra. A horse was injured by a defective chute in unloading. The railroad was held liable.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wathen, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 82, 49 S. W. 185, which held that the burden was on the owner of live stock to show negligence on the part of the carrier, the owner sent a man with the stock. The case does not show the carrier's contract.

And, where the owner of live stock agreed to care for the same, it was held that the burden of proof was upon him to establish negligence of the carrier where a fine mare was injured. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Harned, 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1651, 66 S. W. 25; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Greening, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 1180, 100 S. W. 825; Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Hedger, supra.

And, where the injury to goods was from a cause excepted in the bill of lading, it was held that the burden was on the shipper to show that the loss was caused by the negligence of the carrier. Morse v. Canadian P. R. Co. 97 Me. 77, 53 Atl. 874. In this case the shipper of live stock assumed all risk and agreed to care for stock. Some horses were killed by being tramped upon. There was no evidence that the stock was thrown down by jar in starting or by the motion of the cars.

And where the live stock was shipped and the owner agreed to take care of them, and his man did accompany the same, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier. Bartlett v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. 57 Wash. 16, 135 Am. St. Rep. 959, 106 Pac. 487.

d. Breakage and leakage.

The shipper was held required to show negligence in the following cases, where the bill of lading exempted for damage caused by breakage and leakage:

Where the bill of lading exempted from breakage, it was held that the burden of proof was on the libellant to establish that damage from this cause was occasioned by the negligence of the carrier. The Moravian, 2 Haskell, 157, Fed. Cas. No. 9,789.

A bill of lading exempted a ship from liability for breakage of glass. It was held that the burden of proof as to negligence was on the libellants. The Pereire, 8 Ben. 301, Fed. Cas. No. 10,979. In this case it was not known with certainty that any glass was broken until the cases were carted to and opened in libellant's warehouse.

Under a bill of lading that the vessel would not be accountable for leakage, breakage, or rust, it was held that the vessel L.R.A.1915D.

would be responsible for negligence or want of skill in lading, stowage, or delivery, yet such negligence would have to be shown by the party alleging it. The Delhi, 4 Ben. 345, Fed. Cas. No. 3,770. Glass was unloaded by laying boxes on the flat side, but the libellants failed to show damage from negligence.

Glass was shipped, "Owners risk breakage." It was held that where the glass was broken the burden of proving negligence of the carrier was on the owner. It was further held that the same kind of evidence would apply in this case as in any other. Hecht v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 132 Wis. 605, 113 N. W. 68.

A marble fountain was shipped. The bill of lading provided, "Marbles at owner's risk of breakage." It was held that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier was on the shipper. Witting v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 101 Mo. 631, 10 L.R.A. 602, 20 Am. St. Rep. 636, 14 S. W. 743. The court said: "The party who founds his cause of action upon negligence must be prepared to establish the assertion by proof. If the cause of action stands on negligence of the carrier, and not on the common-law liability of the carrier as an insurer, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff from the beginning to the end of the case."

And where the libellant sued for "breakage," which was excepted in the bill of lading, it was held that the nature of the injury indicated for itself that it belonged within the specified exemption from liability, and the burden was on the libellant to establish negligence on the part of the carrier. The Henry B. Hyde, 32 C. C. A. 534, 61 U. S. App. 147, 90 Fed. 114, affirming 82 Fed. 681.

The burden of showing that injury to a cargo was caused by improper stowage was held to be on the owner of the cargo, where the bill of lading exempted for breakage and leakage and perils of the sea. Crowell v. Union Oil Co. 46 C. C. A. 296, 107 Fed. 302.

A machine was shipped at owner's risk. When delivered the legs were broken. It was held that the onus was on the plaintiff to prove the negligence of the carrier, and "though such negligence will not be presumed, it may be inferred from circumstances legitimately appearing in the case." Heck v. Missouri P. R. Co. 51 Mo. App. 532.

A consignment of firecrackers from Hong Kong showed breakage of boxes on delivery. The bill of lading exempted the vessel for "insufficient packing, reasonable wear and tear of packages, leakage, breakage." There was proof on the part of the ship of good stowage, proper loading and discharge, careful handling, and some rough passage. In the absence of affirmative proof of negligence on the part of the carrier, the shipper could not recover. The Lennox, 90 Fed. 308.

Packages containing firecrackers were delivered broken. The bill of lading exempted from liability for breakage or the insufficiency of the packages. It was held that, upon proof of breakage, the steamer relying on said proviso for exemption had the burden of showing that the damage was due to insufficient protection. Doherr v. Houston, 64 C. C. A. 102, 128 Fed. 594, affirming 123 Fed. 334. The bill of lading was indorsed "Packages, firecrackers frail." It was held that there was negligent stowage, and that the respondent failed to sustain the burden of proof. Distinguishing the case of The Lennox, supra, it was said: "The case at bar, however, differs from The Lennox in some of its facts, and in having said special written contract indorsed on the bill of lading, by which the libellant agreed that, as the packages were frail, the steamer should not be accountable for breakage, provided they were insufficiently protected. Upon proof of breakage, the steamer, relying on said proviso for exemption from liability, has the burden of proof to establish that the damage was due to insufficient protection."

A violin was shipped by express in a crate. The receipt provided exemption for breakage unless from gross negligence. The case was intact, but a slat was missing, and one was loose, and the violin was broken. It was held that the plaintiff complied with the rule as to burden of proof by showing the condition of the violin on its arrival. A prima facie case of gross negligence was established. Campe v. Weir, 28 Misc. 243, 58 N. Y. Supp. 1082.

In The Henry B. Hyde, 32 C. C. A. 534, 61 U. S. App. 147, 90 Fed. 114, where the cause of loss was alleged by the libellant to be "breakage," it was said: "In this respect the case differs from some of those cases which are cited by the appellants, such as cases where the carrier had stipulated against loss by the perils of the sea. The Giava, 56 Fed. 243; The Warren Adams, 20 C. C. A. 486, 38 U. S. App. 356, 74 Fed. 413. In such cases the duty rests upon the carrier to show that the damage resulted from the perils of the sea. In the present case the stipulation was explicit. The nature of the injury indicated for itself that it belonged within the specified exemption from liability."

The burden of proof was held to be upon the carrier to show the cause of fracture of an iron casting. The carrier claimed that the owner assumed the risk of having the castings turned when being unloaded, and that this breakage was not caused at that time. If not caused then, the carrier should have shown when it was injured. Hudson River Lighterage Co. v. Wheeler Condenser & Engineering Co. 93 Fed. 374.

Chlorid shipped under a bill of lading exempting loss from "leakage," was partly lost by leakage. It was held that the burden was on the libellant to show negligence on the part of the ship. The Barracouta, 39 Fed. 288.

A bill of lading exempted the ship from liability for leakage and breakage not arising from her own negligence. Some casks of wine were empty on their arrival, and L.R.A.1915D.

others partly. The ship libeled the wine for freight charges. No evidence was offered by the claimants, and there was no other evidence of the negligence of the vessel than the condition of the casks upon her arrival. The casks were of inferior quality, badly coopered and shaky. It was held that the burden of proving that the injury to the casks was caused by the negligence of the ship was cast upon the claimants by the proof of the inferior quality of the casks. 630 Casks of Sherry, 14 Blatchf. 517, Fed. Cas. No. 12,918.

And the burden of proof was held to be on the shipper to show negligence where loss of freight was from leakage and breakage, which were excepted in the bill of lading. The Jefferson, 31 Fed. 489. The evidence of the carrier was insufficient to show that the damage to the barrels was caused by perils of the sea. The barrels were crushed by rolling over them other barrels of heavy freight.

A bill of lading exempted the carrier from loss by leakage. A cask of wine was empty on delivery to the consignee. It was held that the burden was on the libellant to show that the leakage might have been avoided by reasonable skill on the part of the carrier, where the leakage was caused by a plug in the cask becoming loose. The Olbers, 3 Ben. 148, Fed. Cas. No. 10,477.

A bill of lading exempted the vessel from average leakage. Some casks of wine when delivered were empty. It was held that negligence on the part of the vessel should be affirmatively shown by the owners of the wine. Vaughan v. 630 Casks, 7 Ben. 506, Fed. Cas. No. 16,900. The casks might have been empty when shipped.

And where the bill of lading provided, "Ship not responsible for rust, leakage, or shrinkage," it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show that excessive leakage of oil was caused by the negligence of the carrier. The Invincible, 1 Low. Dec. 225, Fed. Cas. No. 7,055. The court said: "It is not enough to show that it exceeds the average leakage, because it is not that alone which is excepted, but any leakage unless caused, in fact, by negligence on the part of the ship."

A bill of lading exempted from liability from "breakage, leakage, or damage." The goods were damaged by oil. Over the place where the goods were stored were two engines lubricated by oil. It was held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff to show negligence of the carrier. Czech v. General Steam Nav. Co. L. R. 3 C. P. 14. Bovill, Ch. J., said: "If the goods are damaged, and no reasonable explanation of the damage can be given except the negligence of the defendants, a jury are justified in finding that such negligence is proved." What he meant was probably better stated by Byles, J.: "But it was shown that the goods were injured by oil, and that they were in close proximity to engines, in lubricating which oil must have been used, . . . and that there was no defect in the engines, and no accident on the voyage. . . . It certainly was strong prima facie evidence.

In Vogel v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 10 Ont. App. Rep. 162, Burton, J. A., said: "The contract stipulates that the company shall not be liable for any damage that may occur to goods arising from leakage or breakage, and some other things not material to the present inquiry, and no doubt this would exempt them from damage arising from those causes, the result of mere accident, where no blame is imputable to them, but not from responsibility for their own negligence and want of care. Under such a contract the onus would be upon the owners of the goods to show that the damage was attributable to the misconduct of the company or their servants."

Where a carrier was to be exempt from liability for injury by reason of leakage, fermentation, and breakage, and grape juice had fermented, it was held that, in order to avail itself of the exemption, the carrier was called upon to show that it had performed the contract to ship on the 25th day of November, or in the first vessel thereafter, and was without fault. Heyl v. Inman S. S. Co. 14 Hun, 564. The jury were instructed to find whether there was sufficient excuse for not sending the casks forward on the 25th day of November or the 2d day of December, the defendant's steamers having sailed on both of those days; and they were further instructed that if the excuse was insufficient, the exemption could not be claimed.

And where a cask of wine was shipped and was empty on arrival, and the cask was not damaged, it was held that the carrier was bound to prove that the loss occurred within a clause exempting from liability. The bill of lading exempted damage from stowage, straining, or other peril of the sea. It was held that proof of tempestuous voyage, and of cargo well stowed and hatches secured, did not shift the burden of proof. Arend v. Liverpool, N. Y. & P. S. S. Co. 64 Barb. 118, affirmed without opinion in 53 N. Y. 606.

In Drew v. Red Line Transit Co. 3 Mo. App. 495, the cases of Levering v. Union Transp. & Ins. Co. 42 Mo. 88, 97 Am. Dec. 320, and Ketchum v. American Merchants' Union Exp. Co. 52 Mo. 391, were followed. In this case the contract provided no liability for breakage, and, glass being broken, it was held that the burden of proof as to absence of negligence was on the carrier. These cases were overruled in Witting v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 101 Mo. 631, 10 L.R.A. 602, 20 Am. St. Rep. 636, 14 S. W. 743.

e. Owner's risk.

Goods were shipped at owner's risk. The train separated and the engineer braked his part. The collision derailed the car. The burden of proof as to negligence was held to be on plaintiff. French v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co. 4 Keyes, 108. The plaintiff failed to prove the exact position of the third L.R.A.1915D.

brakeman, or what he was doing at the time of the accident.

And where goods were shipped at the owner's risk, and the vessel sunk, it was held that the burden of proof as to the carrier's negligence was on the shipper. Moore v. Evans, 14 Barb. 524.

And the burden of proof was held to be on the shipper, to show the carrier's negligence, where wheels were shipped at the owner's risk. Sejalo v. Woolverton, 31 Misc. 752, 64 N. Y. Supp. 48.

The shipper was held to have the burden of proof of negligence where the loss occurred by reason of a cause exempted in the bill of lading. Flynn v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 43 Mo. App. 424. Furniture shipped at "owner's risk" was broken. The court said: "It is enough for the plaintiff to disclose circumstances sufficient to raise a fair inference of negligence."

f. Heat and cold.

A bill of lading exempted from liability for damage to cargo by "heat." Where this was the cause it was held that the burden was on the libellant to show that the negligence or misconduct of the carrier co-operated in the damage to his goods. The New Orleans, 26 Fed. 44.

A bill of lading for nuts from Para to New York excepted damages from heat and steam. Where it was shown that they were stowed in compartments in the usual manner, that the most approved methods of ventilation were adopted, that the hatches were removed when the weather would permit, that tempestuous weather required closing the hatches for the last three days, the burden of proof to show negligence was held to be on the libellant. The Portuense, 35 Fed. 670.

And where defects in the ship's refrigerator were excepted in the bill of lading, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show negligence. The Southwark, 104 Fed. 103, affirmed in 48 C. C. A. 123, 108 Fed. 880, which is reversed in 191 U. S. 1, 48 L. ed. 65, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1. The court said: "No doubt, the machinery for some reason or reasons did not do its work, and no doubt, also, its failure to reduce the temperature sufficiently was due to the several breakdowns. . . . Unless negligence is proved, the cause or causes of the accidents are not important; for the libellants' express contract relieved the carrier from liability for the consequences of any breakdown, however caused."

And where the shippers contracted to supply a refrigerator car for their use with ice, it was held that the carrier had a right to assume, in the absence of notice to the contrary, that they had furnished enough ice to keep the car cool until a delivery to the consignee could be had. The carrier's liability had to be predicated upon negligence, and in the absence of evidence of the carrier's default, it would be assumed that loss was caused by default of shipper. Chi- cago, I. & L. R. Co. v. Reyman, 166 Ind. 278, 76 N. E. 970.

Apples were shipped under a special contract limiting the carrier's liability to damage resulting from negligence, and the apples in a refrigerator car were injured. It was held that the burden of proof as to negligence was on the shipper. Hurst v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. 117 Mo. App. 25, 94 S. W. 794.

And the burden of proving negligence was held to be on the shipper, where the loss occurred by reason of some peril excepted in the contract. Heil v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 16 Mo. App. 363. Vegetables were injured by change in the temperature, which was exempted in the contract.

And where potatoes were frozen and the carrier claimed that the bill of lading exempted for damage from frost, it was held that the burden of proof as to negligence was on the shipper, and the carrier was not required to prove that it was not negligent. But the carrier in this case, having admitted there was a delay in delivery, was held to have the burden of showing that that fault was not negligence. Read v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 60 Mo. 199, overruling Levering v. Union Transp. & Ins. Co. 42 Mo. 88, 97 Am. Dec. 320.

In Drew v. Red Line Transit Co. 3 Mo. App. 495, it was said that the case of Read v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. supra, was not called to the attention of the court when Kirby v. Adams Exp. Co. 2 Mo. App. 369, was decided. In the Read Case the carrier admitted the delay caused the loss by frost of the potatoes, and it was held that, having set up an excuse, it should clear itself of negligence. It was true that the judge seemed to take it for granted that a carrier could exonerate itself by contract, and when it proved the loss to be within the exemption, the burden would be cast on the plaintiff; but that point was not involved in this case.

And where the bill of lading exempted liability for dangers from weather, it was held that the plaintiff had the burden of proof to show negligence of the carrier. Thyll v. New York & L. B. R. Co. 92 App. Div. 513, 87 N. Y. Supp. 345, modifying 84 N. Y. Supp. 175. This was shown by the retention of the goods after demand and exposing them to damp weather.

A contract released liability for losses beyond the carrier's control, which it was urged was the same thing as the act of God, and it was specifically urged that there was a release for loss due to weather, heat, frost, wet, or decay, and that the evidence showed the loss was from heating or freezing. There was nineteen days' delay, which should have been only five, and the delay was wholly unaccounted for. It was held that it was incumbent on the carrier to show that, if the loss was due to heat or freezing, it was not due to delay or negligence in transportation. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 175 Ind. 196, 91 N. E. 735, 93 N. E. 996, citing Blackstock v. New York & E. R. Co. 20 N. Y. L.R.A.1915D.

48, 75 Am. Dec. 372, and Weed v. Panama R. Co. 17 N. Y. 362, 72 Am. Dec. 474. But in neither case was the burden of proof discussed. The court evidently meant that where frost and delay have been established, the burden is on the carrier to show that these are within the exemptions, although the word "negligence" is used.

g. Decay and rust.

The burden of proof was held to be on the libellant to show that deterioration of a shipment of garlic from Naples might have been avoided by the exercise of skill on the part of the carrier. The Hindoustan, 14 C. C. A. 650, 35 U. S. App. 173, 67 Fed. 794. The bill of lading exempted for "deterioration of fresh vegetables,"—"decay." The libellant contended that the ventilation was defective.

And the burden of proof was held to be on the libellants to show negligence of the carrier where dogskins were damaged by the sweating of the cargo, which "sweating" was exempted in the bill of lading. The Flintshire, 69 Fed. 471. No evidence was introduced to show that the cargo should have been stowed differently, or that it was improperly dunnaged.

Where the bill of lading exempted for "rust," and a shipment of sheet iron was badly rusted and wet with sea water, it was held that evidence of sweating or wet from moisture in the air was not adequate to cover the loss, but might shift the burden of proof to the shipper to show that the loss was not occasioned by that peril. The Svend, 1 Fed. 61.

A cargo of beans was damaged on delivery. It was held that the burden was on the carrier to show that the damage was caused by a risk excepted in the bill of lading. The ship claimed that the beans were improperly cured, but there was no evidence as to this and they apparently were properly stowed. The carrier was held liable although the cause of the damage was unknown. The Patria, 125 Fed. 425, affirmed in 68 C. C. A. 397, 132 Fed. 971.

h. Perils of navigation.

It is generally held that where the bill of lading exempts the carrier from liability for loss caused by the perils of the sea, the carrier must show that there were perils sufficient to cause the loss. The burden then is on the plaintiff to show that want of care on the part of the carrier was the cause. But in some cases it is held that, in order to bring the damage within the perils of navigation, the carrier should prove that it used due care and diligence. See also subd. III.

A cargo of sugar consigned subject to the perils of the sea was damaged on arrival. It was held that the burden was on the ship to show that the case came within the exception in the bill of lading. If it was shown that the peril was adequate to produce this result, and that there were not sufficient means at the command of the master to overcome the peril or prevent the damage, then the ship would be held to have made out a prima facie defense, and then it would be incumbent on the libellant to show further evidence of negligence. The Sloga, 10 Ben. 315, Fed. Cas. No. 12,955.

And where the defendant met a prima facie case by showing that the damage to the goods came from the dangers of navigation, one of the excepted causes of liability in the bill of lading, it was held that the burden then rested on plaintiff to show that this danger and loss might have been avoided by the use of proper care and skill. Western Transp. Co. v. Downer, 11 Wall. 129, 20 L. ed. 160. The court said: "There was no presumption from the simple fact of a loss occurring in this way, that there was any negligence on the part of the company."

And where it was shown that damage to a cargo was caused by perils of navigation excepted in the bill of lading, it was held that the burden of proof was then on the shipper to show negligence. The Neptune, 6 Blatchf. 193, Fed. Cas. No. 10,118.

Where wool was damaged on a voyage, from contact with a cargo of wet redwood, and it was claimed that the damage was caused by perils of the sea that were excepted in the bill of lading, it was held that the burden of proof was on the vessel to show this. The court held: "Even if the burden of proof was upon the libellant to show the particular cause of the injury, I think it is sufficiently shown" (improper stowage). The Pharos, 9 Fed. 912.

And where the injury to a cargo of hardware was established, and the bill of lading excepted the dangers of navigation, it was held incumbent on the carrier to show that the injury was caused by the dangers of navigation, and then it devolved on the shipper to show that it might have been avoided by the exercise of skill and care. Hunt v. The Cleveland, 6 McLean, 76, Fed. Cas. No. 6,885.

Thread shipped in cases was damaged from the damp and mildewed, and where the burden of proof was held to be on the shipper to show negligence after the injury was shown to be within the excepted causes. The bill of lading excepted "dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation." Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. 272, 13 L. ed. 985.

In Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Moss, 60 Miss. 1003, 45 Am. Rep. 428, the case of Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. 279, 13 L. ed. 987, was distinguished and criticized, the court saying that the rule that the burden of proof to show negligence was on the plaintiff was apparently based on the proposition that by the contract the carrier ceased to be a common carrier, and became a simple bailee for hire. This was held in York Mfg. Co. v. Illinois C. R. Co. 3 Wall. 107, 18 L. ed. 170. Then the next step taken by common carriers was in the direction of contracting against their negligence, as a private carrier might do. Then the courts became alarmed and denied that a common carrier could by contract exempt itself from losses caused by its own negligence. To do this it was necessary to hold that a common carrier could not devest itself of its character as such. To this effect it was held in New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 624.

In Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543, the case of Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. 273, 13 L. ed. 985, which held that the burden of proof was on the plaintiff, was criticized, the court saying: "I would remark that the point under consideration was not very prominent either in the discussion or the decision of the case in which it is enumerated."

A bill of lading excepted "the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation." A cargo of merchandise was damaged, and the damage was claimed to have been caused by improperly stowing a cargo of salt between the decks. It was held that the burden of proof was on the libellant to establish that this was the cause of the injury. The libellant failed. Rich v. Lambert, 12 How. 347, 13 L. ed. 1017.

A bill of lading excepted perils of the sea and navigation. A shipment of paper stock was damaged by water and oil. It was held that the libellants could show that the damage might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable skill, but that they should establish negligence affirmatively. The Sabioncello, 7 Ben. 357, Fed. Cas. No. 12,198. More care should have been used in stowing the cargo.

And where it was shown that the injury to a cargo was sustained during a severe stress of weather, and was the result of it, and there was also affirmative proof of proper care in stowage, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show that by proper attention the damage might have been avoided. The George Heaton, 20 Fed. 326.

The carrier proved the encountering by the ship during the voyage of weather sufficiently heavy to warrant the conclusion that the immediate cause of the destruction and loss of goods was the motion of the ship in heavy weather, which perils of the sea were excepted. This proof was held to shift the burden to the libellant to show that the result would have been prevented by due care. Christie v. The Craighton, 41 Fed. 62.

And where the proof by the carrier showed that the breakage of barrels of indigo was caused by the excepted perils of the sea and the motion of the ship, it was held that this shifted the burden of proof to the libellant to show that this result of the motion of the ship would have been prevented by the exercise of due care in the stowage of the casks. The Polynesia, 30 Fed. 210.

Where the vessel attempted to show that damage was caused to drums of glycerine by perils of the sea, and the bill of lading exempted from loss by leakage, the burden of proof was held to be on the libellant to show negligence. The mates' evidence to the effect that the wood fastenings to these two drums were all that were displaced would not permit the inference that the damage was caused by rough weather alone, but that it was caused by negligence of the carrier. Marx v. The Britannia, 34 Fed. 906.

And where the bill of lading exempted from liability for stranding, and the cargo was thus lost, it was held that the burden was on the libellant to prove that the cause of the stranding was negligence of the master. The Montana, 17 Fed. 377. This was shown by the master's evidence given in his statement.

Proof of loss of goods was held to throw the burden on the carrier to show that the loss happened by the dangers excepted. The court instructed the jury that so far as the plaintiffs allege negligence, the burden of proof is on them. Alden v. Pearson, 3 Gray, 342. The bill of lading excepted dangers of navigation and fire. Some lard was lost in transit.

Although the rule generally is that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier is on the shipper where the damage arises from a cause excepted in the bill of lading, there are some cases in which the carrier, which claimed that the damage was occasioned by an excepted cause, perils of navigation, was also required to prove that it had used due care.

The burden of proof was held to be on the vessel owners to show that damages to a piano from sea water came from perils of the sea. But before this is done it was held incumbent on them to negative all other causes. The Emma Johnson, 1 Sprague, 527, Fed. Cas. No. 4,465. The court said: "In particular they must show by full and satisfactory evidence that the vessel was in good condition and suitable for the voyage at its inception."

In A. J. Tower Co. v. Southern P. Co. 184 Mass. 472, 69 N. E. 348, the burden of making out a defense that oiled clothing was one of the excepted articles, as being inflammable, and under a custom should be stored above deck, was held to be on the carrier where it was lost by reason of a storm at sea. The court said: "For this purpose it might show by competent evidence the composition and classification of the goods that were shipped, and in so doing it would prove not only that they were within the class of merchandise that in the contract were at the shipper's or owner's risk, but that carrying them on deck would not be negligence on the part of the carrier."

The loss of goods committed to a carrier and in possession of its servants was held to put the burden of proof on it to show how it took place, and that it was not due to its fault, but in consequence of some of the unavoidable accidents excepted in the bill of lading. Bazin v. Liverpool & P. S. S. Co. 3 Wall. Jr. 229, Fed. Cas. No. 1,152. The evidence that a new steamer had been either ignorantly, recklessly, or carelessly dashed against a cape in a thick fog was held not to discharge the carrier.

In The Ocean Wave, 3 Biss. 317, Fed. Cas. No. 10,416, it was held that before a shipper L.R.A.1915D.

should be put to prove negligence on the part of the carrier, the carrier should furnish evidence that the accident was occasioned by one of the excepted perils, and that it was unavoidable. A boat and barges attempted to run by piers of a bridge. It should be shown that they were in the usual channel.

And where the carrier claimed that a cargo was lost by reason of the "perils of navigation" excepted in the bill of lading, and the libellant claimed that the officers of the steamer were guilty of a wrongful act in attempting to pass bridge piers in a heavy wind, it was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier, and that nothing short of clear proof, leaving no reasonable doubt for controversy, should be permitted to discharge it from duties which the law annexed to his employment. The Mohler (The Mollie Mohler v. Home Ins. Co.) 21 Wall. 230, 22 L. ed. 485. The court does not discuss whether or not the burden was to prove that the cause of the damage was the peril of navigation excepted in the bill of lading, or that the cause was not due to unskilful navigation, except in saying that if the carrier neglected a warning, it cannot escape on the ground that the particular peril was a sudden gust of wind, and that it was chargeable with the consequences of its negligence.

Harter act of Congress, Feb. 13, 1893, requires the owner to provide a seaworthy vessel, and prohibits any vessel between United States and foreign ports from inserting in a bill of lading any exemption from use of due diligence in equipping. The bill of lading provided that meat was at the risk of the owner, and that the vessel would not be liable for breakdown of refrigerator. It was held that where meat spoiled the burden of proof was upon the owner of the vessel to show that it was perfectly seaworthy in every respect before it sailed, and it was not on the shipper to show negligence. The Southwark, 191 U. S. 1, 48 L. ed. 65, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1, reversing 48 C. C. A. 123, 108 Fed. 880. The court said that exoneration in the respects named would depend on the exercise of due diligence in providing a seaworthy vessel, and the burden was on the carrier to show this.

And where the benefit of an exemption of the perils of navigation was claimed, it was held incumbent on the carrier to bring itself strictly within the terms of the exemption. The Juniata Paton, 1 Biss. 16, Fed. Cas. No. 7,584. The court said: "It is by no means unreasonable to require him to prove the loss and the manner of it, and that usual care and diligence had been used to avoid it. This is peculiarly within his own knowledge or those in his employment and under his control."

And on a libel for lost and damaged baggage, where the ticket exempted from perils of navigation, it was held that proof of seaworthiness, including proper stowage, should be made by the carrier before shifting the burden of proof on the shipper to establish carelessness. The Kensington, 88

Fed. 331, affirmed in 36 C. C. A. 533, 94 Fed. 885, which is reversed in 183 U. S. 263, 46 L. ed. 190, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 102.

The burden of proof was held to be on the carrier to bring the loss of a cargo of sugar within the excepted cause, the perils of the sea. So, where the evidence on the part of the ship showed that the damage complained of resulted from the unseaworthiness of the vessel, or from the negligence of the officers, the burden of proof was not shifted to the libellants to prove negligence. The Charles J. Willard, 38 Fed. 759. There was no evidence that the windows were protected by shutters when the sea broke through, or that the limber holes were kept clear so that the pumps would be effective.

A bill of lading exempted for any latent defect in appurtenances or unseaworthiness, provided the owners exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy. It was held that the burden of proof to show such due diligence was on the owners where a steerage closet valve chest leaked by reason of wear, and damaged a cargo. The Friesland, 104 Fed. 99, affirmed in 51 C. C. A. 594, 113 Fed. 1018. The court said that "the exemption in the shipowner's favor is in derogation of the shipper's ordinary rights and remedies."

And where the bill of lading was, "Vessel not accountable for breakage, chipping, chafing, leakage, rust, or numbers, or for splits or stains in plank, if properly stowed," it was held that the burden was on the carrier to show proper stowage. This would exempt the carrier unless the shipper should then show that the damage might have been avoided by reasonable care on the part of the carrier. The Isaac Reed, 82 Fed. 566.

And where the bill of lading exempted from perils of navigation, it was held sufficient defense if the defendants could show that the accident was the result of an unavoidable peril of the river, and was not contributed to by any negligence, want of skill, or default on their part. Hill v. Sturgeon, 35 Mo. 212, 86 Am. Dec. 149.

A bill of lading stated that the owner assumed the risk of loss by navigation and all damage from unavoidable delay. There was a delay of twelve days and the boat was lost. It was held, without approving the exemption, that there was such delay as established a prima facie case of negligence, and threw upon the carrier the burden of showing that the delay was unavoidable and fairly within the exemption. Falvey v. Northern Transp. Co. 15 Wis. 129.

The burden of proof was held to be on the carrier to show that a box was landed, where it claimed that the contract relieved it from liability for the dangers of navigation, fire, collision, or delivery, except failure to land goods on dock or pier. Browning v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 78 Wis. 391, 10 L.R.A. 415, 23 Am. St. Rep. 414, 47 N. W. 428.

In Schaller v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 97 Wis. 31, 71 N. W. 1042, it was said that L.R.A.1915D.

the ruling in Browning v. Goodrich Transp. Co. 78 Wis. 391, 10 L.R.A. 415, 23 Am. St. Rep. 414, 47 N. W. 428, did not reach the question of burden of proof as to negligence, which would have arisen if the loss of goods had been shown to have been caused by fire,—one of the perils expressly stipulated against.

III. Pennsylvania.

In this state the rule is that the burden of proving negligence in actions against carriers where the contract exempts from liability is on the shipper. But the rule is otherwise where the exemption is from perils of navigation. The cases hold that the proof of delivery in a damaged condition raises the inference of negligence.

A bill of lading exempted from loss by fire. Goods were burned. It was held that the burden of proof as to the negligence of the carrier was on the plaintiff. Colton v. Cleveland & P. R. Co. 67 Pa. 211, 5 Am. Rep. 424.

A bill of lading limited the liability to $100 per every 100 lbs. of freight. The goods were destroyed by fire. It was held that where the carrier accounted for the loss without implicating itself in a charge of negligence, a sufficient defense would be made unless the plaintiff proved negligence. Farnham v. Camden & A. R. Co. 55 Pa. 53. The court said: "This is the plaintiff's reply to the plea in excuse of performance. It is an affirmative position and must be proved by the party alleging it."

In Grogan v. Adams Exp. Co. 114 Pa. 523, 60 Am. Rep. 360, 7 Atl. 134, the cases of Farnham v. Camden & A. R. Co. supra, and American Exp. Co. v. Sands, 55 Pa. 140, were compared, the court saying: "The doctrine of these two cases is precisely alike on the fundamental proposition that liability could be limited by special contract, but not for negligence. In the one case the carrier escaped liability because he accounted for the destruction of the goods in a manner which did not impose liability without express proof of negligence. In the other case, the carrier was held liable because he did not account for the injury, and a presumption of negligence arose which he did not rebut."

And where the bill of lading for petroleum provided that freight should be paid on every barrel, full or empty, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to prove that negligence caused leakage. Forbes v. Dallett, 9 Phila. 515.

And where a vessel was destroyed by fire, and the bill of lading exempted from loss by fire, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier, where the proof of the loss was unattended by circumstances indicating negligence. Patterson v. Clyde, 67 Pa. 500.

Horses were shipped, the owner agreeing to accompany the stock and assume all risk of injury, except from gross negligence. The owner got out of the caboose and looked at the stock at each stop. On arriving at destination one horse was dead. This left the burden of proof on the plaintiff. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Raiordon, 119 Pa. 577, 4 Am. St. Rep. 670, 13 Atl. 324. The plaintiff's evidence left him no fact from which the presumption of negligence could arise.

And where live stock was shipped at "owner's risk," and this was explained by the agent to refer to those accidents which might occur inside the car, and the train was derailed by a drover falling on the track and plaintiff's horses were killed, it was held that the most that a contract limiting liability could do would be to give relief "from those conclusive presumptions of negligence which arise when an accident was not inevitable." Goldrey v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 30 Pa. 242, 72 Am. Dec. 703.

But where the exemption is from perils of navigation, it seems that the carrier in this state must show that it used due care.

Nails were shipped on a canal boat, and were damaged by the boat striking a rock. The bill of lading excepted "dangers of navigation." It was said that in the absence of evidence acquitting the captain or master of the boat of all blame upon his part, the jury may presume that the loss was occasioned by his negligence. Humphreys v. Reed, 6 Whart. 435.

And where a cargo of rice was shipped under a contract providing "the dangers of navigation excepted," and the boat was sunk, it was held that the carrier would have to bring itself within the exemption in order to have the advantage of it. Whitesides v. Russell, 8 Watts & S. 44. The court said: "It is not unreasonable to require him to prove the loss and manner of it, and, further, that the usual care and diligence had been used to avoid it. This is peculiarly within his knowledge, and in the knowledge of those who are in his employment and under his control."

In Hays v. Kennedy, 41 Pa. 378, 80 Am. Dec. 627, goods were shipped by a steamboat which was sunk in a collision. The bill of lading excepted "unavoidable dangers of the river navigation." It was held that the carrier "must prove not only an accident which the law admits as inevitable in its character, but also that he was guilty of no fault in falling into the danger, or in his efforts to extricate himself from it." The court said: "When they provide that they shall not be liable for the unavoidable dangers of the navigation, they mean dangers that are unavoidable by them, supposing that they have exercised all the precaution, care, and skill that the law usually demands of common carriers."

In Patterson v. Clyde, supra, the cases of Humphreys v. Reed; Whitesides v. Russell; and Hays v. Kennedy, supra, were distinguished, as there the exceptions were "the dangers of the navigation," "the dangers of the river," and the unavoidable dangers of the river "navigation," and it was held that the carrier must not only prove the loss, but the manner of it, and the fact that actual care and diligence had been used to avoid it. The reason of these decisions was L.R.A.1915D.

that, without proof of the circumstances, it was impossible to say whether the loss arose from a danger of navigation.

IV. Louisiana.

In this state the general rule is followed that the carrier must show that the injury was produced by some of the exempted causes, and then the burden is on the shipper to show that the loss occurred by reason of the negligence of the carrier. Some cases require the carrier to prove that it used due care to avoid the accident, and that goods were properly stowed.

A bill of lading exempted from liability for fire. Cotton on a flat car caught fire and burned. It was held that, the shipper having proved the loss of the cotton, it devolved on the carrier to show that it was occasioned by one of the excepted perils, and this being established, the burden of proof was on the shipper to prove negligence on the part of the carrier. New Orleans Mut. Ins. Co. v. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. 20 La. Ann. 302.

And the accidental sinking of a ship was held to be one of the perils of navigation excepted in the bill of lading; but if the sinking might have been avoided, the burden of proof as to negligence would be on the shipper. Kirk v. Folsom, 23 La. Ann. 584.

And it was held that if the evidence showed that the injury to freight was from a cause excepted in the bill of lading, then the burden of proof would be on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier. Price v. The Uriel, 10 La. Ann. 413. The ship having failed to establish that the injury to the iron was caused by the perils of the sea, it was held that it was not exonerated.

And where the bill of lading exempted from liability for accidents of machinery, boilers, steam, or dangers of sea, and in a storm, by reason of the springing of the timbers, a pipe was opened letting steam on a lot of furniture, it was held that, as the damage was from one of the excepted causes, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to prove negligence of the carrier. Kelham v. The Kensington, 24 La. Ann. 100.

In Thomas v. The Morning Glory, 13 La. Ann. 269, 71 Am. Dec. 509, the bill of lading exempted from liability for leakage. Some of the casks of wine were empty. The shipper stowed the cargo. Three of the judges held this latter fact a good defense. In regard to the burden of proof as to negligence, Cole, J., held that the burden of proof would not be on the carrier for ordinary leakage, but if the casks were empty, then the burden of proof would be upon it.

But where dangers of river and fire were excepted, and the privilege of lighterage and stowage given, and a flatboat on which cotton was stowed struck something that caused a leak, and thirty-two bales of cotton were landed on a beach and left for some weeks, it was held that the carrier was bound to prove that it used due diligence and skill to avoid the accident, and that it was unavoidable. The Jean Webre v. Carter, 12 La. Ann. 446.

And if a ship was exonerated from "breakage" in a bill of lading, it was held incumbent on the carrier to prove that the boxes were properly stowed. Tardos v. The Toulon, 14 La. Ann. 432, 74 Am. Dec. 435. The bill of lading provided: "Not accountable for rust, breakage, or leakage unless improperly stowed."

And where horses were under the control and care of the shipper, and were injured, and the pleadings of the carrier admitted that it was liable for carelessness of the crew, it was held that, the injury to the animals being proved, the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that the injury was caused by accident or vis major or, in the peculiar case presented, by the fault of the plaintiff or his servants. Roberts v. Riley, 15 La. Ann. 103, 77 Am. Dec. 183.

V. Tennessee.

In Dillard Bros. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 2 Lea, 288, it was said: "There seems to be some conflict in the authorities whether, when the loss is shown to have been occasioned in one of the excepted modes, the burden is upon the shipper to show negligence, or on the carrier to show that the occurrence was not the result of negligence." In this case the carrier assumed the burden. Cotton was burned and the bill of lading exempted for loss by fire. The charge placed the burden as to proof of want of negligence on the carrier.

Where the carrier's contract exempted it from all liability on account of dangers of the river, it was held that the carrier should show that a loss from the boat sinking happened from a cause which human foresight or prudence could not avert. Turney v. Wilson, 7 Yerg. 339, 27 Am. Dec. 515.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Manchester Mills, 88 Tenn. 656, 14 S. W. 314, referring to Turney v. Wilson, 7 Yerg. 340, 27 Am. Dec. 515, it was said: "It was properly held that an unknown cause producing a leaky boat was not a 'danger of the river.' What was said about the necessity of proving a danger which could not be avoided by the utmost care was unnecessary to the case."

A live stock contract limited the value of a horse to $100. It was held that the carrier could not limit its liability if it was negligent, and the burden of proving that it was not negligent was on the carrier where a mare died on the way. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Wynn, 88 Tenn. 320, 14 S. W. 311. "The trial court charged the jury that if the mare was shown to have been in good health and condition when started upon her journey, it was incumbent on the railroad company to show that her death was not caused by its negligence; and he at the same time refused to charge, as requested in behalf of the company, that the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish negligence." "The instruction given was correct." It was said that "the carrier may exonerate itself from responsibility either showing that the case falls within one of the exceptions of the common law, or within one of the stipulations of the special contract." This latter clause was adopted as the rule in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Manchester Mills, 88 Tenn. 653, 14 S. W. 314.

But in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Manchester Mills, supra, the carrier's contract exempted it from liability for loss by fire. It was held that where a loss of goods by fire was shown, either upon proof by the plaintiff or defendant, and such proof did not show circumstances imputing negligence, the plaintiff would have to show some negligence on the part of the carrier.

In Lancaster Mills v. Merchants' Cotton-Press & Storage Co. 89 Tenn. 1, 24 Am. St. Rep. 586, 14 S. W. 317, it was said that where the pleadings show a valid stipulation for exemption from loss or damage by fire, and the failure of the carrier to safely carry and deliver was due to fire, no case is made unless the fire is charged to have been the result of negligence. "The burden of proof, when the loss is thus admitted to have been by fire, is upon the owner to prove negligence."

And where there was a limited liability contract and the loss of hogs fell within one of the excepted causes, it was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show negligence. Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Stone, 112 Tenn. 348, 105 Am. St. Rep. 955, 79 S. W. 1031.

VI. Statutory rule.

In Georgia the statute puts the burden of proof as to want of negligence on the carrier notwithstanding the exemption in the contract. In Virginia and North Carolina the statute makes evidence of damage to the freight prima facie proof of negligence.

Georgia Code, § 2713 (§ 2265) provided that in order for a carrier to avail itself of the act of God or exception under the contract as an excuse, it must establish not only that the act of God or excepted fact ultimately occasioned the loss, but that its own negligence did not contribute thereto. The freight candy was "released" at 6 cents per pound valuation. It was held that the burden was on the carrier to establish that the loss was within the exception, and not occasioned by its own negligence. Here there was no explanation of the loss, and the carrier admitted its liability, and tendered the released rate. Georgia Southern & F. R. Co. v. Johnson, 121 Ga. 231, 48 S. E. 807.

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. White, 88 Ga. 805, 15 S. E. 802, it was said that Ga. Code, § 2086, provided that one who pursues the business constantly or continuously for any period of time, or any distance of transportation, is a common carrier, and as such, is bound to use extraordinary diligence. In cases of loss the presumption of law is against him, and no excuse avails him unless it was occasioned by the act of God or the public enemies of the state.

Under Georgia Code, § 2066 (§ 2040), it was held that when goods were damaged in the hands of the carrier, the burden of proof was on it to show that it was free from negligence, or that, notwithstanding its negligence, the damage occurred without its fault. In all cases the presumption of law was against the carrier. Central R. Co. v. Hasselkus, 91 Ga. 382, 44 Am. St. Rep. 37, 17 S. E. 838. This action was one for damages to fruit from delay on the road.

A contract to transport horses provided exemption from all injury, loss, or damage by reason of animals being weak or escaping, and all other damage not caused by fraud or gross negligence of the railroad. Georgia Code, § 3033, provides that a railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to stock or other property by the running of the cars or other machinery, or for damage done by any person in the employment of the company unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption being against the company. It was held that the presumption applied where some horses were missing and some were injured. Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 78 Ga. 646, 3 S. E. 267. There was no evidence as to how the injury was caused, and the case squarely differs from Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Dexter, 50 Fla. 180, 111 Am. St. Rep. 116, 39 So. 634, construing a similar statute.

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. White, 88 Ga. 805, 15 S. E. 802, it was said that "one of the cases of exception by contract, namely, Columbus & W. R. Co. v. Kennedy, 78 Ga. 646, 3 S. E. 267, follows (without citing it) Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543. In the body of the opinion, however, and in the third headnote, the rule of diligence is put too low, being that prescribed in § 3033 of the Code, which is applicable to injuries committed by railroad companies generally, instead of to injuries to goods which those companies have in their possession as common carriers. The proper reference to the Code would have been to § 2066, which exacts extraordinary, and not merely ordinary, diligence."

Georgia Code, § 2264, provides that in case of loss the presumption of law is against the common carrier, and § 2321 provides that a railroad company shall be liable for any damage done to persons, stock, or other property, by the running of the locomotives or cars, or for damage done by any person in the employment of such company, unless the company shall make it appear that their agents have exercised all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, the presumption in all cases being against the company. It was held that the burden was on the defendant to show that the loss of live stock was without the fault of the defendant. Cooper v. Raleigh & G. R. Co. 110 Ga. 659, 36 S. E. 240. The contract released defendant from liability for loss from a number of causes.

A bill of lading gave a released rate of $5 per 100 lbs. valuation, where household goods and a trunk were shipped and the trunk was lost. It was held that the contract limiting the value of the trunk to $5 per 100 lbs. was inoperative if the loss was occasioned by negligence on the part of the defendant; and there being no explanation, the presumption was that it resulted from the defendant's negligence. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Keener, 93 Ga. 808, 44 Am. St. Rep. 197, 21 S. E. 287.

And if a carrier relied upon an exception contained in a special contract to vary its common-law liability, it was held that the burden was on it to show that the loss came within the exception, and also that its own negligence did not contribute thereto (Civil Code, § 2265). Southern R. Co. v. Montag, 1 Ga. App. 649, 57 S. E. 933. This rule was applied where the carrier claimed that the loss occurred beyond its terminus.

And where a carrier made a through contract of shipment, upon proof of loss or damage it was held that the burden was upon the carrier to show that the damage or loss was occasioned within the exception agreed on in the contract; that is, beyond its own line; and also that, its own negligence did not contribute thereto. Southern R. Co. v. Frank, 5 Ga. App. 574, 63 S. E. 656. This was under Ga. Civ. Code, § 2265.

In order that a carrier may avail itself of an exception under a special contract to avoid liability for loss or damage to a shipment of goods, it was held that it must show that the damage was within the exception, and that it was not negligent under Ga. Civ. Code, § 2265. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. v. Broome, 3 Ga. App. 641, 60 S. E. 355.

Where loss by fire was exempted, it was held that the burden of proof as to negligence of the carrier was upon it. Berry v. Cooper, 28 Ga. 543. The court said: "I admit the general rule that he who alleges must prove; but it is equally well established that the burden of proof should be upon him who best knows what the facts are."

And if liability for loss by fire was exempted, it was held that plaintiff should recover unless the carrier proved that there was no negligence on its part; and the onus of proof of this fact was on the carrier. Southern Exp. Co. v. Newby, 36 Ga. 635, 91 Am. Dec. 783.

But where the shipper stipulated that he had examined the car and found it in good condition, it was held that the burden of showing that stock was injured by latent defects in the car was on the plaintiff. Seaboard Air-Line R. Co. v. McRae, 14 Ga. App. 94, 80 S. E. 211; Williams v. Central of Georgia R. Co. 117 Ga. 830, 43 S. E. 980, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 9. In both cases the ordinary presumption of negligence was held not applicable.

And where the contract limited liability, holding the carrier liable only for gross negligence, it was held that the carrier overcame the presumption by showing that the equipment was in good condition, that there was no collision, no sudden jerking, and that the agents exercised proper care of the stock. Georgia Southern & F. R. Co. v. Greer, 2 Ga. App. 516, 58 S. E. 782. The shipper loaded the cattle and some were dead when they arrived at their destination, and the deaths were caused by overloading.

Virginia Code 1904, § 12941, provides that whenever any property is received by a common carrier, loss or injury to it shall be prima facie evidence of the negligence of such common carrier. Southern Exp. Co. v. Jacobs, 109 Va. 27, 63 S. E. 17.

After proof of loss or damage, it was held that the burden of proof was on the carrier to show that the damage was from an exempted cause, and also to show that the injury was not due to its negligence. Mitchell v. Carolina C. R. Co. 124 N. C. 236, 44 L.R.A. 515, 32 S. E. 671. In this case a mule died on the cars. This was on the ground that where a particular fact necessary to be proved rests peculiarly within the knowledge of a party, upon him rests the burden of proof. North Carolina Laws, 1897, chap. 46, provides that upon proof of injury to freight in the possession or under the control of any railroad or steamboat company it shall be presumed that the injury was caused by the negligent acts of said company's agents or servants. The court said: "It is contended for the defendant that it is exempted by this contract from all loss or damage not arising from its own negligence, and that therefore, it cannot be required to prove the loss within the excepted classes without requiring it, in effect, to prove its own want of negligence. Even so."

And the burden of proof was held to be on the carrier to show that an injury proved was within excepted causes, and that the injury was caused in some way that would relieve it from responsibility. Lyon v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 165 N. C. 143, 81 S. E. 1. This case adopts the rule in Mitchell v. Carolina C. R. Co. supra. The exemptions were not given. If the bill of lading exempted for all damage not caused by its negligence, the carrier would have to prove that it was not negligent in order to take advantage of the exemption, according to the Mitchell Case. Evidence of the damaged condition of the goods made a prima facie case.

And where cattle were shipped, it was held that the plaintiff's case was made out when he had shown that the cattle were received by the carrier, and not delivered, or delivered in a damaged condition. The burden then was on the defendant to show a special contract and bring the injuries clearly within the terms of its exemption. The unreasonable detention was held to be evidence of negligence. Hinkle v. Southern R. Co. 126 N. C. 932, 78 Am. St. Rep. 685, 36 S. E. 348.

Watermelons were shipped "subject to delay." It was held that it was intended to exempt the carrier from liability for negligence, the clause would not be enforceable. It was also held that the plaintiff had a prima facie case when he showed the receipt of the goods by the carrier, and then nondelivery, or delivery in a damaged condition. Any further defense would be in the nature of confession and avoidance. Parker v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 133 N. C. 335, 63 L.R.A. 827, 45 S. E. 658.

In Smith v. North Carolina R. Co. 64 N. C. 235, a shipping contract exempted the carrier from liability for loss by fire. Cotton was burned. It was held that the plaintiff had the burden of proving negligence on the part of the carrier. This case is not in line with the subsequent cases in that state, and the rule would be different under the act of 1897. The court followed the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. 344, 12 L. ed. 465, and said: "They may, by special contract, be relieved from their peculiar liability as common carriers, . . . when there is a special contract, the burden of proving the want of ordinary care, or, what is the same thing, of proving negligence, is upon the owner."

In Mitchell v. Carolina C. R. Co. supra, the court said, referring to the case of Smith v. North Carolina R. Co. supra, there the exemption claimed was special, being as to fire only. "The general principles were not elaborated, and the opinion was evidently based entirely on the particular facts of the case." The contract was proved and it was shown that the cotton was destroyed by fire. "This brought the loss within the exception. What the court evidently intended to say was that then the burden of proving negligence rested on the plaintiff."

VII. Nebraska.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Lawler, 40 Neb. 365, 58 N. W. 968, which held that a contract limiting liability for fire was void, it was held that where property was delivered to the carrier, its failure to deliver raised the presumption of negligence, and it devolved on it to overcome the presumption by proof; and that it was not sufficient to show that the goods were destroyed by fire, but it must show that there was no negligence on its part (following 2 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 219).

Cattle were injured and some were killed in transit. An instruction that if the cattle were in poor condition and some of them died and others were injured without any negligence on the part of the carrier, the plaintiff could not recover, but the burden of proof was on the defendant to show those facts by a preponderance of evidence, was held as favorable for defendant as the evidence warranted. Ralston v. Union P. R. Co. 96 Neb. 199, 147 N. W. 478. The carrier claimed that the shipper agreed to send a man, but failed to do so. It was held that this did not change the rule.

A carrier furnished a car improperly bedded for live stock, and delayed the train. The shipper agreed to go with and take care of the stock. His car of stock was left on the way without his knowledge, and he went on further. The stock arrived in bad condition. The defendant pleaded certain facts as contributory negligence on the part of the shipper. It was held that such a pleading established the burden of proof and the carrier assumed the laboring oar. Allen v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 82 Neb. 726, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 278, 118 N. W. 655.

The shipper agreed to accompany and care for live stock. The carrier knew that no one accompanied the same. It was held that the delivery of live stock to a carrier in good order, and their arrival in bad order, made a prima facie case, and it devolved on the carrier to show that the damage resulted from some cause which would exempt it from liability. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Slattery, 76 Neb. 721, 124 Am. St. Rep. 825, 107 N. W. 1045, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 405.

Nebraska Const. art. 11, § 4, provides that "the liability of railroad corporations as common carriers shall never be limited." Before this was adopted it was held that the common law applied. Atchison & N. R. Co. v. Washburn, 5 Neb. 117. Under this provision it was held that a carrier could not limit its liability. St. Joseph & G. I. R. Co. v. Palmer, 38 Neb. 463, 22 L.R.A. 335, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 494, 56 N. W. 957, and Missouri P. R. Co. v. Vandeverter, 26 Neb. 222, 3 L.R.A. 129, 41 N. W. 998, where it was claimed plaintiff could not recover because he had not given the notice required in the contract.

In Union P. R. Co. v. Thompson, 75 Neb. 464, 106 N. W. 598, and Cook v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 78 Neb. 64, 110 N. W. 718, the defense that the contract required notice of damage to be given within ten days was held to violate the constitutional provision.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Kennard Glass & Paint Co. 59 Neb. 435, 81 N. W. 372, it was held that the Constitutional provision applied.

In Miller v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 85 Neb. 458, 123 N. W. 449, where a stallion was burned in a car and the carrier claimed a released valuation, it was held that the contract was controlled by Neb. Const. art. 11, § 4, providing: "The liability of railroad corporations as common carriers shall never be limited."

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Williams, 61 Neb. 608, 55 L.R.A. 289, 85 N. W. 832, it was claimed that the damage to a stallion was caused by the failure of plaintiff to furnish an attendant, as he had agreed to. This was held untenable, saying it was not supported by Terre Haute & L. R. Co. v. Sherwood, 132 Ind. 129, 17 L.R.A. 339, 32 Am. St. Rep. 239, 31 N. E. 781. "The rule is not doubted that where the owner is in charge of live stock in transit the burden is on him to show a loss caused by the carrier's negligence. This is the point decided in the Indiana case." The above statement in the case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Williams, as to burden of proof, is cited in Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. v. Schuldt, 86 Neb. 43, 92 N. W. 162, a similar L.R.A.1915D.

case, where it was claimed that the plaintiff, who agreed to accompany hogs, failed to water them properly. It was held that the Constitution did not prohibit this kind of contract. The burden of proof was not raised in either case, and it is probable that the prior case stated it with reference to Indiana.

A shipper, in consideration of a reduced rate, released the carrier from all liability over $5 a hundred pounds. It was held that the Nebraska Constitution prohibited a carrier from limiting its common-law liability. Wabash R. Co. v. Sharpe, 76 Neb. 424, 124 Am. St. Rep. 823, 107 N. W. 758. The court said: "The delivery of the goods to the carrier in good order, and their arrival at the place of destination in bad order, makes a prima facie case against the carrier. It then devolves upon it to show that the loss or damage was caused by the act of God or some other cause which would exempt it from liability." These household goods were held in freight yards too long and destroyed by flood.

VIII. Presumptions.

As a rule, negligence of the carrier will be presumed where goods in his possession are shown to be damaged. The carrier is then required to show absence of negligence, or that he is excused by reason of the contract exempting liability for such cause. Then the shipper will be required to show negligence of the carrier, and that the exercise of reasonable diligence, skill, and care would have prevented the injury. While negligence is presumed from injury, the cases in subdivision I. hold that the carrier has to go farther than showing that the damage arose from a cause specified in the exemption, and prove that there was no negligence on his part. But in most of the cases in subdivision II. the presumption of negligence is met by showing that the carrier is exempt by the bill of lading. The shipper then has the burden of proof to establish negligence.

A bill of lading exempted the carrier from loss by breakage or defective packages. A shipment of raisins arrived with broken boxes and all had some raisins taken from the boxes. It was held that the loss of raisins from the boxes being shown, the presumption of law was that such loss was caused by the neglect of the carrier, and the burden was on the latter to show that it happened through the excepted cause. No evidence was given to show that the raisins escaped of themselves or by leakage. The Bellona, 4 Ben. 503, Fed. Cas. No. 1,277.

And where the shipper failed to show that damage to macaroni arose from the perils of the sea, and the macaroni was stowed in the same compartment with green fruit, it was held that the inference was that the damage was caused by bad stowage. The Giava, 56 Fed. 243.

In Cumming v. The Barracouta, 40 Fed. 498 (reversing 39 Fed. 288), the onus was held to be upon the steamer to show that loss of a lot of chloride shipped in barrels was caused by leakage, which was exempted in the bill of lading. The court said: "When goods in the custody of a common carrier are lost or damaged, the presumption is that the loss was occasioned by his default, and the burden is upon him to prove that it arose from a cause for which he is not responsible. . . . If the evidence is as consistent with the conclusion that the loss arose from negligence, the libellants are entitled to recover." In this case some of the barrels were broken, although the ship witnesses testified they were intact when put on lighters.

And where the bill of lading exempted from the perils of the sea, it was held that proof of failure to deliver the goods in good order threw the burden on the shipowner to show that the damage resulted from the exempted peril. This would be prima facie sufficient to bring the case within the exception. If the proof showed that the damage resulted from a sea peril, but did not show that the master had means to avoid the peril, the libellant was held bound to show that the master had such means. The proof of that and the damage was held to raise the presumption of negligence. The Shand, 10 Ben. 294, Fed. Cas. No. 12,702.

So there is a presumption of negligence against the carrier if the injury is not explained.

A saw shipped by express was damaged and a verdict of $475 was awarded. The receipt limited loss to $50. It was held that as no account was given as to how the injury occurred, a presumption of negligence would follow. American Exp. Co. v. Sands, 55 Pa. 140.

In Brown v. Adams Exp. Co. 15 W. Va. 812, referring to American Exp. Co. v. Sands, supra, and Clark v. Spence, 10 Watts, 337, it was said: "But really, the Pennsylvania doctrine that the effect of a special contract is to convert the common carrier into a special bailee for hire, whose duties are to be governed by the contract, and against whom, therefore, if negligence is charged, it must be proved by the party injured, is not good law."

And where a phaeton was burned and the bill of lading exempted for loss by fire, it was held that the presumption was that the railroad was negligent where its employees refused to give the shipper any information as to the cause of the fire. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Miller, 87 Pa. 395.

And where a package of jewelry was lost by an express company, and the liability by the receipt fixed at $50, it was held that the failure by the carrier to account for the package raised the presumption of negligence, and the limitation of the receipt did not apply. Grogan v. Adams Exp. Co. 114 Pa. 523, 60 Am. Rep. 360, 7 Atl. 134.

And where an express receipt stipulated that liability should not exceed $50, it was held that if it could be conceded that the shipper assented to the bill of lading, the carrier would not be excused from the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care. As the carrier made no proof showing why the goods had not arrived, the presumption was that there was an absence of reasonable care from which the defendant could not contract. Adams Exp. Co. v. Stettaners, 61 Ill. 184, 14 Am. Rep. 57.

Glass was shipped by express at "owner's risk," the carrier to be liable for gross negligence. It was held that where goods, properly packed, were delivered to a carrier, their arrival in a damaged condition required the carrier to explain the cause of injury if it was to escape the charge of negligence. Rieser v. Metropolitan Exp. Co. 45 Misc. 632, 91 N. Y. Supp. 170.

A released rate was given for a piano, and the carrier was released from common-law liability. When delivered it was found to be broken and of no value. It was held that the burden of proof was on plaintiff, but he was not required to point out the precise act or omission in which the negligence consisted. The failure of the carrier to show that it had taken such precautions as prudence would dictate, and the failure to furnish proof, if any, which would be within its power, would subject it to the inference that the precautions were omitted. Bowden v. Fargo, 2 Misc. 551, 22 N. Y. Supp. 889, affirmed in 68 Hun, 607, 22 N. Y. Supp. 890. The court said: "Proof of the injury, as established by the evidence, is at least prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the appellant, and unless explained by it is sufficient to make it liable."

And where the express receipt stipulated that the carrier should not be charged for any loss or damage unless caused by fraud or gross negligence, and that the plaintiff should be required to prove fraud or such negligence in order to be entitled to recover, proof of a delivery and acceptance of the goods to be carried, and of a demand for the goods and noncompliance with it, without any explanation, was held sufficient proof of fraud or gross negligence, until evidence of care had been given by the defendants. Newstadt v. Adams, 5 Duer, 43.

A contract to carry pigs exempted the carrier from all liability for damage not caused by its wilful neglect or misconduct. Some of the pigs were missing. It was held that the failure to account for the missing pigs would be presumptive evidence of negligence. Curran v. Midland G. W. R. Co. [1896] 2 I. R. 183. This was on the ground of wilful misconduct; as the pigs belonged to the shipper, they continued to belong to him, and the presumption was that they were still in the possession of the carrier, after having been delivered to it and not accounted for.

It was claimed that the stipulation in the receipt limiting the liability of the carrier made it a bailee for hire of carboys of acid, and that negligence in breaking the same must be shown by the party charging it. But it was held that when it was shown that the carboys were in the control of the railroad, and were broken in switching, there would be reasonable evidence and an inference of negligence in the absence of any explanation, and the burden was thrown upon the carrier to rebut that inference. Kirst v. Milwaukee L. S. & W. R. Co. 46 Wis. 489, 1 N. W. 89.

And there is held to be a presumption arising from injury.

Stoves were shipped in a sealed car. The contract stipulated that as they were fragile and shipped at reduced rates the carrier was released from liability for loss. The stoves were broken when delivered. It was held that an instruction that the carrier must show how the injury was occasioned, implying that the defendant must prove the very circumstances to relieve himself of negligence, was error. Buck v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 150 Pa. 170, 30 Am. St. Rep. 800, 24 Atl. 678. The court said: "There can be no doubt that the fact of a shipment in good order and a delivery in bad order is evidence of negligence of itself, but it is evidence only, and must be considered along with all the other evidence by the jury."

In Phoenix Clay Pot Works v. Pittsburgh & L. E. R. Co. 139 Pa. 284, 20 Atl. 1058, pots were shipped and properly packed and protected in a car. The bill of lading provided that the carrier would not be liable for breakage, loss, or damage from any cause not the result of collision or of cars being thrown from the track while in transit. On arriving at the destination the pots were in another position and broken. The court said "in affirming defendants' . . . point that no presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises from the condition of the clay pots at the place of delivery," the judge went to the verge of propriety. "If the pots were carefully and securely packed when delivered to the carrier, and, when they reached their destination, were found in the badly damaged condition described by the witnesses, the only reasonable inference was that they were not transported with ordinary care."

In Schaeffer v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 168 Pa. 209, 47 Am. St. Rep. 884, 31 Atl. 1088, where contractual limitation was disputed, to meet any defense based upon the ground of a restricted contractual liability, the plaintiff assumed the burden of proving that the injuries to his mules resulted from negligence while the car was on defendant's road. The court said: "Injury to the contents of a car may, however, furnish ground for an inference of want of ordinary care in transportation."

Plate glass was shipped, the bill of lading providing exemption for breakage. The evidence showed that the glass was in good condition when delivered to the carrier, and broken when delivered. It was held that the presumption was that the carrier was negligent. Hutkoff v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 29 Misc. 770, 61 N. Y. Supp. 254, affirmed in 30 Misc. 802, 63 N. Y. Supp. 198.

A bill of lading exempted from liability for breakage. Glass delivered was badly broken. It was held that the burden of proof was on the shipper to show negligence of the carrier. Brewster v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 145 App. Div. 51, 129 N. Y. Supp. 368. This was shown by the condition of the glass. The court said: "Proof of the nature of an accident may afford prima facie proof of negligence." When the box was opened after delivery the glass was broken. "If the glass was not broken after its delivery to plaintiff, then the evidence is sufficient to make out a prima facie case of negligence, and to throw upon defendant the burden of proving that it exercised due care."

A bill of lading for tanks of glycerin provided exemption for leakage and breakage. It was held that proof that the tank on delivery showed the effect of hard and rough usage, caused by cases being shoved against it, was sufficient to take the case to the jury. Koenigsheim v. Hamburg American Packet Co. 12 Daly, 123, 17 N. Y. Week. Dig. 405.

And where damage was shown, it was held that the presumption was that it was caused by the carrier. Inman v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 159 Fed. 960.

The bill of lading for boxes of jewelry contained the clause "owner's risk." It was held that proof of nondelivery, not explained, made a prima facie case. Canfield v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 93 N. Y. 532, 45 Am. Rep. 288. The court said: "Had it not been for the rulings of the court below in the case we should have considered the law to have been settled beyond controversy, that proof of the nondelivery of property by a bailee upon demand, unexplained, makes out a prima facie case of negligence against such bailee in the care and custody of the thing bailed; and, in the absence of any evidence on his part, excusing such nondelivery, presents a question of fact as to the negligence of the bailee for the consideration of the jury."

A shipper took out a policy of insurance, but it was not to cover any common-law liability of the carrier. The bill of lading provided for subrogation of the carrier to any insurance. On a loss the insurance company advanced the owner money pending the test of liability of the carrier, to be returned if it was a common-law liability. As negligence was a common-law liability, it was no defense by the carrier that it should be subrogated. It was held that loss by fire raised the presumption of negligence. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Zimmerman, 81 Tex. 605, 17 S. W. 239.

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. McIntyre, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 82 S. W. 346, where the question was as to limitation of value, it was said: "It is well settled that the law presumes the loss to have been occasioned by the carrier's negligence."

Dressed meat was shipped on a railroad. The regulations of the carrier provided that there would be no liability for injury from weather or accidental delay, and special despatch would not be guaranteed unless an extra price was paid. The meat was spoiled in transit. It was held that the burden was on the plaintiff to show want of ordinary care; but proof of unexplained delay was prima facie evidence of negligence. Mann v. Birchard, 40 Vt. 326, 94 Am. Dec. 398. The court said: "To require the plaintiffs, in making a prima facie case, to assume the burden of negating the occurrence of matters which, if they did occur, were out of the usual course of events, and particularly within the defendants' knowledge, would be an extraordinary perversion of the natural and ordinary rules of evidence."

In Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. 46 N. Y. 271, 7 Am. Rep. 327, where the trial court was reversed for holding that the carrier had to prove it was not negligent when it proved the goods were burned, the court said: "Cases may occur where the proof of the loss and circumstances connected therewith may show a case of presumptive negligence in the defendant, such as will entitle the plaintiff to recover upon that ground, in the absence of further proof."

In J. Russell Mfg. Co. v. New Haven S. B. Co. 50 N. Y. 121, distinguishing Lamb v. Camden & A. R. & Transp. Co. supra, it was said that the plaintiff "is not always required to point out the precise act or omission in which the negligence consists. Negligence may be inferred from the circumstances of the case. Where the accident is one which in the ordinary course of events would not have happened but for the want of proper care on the part of the defendant, it is incumbent upon him to show that he had taken such precautions as prudence would dictate; and his failure to furnish the proof where, if it existed, it would be within his power, may subject him to the inference that such precautions were omitted. . . . The question what was sufficient prima facie evidence of negligence was not passed upon."

Where the failure to deliver the freight in good condition or nondelivery was shown, it was held to make a prima facie case as to negligence. Southern R. Co. v. Levy, 144 Ala. 614, 39 So. 95, subdiv. I. a; Steele v. Townsend, 37 Ala. 247, 79 Am. Dec. 49, subdiv. I. a; Fatman v. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. 2 Disney (Ohio) 248, subdiv. I. a; *Davidson v. And where stock was injured, the presumption was held to be against the carrier. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. McCarty, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 683, subdiv. I. c, 1; Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Kern, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 656, subdiv. I. c, 1; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hawley, 10 Ky. L. Rep. 117, subdiv. I. c, 1; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Lazarus, 13 Ky. L. Rep. 461; *Swiney v. American Exp. Presumption of negligence was held to apply where there was delay. Anderson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 93 Mo. App. 677, 67 S. W. 707, subdiv. II. a.

But the burden of proof as to negligence was held to be on the shipper where the bill of lading exempted from liability for damage by fire. The proof of destruction by fire was held not to give rise to the presumption of negligence. Whitworth v. Erie R. Co. 13 Jones & S. 602, affirmed in 87 N. Y. 413.

And where the bill of lading exempted from liability for loss by fire and the goods were burned, it was held that the burden of proof to show negligence of the carrier was on the shipper. Sutro v. Fargo, 9 Jones & S. 231. The court said that "the mere fact of a loss by fire while the goods are in the custody of the carrier fails to establish the presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier."

A bill of lading provided exemption from leakage and breakage. Casks in which wine was shipped were broken and the contents leaked out. It was held that the presumption that ordinary care was not used would not apply where it was not shown how strong the casks were when shipped. Roth v. Hamburg-American Packet Co. 27 Jones & S. 49, 35 N. Y. S. R. 89, 12 N. Y. Supp. 460.

And where a vessel encountered marine perils which might well disable a seaworthy vessel, there was no presumption that a leak from the center-board trunk was due to negligence. The Warren Adams, 20 C. A. 486, 38 U. S. App. 356, 74 Fed. 413. A cargo of sugar was injured by sea water. The bill of lading excepted perils of the sea. The court said: "If it appears that the injury has been caused by the dangers of navigation, or some other cause within the exception of the bill of lading, then it devolves upon the shipper to make out that the damage might have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care and skill upon the part of the carrier."

And where the bill of lading exempted from perils of the sea, it was held that it would not be inferred that two or three barrels of Venetian red broke open, scattering the powder over merchandise, from not being properly stowed, where the evidence showed the most stormy passage in fifteen years. The Fern Holme, 24 Fed. 502.

Presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier was held not to apply to a mule having pneumonia. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Brosius, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 647, 105 S. W. 1131.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT.

W. W. SMITH, Plff. in Err.,
v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

Constitutional law — due process — restricting right to contract — railway conductors — prior occupation.

An unconstitutional infringement of the liberty of contract without due process of Note. — Constitutionality of statute requiring preliminary apprenticeship or experience for railroad employees.

As to constitutionality and effect of restrictions on right to practise trade of barber, see note to Moler v. Whisman, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 629.

As to constitutionality of restriction on business of undertaking, see note to Wyeth v. Thomas, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 147; and later cases People v. Ringe, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 528, and State v. Rice, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 344.

The decision in SMITH v. TEXAS, in the light of the principles upon which it rests, would seem to preclude legislation which arbitrarily restrains a person in one branch or grade of railroad service from engaging in another branch or grade for which his actual experience fully qualifies him. The case holds that personal qualification, irrelevant.

law results from a provision of a state statute which makes it a misdemeanor for any person to act as a conductor on a railway train in that state without having previously served for two years as a freight conductor or brakeman.

(Mr. Justice Holmes dissents.)

(May 11, 1914.)

ERROR to the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas to review a judgment which affirmed a judgment of the County Court of Gregg County convicting defendant of having acted as conductor of a freight train without previous experience as freight conductor or brakeman. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gardiner Lathrop and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error:

The statute, by unreasonably and arbitrarily restricting the right to engage in a lawful occupation to a favored class, thereby depriving others who are as well fitted to engage therein, and depriving them of all opportunity to show their fitness, is arbitrary and capricious upon its face, and is obviously not passed for the sole purpose of protecting the community against the results of inexperience, but tends to give a monopoly in a particular employment to a favored class. It deprives those who do not fall within the favored class of their liberty or freedom without due process of law, and denies to them the equal protection of the laws of the state.

pective of arbitrary distinction between branches and grades of service, is the proper standard by which one's fitness to occupy a certain position is to be judged. The court below, which is reversed in the principal case, arrived at the opposite conclusion (— Tex. Crim. Rep. —, 146 S. W. 900), admitting that the statute prevented persons from acting as conductors who were as fully qualified as those who were permitted to engage in that occupation, but holding that it was within the power of the legislature to make such a statute.

And a position similar to that of SMITH v. TEXAS is taken in Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. State, 26 Ohio C. C. 348, affirmed in 70 Ohio St. 506, 72 N. E. 1165, which holds unconstitutional a statute making it unlawful "to employ any person in the capacity of a conductor of a passenger train or trains unless he has had at least Messrs. B. F. Looney, Attorney General of Texas, and Luther Nickels, for defendant in error:

The state may rightfully prevent unqualified men from occupying the position of conductor of a passenger train; and in doing so the state does not:

I. Unconstitutionally interfere with the right of contract, because:

The state has the power to prevent individuals from making certain kinds of contracts in regard to which the Federal Constitution offers no protection.

II. Or unconstitutionally interfere with the right to pursue a lawful occupation, for:

two years' experience in the position of conductor." The court says: "The act prescribes no standard and no test of efficiency; arbitrarily says who may labor at a given employment, and who may not, and fails to provide for the safety of the public, which must have been the purpose of any lawful exercise of the police power of the state."

A statute requiring all flagmen on passenger, mail, or express trains to have at least one year's experience as brakemen was, however, held to be within the police power of the state, in Simpson v. Geary, 204 Fed. 507. The court assigns the following reason: "The right to contract for and retain employment in a given occupation or calling is not a right secured by the Constitution of the United States, nor by any Constitution. It is primarily a natural right, and it is only when a state law regulating such employment discriminates arbitrarily against the equal right of some class of citizens of the United States, or some class of persons within its jurisdiction, as, for example, on account of race or color, that the civil rights of such persons are invaded, and the protection of the Federal Constitution can be invoked to protect the individual in his employment or calling. The complainants' case is not within this protection. They have not been deprived of any of the equal rights of citizens or persons. The state law applies to all persons alike, without discrimination, whether citizens of the United States or persons within its jurisdiction, and it is plainly a regulation enacted under the police power of the state, having for its purpose the safety of passengers on the railways operating within the state."

A man has no right to engage in or pursue any calling, the proper prosecution of which requires a certain amount of technical knowledge or professional skill, the lack of which may result in material injury to the public or individuals, which can be controlled in all cases, or, in proper cases, to be taken away by state legislation.

When a state legislature has declared that, in its opinion, public policy requires a certain measure, its action should not be disturbed under the 14th Amendment unless the court can clearly see that there is no fair reason for the law that would not require with equal force its extension to others whom it leaves untouched.

Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. May, 194 U. S. 267, 48 L. ed. 971, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 638.

Unless regulations respecting the pursuit of a lawful trade or business are so utterly unreasonable and extravagant in their nature and purpose that the property and personal rights of the citizen are unnecessarily, and in a manner wholly arbitrary, interfered with or destroyed without due process of law, they do not extend beyond the power of the state to pass, and they form no subject for Federal interference.

Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 188, 44 L. ed. 725, 728, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633.

Mr. Justice Lamar delivered the opinion of the court:

W. W. Smith, the plaintiff in error, a man forty-seven years of age, had spent twenty-one years in the railroad business. He had never been a brakeman or a conductor, but for six years he served as fireman, for three years ran as extra engineer on a freight train, for eight years was engineer on a mixed train, hauling freight and passengers, and for four years had been engineer on a passenger train of the Texas & Gulf Railway. On July 22, 1910, he acted as conductor of a freight train running between two Texas towns on that road. There is no claim in the brief for the state that he was not competent to perform the duties of that position. On the contrary, it affirmatively and without contradiction appeared that the plaintiff in error, like other locomotive engineers, was familiar with the duties of that position, and was competent to discharge them with skill and efficiency. He was, however, found guilty of the offense of violating the Texas statute which makes it unlawful for any person to act as conductor of a freight train without having previously served for two years as conductor or brakeman on †Sec. 2. If any person shall act or engage to act as a conductor on a railroad train in this state without having for two (2) years prior thereto served or worked in the capacity of a brakeman or conductor on a freight train on a line of railroad, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $500, and each day he so engages shall constitute a separate offense.

Sec. 3. If any person shall knowingly engage, promote, require, persuade, prevail upon, or cause any person to do any act in violation of the provisions of the two preceding sections of this act, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $500, and each day he so engages shall constitute a separate offense. [Tex. Laws 1909, chap. 46.]

such trains. On that verdict he was sentenced to pay a fine, and the judgment having been affirmed, the case is here on a record in which he contends that the statute under which he was convicted violated the provisions of the 14th Amendment.

1. Life, liberty, property, and the equal protection of the law, grouped together in the Constitution, are so related that the deprivation of any one of those separate and independent rights may lessen or extinguish the value of the other three. In so far as a man is deprived of the right to labor, his liberty is restricted, his capacity to earn wages and acquire property is lessened, and he is denied the protection which the law affords those who are permitted to work. Liberty means more than freedom from servitude, and the constitutional guaranty is an assurance that the citizen shall be protected in the right to use his powers of mind and body in any lawful calling.

If the service is public, the state may prescribe qualifications and require an examination to test the fitness of any person to engage in or remain in the public calling. Re Lockwood, 154 U. S. 116, 38 L. ed. 929, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1082; Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 42 L. ed. 1002, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 573; Watson v. Maryland, 218 U. S. 173, 54 L. ed. 987, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 644. The private employer may likewise fix standards and tests, but, if his business is one in which the public health or safety is concerned, the state may legislate so as to exclude from work in such private calling those whose incompetence might cause injury to the public. But, as the public interest is the basis of such legislation, the tests and prohibition should be enacted with reference to that object, and so as not unduly to "interfere with private business, or impose unusual and unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations." Lawton v. Steele, 162 U. S. 137, 38 L. ed. 388, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 499.

A discussion of legislation of this nature is found in Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 98, 32 L. ed. 353, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 238, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 28, where this court sustained the validity of a statute which required all locomotive engineers to submit to an examination for color blindness, and then provided that those unable to distinguish signals should not act as engineers on railroad trains. That statute did not prevent any competent person from being employed, but operated merely to exclude those who, on examination, were found to be physically unfit for the discharge of a duty where defective eyesight was almost certain to cause loss of life or limb. Another case cited by the L.R.A. 1915D.

plaintiff in error is that of Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 231. The act there under review provided that no one except licensed physicians should be allowed to practise medicine, and declared that licenses should be issued by the state board of health only to those (1) who were graduates of a reputable medical college; (2) to those who had practised medicine continuously for ten years; or (3) to those who, after examination, were found qualified to practise. Ten years' experience was accepted as proof of fitness, but such experience was not made the sole test, since the privilege of practising was attainable by all others who, by producing a diploma or by standing an examination, could show that they were qualified for the performance of the duties of the profession. In answer to the contention that the act was void because it deprived the citizen of the liberty to contract and the right to labor, the court said no objection could be raised to the statutory requirements "because of their stringency or difficulty. It is only when they have no relation to such calling or profession, or are unattainable by such reasonable study and application, that they can operate to deprive one of his right to pursue a lawful vocation."

The necessity of avoiding the fixing of arbitrary tests by which competent persons would be excluded from lawful employment is also recognized in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 480, 31 L. ed. 508, 513, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 804, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 564. There the act provided that all engineers should secure a license, and in sustaining the validity of the statute the court pointed out that the law "requires that every locomotive engineer shall have a license, but it does not limit the number of persons who may be licensed, or prescribe any arbitrary conditions of the grant." This and the other cases establish, beyond controversy, that, in the exercise of the police power, the state may prescribe tests and require a license from those who wish to engage in or remain in a private calling affecting the public safety. The liberty of contract is, of course, not unlimited; but there is no reason or authority for the proposition that conditions may be imposed by statute which will admit some who are competent and arbitrarily exclude others who are equally competent to labor on terms mutually satisfactory to employer and employee. None of the cases sustains the proposition that, under the power to secure the public safety, a privileged class can be created and be then given a monopoly of the right to work in a special or favored position. Such a statute would shut the door, without a hearing, upon many persons and classes of persons who were competent to serve, and would deprive them of the liberty to work in a calling they were qualified to fill with safety to the public and benefit to themselves.

2. The statute here under consideration permits those who had been freight conductors for two years before the law was passed, and those who for two years have been freight conductors in other states, to act in the same capacity in the state of Texas. But barring these exceptional cases, the act permits brakemen on freight trains to be promoted to the position of conductor on a freight train, but excludes all other citizens of the United States from the right to engage in such service. The statute does not require the brakeman to prove his fitness, though it does prevent all others from showing that they are competent. The act prescribes no other qualification for appointment as conductor than that for two years the applicant should have been a brakeman on a freight train, but affords no opportunity to any others to prove their fitness. It thus absolutely excludes the whole body of the public, including many railroad men, from the right to secure employment as conductor on a freight train.

For it is to be noted that under this statute, not only the general public, but also four classes of railroad men, familiar with the movement and operation of trains, and having the same kind of experience as a brakeman, are given no chance to show their competency, but are arbitrarily denied the right to act as conductors. The statute excludes firemen and engineers of all trains, and all brakemen and conductors of passenger trains. But no reason is suggested why a brakeman on a passenger train should be denied the right to serve in a position that the brakeman on a freight train is permitted to fill. Both have the same class of work to do, both acquire the same familiarity with rules, signals, and methods of moving and distributing cars, and if the training of one qualifies him to serve as conductor, the like training of the other should not exclude him from the right to earn his living in the same occupation.

It is argued in the brief for the state that, in practice, brakemen on freight trains are generally promoted to the position of freight conductors, and then to the position of conductors on passenger trains. And yet, under this act, even passenger conductors of the greatest experience and highest capacity would be punished if they acted as freight conductors without having previously been brakemen.

The statute not only prevents experienced and competent men in the passenger service from acting as freight conductors, but it L.R.A.1915D.

excludes the engineer on a freight train,—even though, under the rules of all railroads, the freight engineer now acts as conductor in the event the regular conductor is disabled en route. This general custom is a practical recognition of their qualification, and is founded on the fact that the engineer, by virtue of his position, is familiar with the rules and signals relating to the train's movement, and peculiarly qualified for the performance of the duties of conductor. If we cannot take judicial knowledge of these facts, the record contains affirmative proof on the subject. For, according to the testimony† of the state's witness, "acting as engineer on a freight train would better acquaint one with the knowledge of how to operate a freight train than acting as brakeman." And yet, though at least equally competent, the engineer is denied the right to serve as conductor, and the exclusive right of appointment and promotion to that position is conferred upon brakemen.

† I understand the railroad business, and know that a locomotive engineer learns as much about how a freight train should be operated by a conductor as a brakeman or conductor. Acting as engineer on a freight train will better acquaint one with a knowledge of how to operate a freight train than acting as a brakeman. Under the rules of all railroads, and of the Texas & Gulf Railway Company, the engineer is held equally responsible with the conductor for the safe operation of the train. All orders are given to the engineer as well as to the conductor. Every order sent to a conductor in a train is made in duplicate, and one copy of it is given to the conductor and the other to the engineer. It is a rule with railway companies that if anything should happen to disable the conductor, or in any way prevent his proceeding with his train, the engineer is to immediately take charge of the train and handle it into the terminal. The engineer is constantly with the train and knows all of the signals, knows how the couplings are made, knows how the cars are switched and distributed, and knows how they are taken into the train and transported from one place to another. An engineer is so constantly associated with all the work of a conductor on a freight train that he should know as much about how a freight train should be operated by a conductor as the conductor himself. All actions of the conductor that pertain to the safe operation of the train are being carried on in his presence and within his observation all the time. The matter of handling the waybills and ascertaining the destinations of the cars in his train is easy and plain, and it does not take a person that has had experience as a conductor to understand that part of his service. The waybills are plainly written and the destinations plainly given, and booking the waybills and delivering them with the cars is clerical, and can be done by anyone that can read and write and who has ordinary sense. Every act that is to be done by the engineer, and all of the conductor's acts with reference to this are in the view and observation of the engineer.

3. So that the case distinctly raises the question as to whether a statute, in permitting certain competent men to serve, can lay down a test which absolutely prohibits other competent men from entering the same private employment. It would seem that to ask the question is to answer,—and the answer in no way denies the right of the state to require examinations to test the fitness and capacity of brakemen, firemen, engineers, and conductors to enter upon a service fraught with so much of risk to themselves and to the public. But all men are entitled to the equal protection of the law in their right to work for the support of themselves and families. A statute which permits the brakeman to act,—because he is presumptively competent,—and prohibits the employment of engineers and all others who can affirmatively prove that they are likewise competent, is not confined to securing the public safety, but denies to many the liberty of contract granted to brakemen, and operates to establish rules of promotion in a private employment.

If brakemen only are allowed the right of appointment to the position of conductors, then a privilege is given to them which is denied all other citizens of the United States. If the statute can fix the class from which conductors on freight trains shall be taken, another statute could limit the class from which brakemen and conductors on passenger trains could be selected, and so, progressively, the whole matter as to who could enter the railroad service, and who could go from one position to another, would be regulated by statute. In the nature of the case, promotion is a matter of private business management, and should be left to the carrier company, which, bound to serve the public, is held to the exercise of diligence in selecting competent men, and responsible in law for the acts of those who fill any of these positions.

4. There was evidence that Smith safely and properly operated the train which had in it cars containing freight destined for points in Texas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and Kansas. But in view of what has been said it is not necessary to consider whether the plaintiff, as engineer, was in a position to raise the point that, under the decision in the Adams Express Case (Barrett v. New York, 232 U. S. 14, 58 L. ed. 483, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 203) the statute interfered with interstate commerce. The judgment is reversed and the case remanded to the L.F.A. 1915D.

Mr. Ralph Given also for the United States.

Mr. Justice Van Orsdel delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is here on writ of error to the L.R.A.1915D.

police court of the District of Columbia. The information was filed against Porter L. Paylor, the plaintiff in error, charging him with the violation of the provisions of § 869 of the District Code, as amended by the act of May 16, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. 164, chap. 172). The act, as amended, reads as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons to bet, gamble, or make books or pools on the result of any trotting or running race of horses, or boat race, or race of any kind, or on any election or any contest of any kind, or game of baseball. Any person or association of persons violating the provisions of this section shall be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not more than ninety days, or both."

Defendant was convicted on five separate counts, in each of which the witness produced against him was the person with whom he was charged with having bet or gambled. The material error urged relates to the failure of the court to instruct the jury that it could not find the defendant guilty upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. We think it unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the rules of practice governing the admission of the testimony of accomplices, since we are of opinion that, where two persons wager on the result of an event, as in this instance a horse race, one is not the accomplice of the other. To establish the relation of accomplice, two or more persons must unite in a common purpose to do an unlawful act. When two persons wager on the result of a certain event, the purpose of each is diametrically opposed to that of the other. The object to be attained by each is the exact opposite of the other. It could be asserted with equal force that two persons engaged in fighting a duel are accomplices. While each is violating the same law, they are not engaged in a common purpose to kill a common antagonist, but in a distinct and separate purpose of killing each other.

The weight of authority is to the effect that persons engaged in wagering contests are not accomplices. Com. v. Bossie, 100 Ky. 151, 37 S. W. 844. In Stone v. State, 3 Tex. App. 675, the court, considering the exact question here presented, said: "We do not think the witness, Behman, is an accomplice. When several persons bet at a game of faro, pool, or monte, each is guilty of betting at a gaming table or bank exhibited for the purpose of gaming, not as principals and accomplices to each other, but as several, not joint, offenders. There is not that oneness of intent and oneness of offense between them to make them principals. No one of them is aiding or assisting another by acts or encouraging by words in the commission of the offense. Each acts independently for himself against the others, and without concert mediately or immediately with the other betters. An indictment charging them as joint, and not separate, offenders, would be bad. The parties to the game of pool may change, and yet it not affect the defendants. Each one, as he takes part in the game, and bets money on it, is guilty of a separate offense. . . . If the position contended for by defendants is true, when two defendants engaged in a fight with and against each other, a conviction cannot be had on the uncorroborated testimony of one of them."

Inasmuch as this disposes of the other question presented, the judgment is affirmed.

Application for writ of certiorari denied by the Supreme Court of the United States, December 14, 1914, 235 U. S. 704, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 209.

L.R.A.(N.S.) 332, 81 S. E. 338, it was held that charter and statutory authority to pass ordinances for the general welfare of the city, and such regulations for the better government of the town as the commissioners may deem necessary, does not include power to forbid members of either the white or colored race to live in any block where a majority of the residents are of the other race. Atkinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1, 2. The rulings announced in the first and second headnotes do not require elaboration.

3. The assignment of error complained of the judgment of the trial court refusing to grant an interlocutory injunction. The controlling question is as to the constitutionality of an ordinance of the city of Atlanta which provides for the segregation of residences, the design of the ordinance being to require white persons and persons of color to reside in separate blocks. It appears from the pleadings and evidence that the ordinance was adopted on June 16, 1913, and amended on November 3, 1913. On October 1, 1913, one of the plaintiffs, a L.R.A.1915D.

colored person, purchased a lot and house from a white person, in which the latter resided. The property was located in a block occupied by white and colored persons. A white person resided on a lot adjoining the one purchased as above mentioned. On December 9, 1913, the plaintiff above mentioned contracted to sell the lot at an advanced price to the other plaintiff, and executed a bond for title. The former white owner having moved out, the obligee in bond for title, who contemplated taking up his future residence in the house, caused the same to be temporarily rented to a colored person, and received one month's rent. When the tenant moved in, the white proprietor of the adjoining residence objected to the occupancy of the house by a colored person, and, upon notice from the chief of police that a case would be made against the tenant under the ordinance, the latter moved out, and the plaintiff was required to refund the money paid for rent. The plaintiff was also notified by the chief of police that the ordinance would be enforced against him or any other colored person who attempted to occupy the dwelling as a residence, upon objection being urged by the adjoining white proprietor.

The particular parts of the ordinance complained of as being unconstitutional are §§ 1 and 2 of the original ordinance, and the corresponding sections of the amendment. These are alleged to be void, because they (a) deprive the plaintiffs of the use and enjoyment of their property, (b) deprive the plaintiffs of their property rights without due process of law, and (c) delegate to individuals the right to say how the plaintiffs shall use their property. By amendment to the petition it was charged that these provisions of the ordinance were void as being violative of article 1, § 1, ¶¶ 2 and 3, of the Constitution of this state (Civil Code, §§ 6358, 6359), which declare that protection to person and property is the paramount duty of government, and shall be impartial and complete; and that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, except by due process of law." The ordinance was also charged to be violative of the Constitution of the United States, as contained in the 14th Amendment (Civil Code, § 6700), which declares that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The ordinance in its entirety was as follows:

"An ordinance for preserving peace, preventing conflict and ill feeling between the white and colored races, and promoting the general welfare of the city, by providing for the use of separate blocks by white and colored people for residences, and for other purposes. . . .

"Section 1. That from and after the approval of this ordinance it shall be unlawful for any white person to move into or use as a residence or place of abode any house, building, or structure, or any part of a house, building, or structure, situated or located on any block as hereinafter defined in § 4, on which block the house, building, or structures, in whole or in part, shall be occupied or used as residences or places of abode by colored persons, otherwise than as provided in § 3 hereof. The block into which white persons are herein forbidden to move or occupy, being occupied or used by colored persons as herein set forth, shall be deemed a 'Colored Block' for the purposes of this ordinance.

"Section 2. That from and after the approval of this ordinance it shall be unlawful for any colored person to move into, or use as a residence or place of abode, any house, building, or structure, or any part of a house, building, or structure, situated or located on any block as hereinafter defined in § 4, on which block the houses, buildings, or structures shall be occupied or used as residences or places of abode by white persons, otherwise than as provided in § 3 hereof. The block into which colored persons are herein forbidden to move or occupy, being occupied by white persons as herein set forth, shall be deemed a 'White Block' for the purposes of this ordinance.

"Section 3. That nothing in either of the preceding sections shall be construed or defined to prevent domestic servants from residing in the house or building wherein they are employed, or upon the same lots with the houses or buildings which they serve.

"Section 4. That the word 'block,' as used in this ordinance, is hereby defined to mean that portion of any street or alley together with the lots abutting on same, whether or not, and upon both sides thereof, between the two adjacent intersecting or crossing streets. In case either of said adjacent streets intersect, but do not cross, the street upon which the block in question may be located, the lots improved or unimproved, upon the side of the last-mentioned street, to wit, the street facing the intersecting street, shall be included in the block between the two adjacent intersecting crossing streets, without reference to the street which runs to said block, but does not cross same. Corner lots, improved or unimproved, shall be deemed located in the block upon the street on which they front or are intended to front when improved. In using the word 'lots' in this section it is intended to include the houses on same where such lots are improved.

"Section 5. That any person violating the provisions of §§ 1 or 2 of this ordinance shall, on conviction in the recorder's court, be deemed guilty of an offense and be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or sentenced to work on the public works for not exceeding thirty days, either or both punishments to be inflicted in the discretion of the recorder, and each day's violation of the ordinance to be considered a separate offense.

"Section 6. That, upon the approval of this ordinance, any person desiring to build or erect, for himself or as agent for another, any building or structure to be used as residence or place of abode upon property situated in any block, as defined in § 4 hereof, and within which there are no houses, buildings, or structures used as residences, or otherwise vacant property, shall, in the application for a permit to the building inspector, declare that such houses or structures for which a permit is asked are to be used as residences or places of abode for white persons or for colored persons. Upon the filing of said application the building inspector shall order the same published for two successive weeks in one of the daily newspapers of the city of Atlanta, calling particular attention to said notice, and the fact that the houses, buildings, or structures proposed to be built or erected are to be used as residences by white people or by colored people, as the case may be; and unless within five days from the date of the last publication thereof protest be made in writing to the building inspector by a majority of the property owners of said lot against the use mentioned in said notice, the permit desired shall issue, if in other respects said application be in conformity with the ordinances of the city. Thereafter all houses, buildings, or structures erected for houses or residences or places of abode, and all houses, buildings, or structures in said lot erected for other purposes, but which it may be desired to use as residences or places of abode, shall be so used either as residences or places of abode for white persons or for colored persons, as may be determined by the permit granted in the manner hereinbefore provided. Any person or persons moving into or using as residences or places of abode any of such houses, buildings, or structures, or any part thereof, contrary to the classification as fixed in the manner herein provided and set out in said permit, shall be guilty of an offense punished in the same manner as provided in § 5 of this ordinance. If, however, the majority of the property owners in said lot in which the proposed building or structure is to be erected and for which permit is asked, as above provided, shall protest against said house, building, or structure in the manner above provided, then in such case no permit shall issue on said application for the erection of a building or house or structure for the use set out in said application. The provisions of this section are intended to provide a method by which a block which is vacant may be improved, and by which its use for either white or colored person may be determined.

"Section 7. That wherever, after the passage of this ordinance, a majority of the owners of either real or leasehold property in any block which is subject to the operation of §§ 1 and 2 of this ordinance shall make application in writing to the building inspector, requesting that he declare the house in said lot to be open for occupancy thereafter by either white or colored persons, it shall be the duty of the building inspector to notify the board of police commissioners that said block is not longer subject to §§ 1 and 2 of this ordinance, as the case may be. Upon the filing of said application, as above provided, with the building inspector, either white persons or colored persons moving into or using as places of abode or residences the houses and buildings in said block shall not be subject to the penalties provided for in this ordinance. Provided, however, that if at any time thereafter said block shall be occupied entirely by white persons, to wit, all the residences thereof shall be either white or colored, then said block shall thereupon immediately become subject to the provisions of the other sections of this ordinance with reference to white blocks or black blocks respectively, that is, if white persons entirely occupy said blocks, then it shall thereafter be a white block, and if colored persons entirely occupy said block, then it shall thereafter be a black block, and subject to the provisions of this ordinance with reference to white and black blocks.

"Amended by Alderman Nutting: Be it ordained by the mayor and general council, that the pending ordinances in re segregation of races be amended as follows: That no provisions of the foregoing ordinance shall cause any change in the status of the races as to present occupancy or ownership, and no member of either race shall be forced to move from any present location; but that entire ordinance shall be operative as the future. That all ordinances and parts of ordinances in conflict with this ordinance be and the same are hereby repealed."

A further amendment was as follows:

"That the ordinance adopted by the general council on the 16th day of June, 1913, and approved by the Honorable J. G. Woodward, mayor, on the 17th day of June, 1913, providing for the use of separate blocks by white and colored people for residences and for other purposes, be amended by adding thereto the following sections:

"Section 1. That from and after the approval of this ordinance it shall be unlawful for any colored person to move into, or use as a residence or place of abode, any house, building, or structure, or any part of a house, building, or structure, situated or located except as provided in said original ordinance, which said house, building, or structure has previously been occupied by white people, and where white people are still living in houses or buildings adjoining the same, without the consent of the white people living in said adjoining house or buildings.

"Section 2. That from and after the approval of this ordinance it shall be unlawful for any white person to move into, or use as a residence or place of abode, any house, building, or structure, or any part of a house, building, or structure, situated or located except as provided in said original ordinance, which said house, building, or structure has previously been occupied by colored people, and where colored people are still living in houses or buildings adjoining the same, without the consent of the colored people living in said adjoining houses or buildings.

"Section 3. The penalty for violation of the previous sections shall be as provided in § 5 of said original ordinance."

Under the operation of §§ 1 and 2 of the original ordinance, and the corresponding sections of the amendment, the following result could be brought about: Assuming that in any mixed block—that is, one occupied by both white and colored persons—there are three adjacent lots owned by separate persons, each of whom resides on his lot, and that the proprietor of the middle lot be a white person, and that the proprietor on one side be a white person, and the proprietor on the other be a colored person: If the middle proprietor should desire to move out and substitute a colored tenant, he could not do so if the adjacent white proprietor objected; or if he should sell to a colored person the purchaser could not move into the house to reside, or substitute another colored person to do so, if the adjoining white proprietor objected. So, also, if the middle proprietor were a colored person and should desire to move out and substitute a white person to reside in his dwelling, he could not do so if the colored adjoining proprietor objected; or, if he should sell to a white person, the purchaser could not move into the dwelling to reside, nor substitute a white tenant to do so, if the colored adjoining proprietor objected. In each of such instances an owner of property could, by mere force of the ordinance and caprice of an adjoining proprietor, without any compensation or process of law, be deprived for all time of the right to reside on his property, or to substitute a tenant or grantee to do so. The right of the owner of property to reside on it is inherent, and permanent deprivation of that right is in substance a taking of the property itself. Deprivation thereof in the manner above indicated, without any symbol of legal procedure, is opposed to the guaranty as embodied in the due process clauses of the state and Federal Constitutions. Ordinances of this character are of recent origin. The first seems to have been adopted on May 19, 1911, in Baltimore, Maryland, and has several times been amended. Since then several other cities have adopted segregation ordinances, and the state of Virginia has enacted a statute on the subject. A person was prosecuted for violating the Baltimore ordinance. The defendant attacked the validity of the ordinance. The supreme court of the state of Maryland, in dealing with the case (State v. Gurry, 121 Md. 534, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1087, 88 Atl. 546), discussed the constitutionality of the ordinance at length, and expressed the view that under the exercise of the police power a law of that character could be adopted, but finally decided that the ordinance was void on the ground that it was so unreasonable as to be unauthorized under the general welfare clause of the charter of the city. On this subject it was stated in the opinion that the serious objection to the provisions of the ordinance was that they wholly ignored all vested right which existed at the time of the passage of the ordinance. This was put upon the ground that the ordinance affected the rights of an owner existing at the time of the passage of the ordinance. Relatively to them it was said: "To deny him such rights would be a practical confiscation of his property, for his house might be of a character he would not rent to a colored person; and, if he could not use it himself, he would be deprived of not only the income from it, but of such use of it as is guaranteed to L.R.A.1915D.

every owner of property by the Constitution and laws of the land."

While this pronouncement seems to indicate a disposition to hold the ordinance void because the ordinance was retroactive, it at the same time recognizes that the ordinance involved jus disponendi of the owner, and that right was within the protection of the Constitution.

In North Carolina a person, in violation of a segregation ordinance, moved his family into a house to occupy it as a residence. He was tried for violating the ordinance, and found guilty. In the supreme court of that state it was ruled: "Charter and statutory authority to pass ordinances for the general welfare of the city, and such regulations for the better government of the town as the commissioners may deem necessary, does not include power to forbid members of either the white or colored race to live in any block where a majority of the residents are of the other race." State v. Darnell, 166 N. C. 300, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 332, 81 S. E. 338.

As indicated by the note, the court was not passing on the constitutional question, but much of the reasoning employed in support of the proposition that the ordinance was not authorized under the general welfare clause of the charter of the municipality is pertinent and persuasive on the constitutional question. In the course of the opinion it was said: "Besides, an ordinance of this kind forbids the owner of property to sell or to lease it to whomsoever he sees fit, as well as forbids those who may be desirous of buying or renting property from doing so where they can make the best bargain. Yet this right of disposing of property, the jus disponendi, has always been held one of the inalienable rights incident to the ownership of property, which no statute will be construed as having power to take away. In Bruce v. Strickland, 81 N. C. 267, it is said: 'The jus disponendi is an important element of property, and a vested right protected by the clause in the Federal Constitution which declares the obligation of contracts inviolable.' The same doctrine is fully held and discussed in Hughes v. Hodges, 102 N. C. 239, 9 S. E. 437, and in the numerous citations to those two cases, which will be found in the Anno. ed. This ordinance forbids a white man or a colored man to live in his own house if it should descend to him by inheritance, and should happen to be located on a street where a majority of the residents happen to be of such different race. There is no reason why the power of the county commissioners to provide for the public welfare should not be as broad as those of the town commissioners, and if, under such general authority, similar regulations are prescribed for the country districts, one who should buy or inherit property in a section where the opposite race is in the majority could not reside on his own property, and he could not sell it or rent it out, except to persons of such different race, since none other could reside there. Neither a white manager nor any white tenants could reside on a farm where a majority of the tenants or hands are colored. . . . There is a wide distinction between suffrage, which is not an inherent right, but which is conferred by constitutional prescription, and which is usually extended from time to time, and the inalienable right to own, acquire, and dispose of property, which is not conferred by the Constitution, but exists of natural right. There is no question that legislation can control social rights by forbidding intermarriage of the races, and in requiring Jim Crow cars, and in similar matters. It was also held in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, that, as the state had the right to regulate or forbid the sale of liquor, that one who had devoted his property to such purpose could not object that he is forbidden longer to so use it; but none of these interfere with the fundamental right of everyone to acquire and dispose of property by sale."

It appears from the report of the case that, in addition to the cases specially mentioned in the foregoing excerpt, the court had before it Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45, 53 L. ed. 81, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33; Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1138; and many other cases on the subject of race regulations under the police power in matters concerning the administration of educational institutions, the operation of separate cars, and the like, in which it was held that the difference in the races afforded a basis for classification which would support in some instances ordinances, and in others statutes, regulating the conduct of those particular businesses. In those cases the equal protection clause of the Constitution was the one mainly discussed. In each instance the complaining person was afforded the opportunity to ride, or to attend institutions of learning, or afforded the thing of whatever nature to which in the particular case he was entitled. The most that was done was to require him as a member of a class to conform to reasonable rules in regard to the separation of the races. In none of them was he denied the right to use, control, or dispose of his property, as in this case. Property of a person, whether as a member of a class or as an individual, cannot be taken without due process of law. In the recent case of McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 235 U. S. 151, 59 L. ed. —, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 69, where the court had under consideration a statute which allowed railroad companies to furnish dining cars for white people and to refuse to furnish dining cars altogether for colored persons, this language was used in reference to the contentions of the attorney general: "This argument with respect to volume of traffic seems to us to be without merit. It makes the constitutional right depend upon the number of persons who may be discriminated against; whereas, the essence of the constitutional right is that it is a personal one."

While the police power is very broad, its limits are within the Constitution. In Cut-singer v. Atlanta, 142 Ga. 555, L.R.A. 1915B, 1097, 83 S. E. 263, the following was quoted with approval from the decision in Re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636: "The limit of the [police] power cannot be accurately defined, and the courts have not been able or willing definitely to circumscribe it. But the power, however broad and extensive, is not above the Constitution. When it speaks, its voice must be heeded. It furnishes the supreme law, the guide for the conduct of legislators, judges, and private persons, and, in so far as it imposes restraints, the police power must be exercised in subordination thereto."

In the opinion it was held: "The Constitution of this state not only recognizes the necessary power of the courts to declare laws in violation of the state or Federal Constitution void (a power already known to exist), but expressly declares it to be their duty to hold such acts void."

The effect of the ordinance under consideration was not merely to regulate a business or the like, but was to destroy the right of the individual to acquire, enjoy, and dispose of his property. Being of this character, it was void as being opposed to the due process clause of the Constitution; and the judge erred in refusing to grant the injunction.

Judgment reversed.

All the Justices concur, except Fish, Ch. J., absent.

Lumpkin, J., concurring specially:

I concur in the result reached, but not in all that is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice Atkinson. It seems to me that the discussion in regard to the right to use property as an incident to ownership may lead to extreme results. The right of an owner to use his property is important, but it is not so absolute that he may, at all times and under all circumstances, use it as he pleases, regardless of the public welfare, morals, or safety. The statute books contain many laws restricting the use of property by the owner of it, and prohibiting him from using it for certain purposes. Laws prohibiting the erection of wooden buildings within the fire limits of a city restrict the owner's use of his property, although he may contend that a wooden building which he desires to erect would be safe, and that he has not the means to build one of brick or stone. Laws which prevent an owner from using his property for the storage of dynamite, powder, oil, or other dangerous substances, in populous communities, likewise place limitations upon the owner's right to use his property as he sees fit. The right to contract has been treated as a part of the liberty of a citizen, and yet it is subject to certain limitations for the public good. Thus usurious contracts have long been prohibited. Many other illustrations might be given in addition to those arising under laws relating to the segregation of the white and negro races in cars and schools. I cannot subscribe to the apparent idea that classification has nothing to do with such laws. Classification as to the particular use to which property is to be put, having in view its location and surroundings, may be an important element in considering laws of this character. In the leading case of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 41 L. ed. 256, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1138, Mr. Justice Brown, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A statute which implies merely a legal distinction between the white and colored races—a distinction which is founded in the color of the two races, and which must always exist so long as white men are distinguished from the other race by color—has no tendency to destroy the legal equality of the two races, or re-establish a state of involuntary servitude."

Referring to the 14th Amendment, he said: "The object of the Amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political, equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact, do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which has been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power, even by courts of states where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced."

In Pace v. Alabama, 106 U. S. 583, 27 L. ed. 207, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 637, it was held that adultery between blacks and whites could constitutionally be punished more severely than the same crime between persons of the same race, on the ground that the white and black were punished alike, without discrimination. A law prohibiting the intermarriage of the two races has been declared valid. State v. Gibson, 36 Ind. 389, 10 Am. Rep. 42.

Suppose that an owner of property in the best residential portion of a city should claim the right to build upon his lot a large boarding house or rooming house, in which he should receive indifferently boarders of both races and sexes, producing a situation of great irritation and calculated to bring about unfortunate results. It is quite possible that the sacred right of property might be subject to regulation for the public safety (which has been declared to be the supreme law) by a reasonable pre-existing ordinance.

In Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, the law involved was one requiring railway companies carrying passengers in their coaches in the state of Louisiana to provide equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races, by means of separate cars or by dividing the passenger coaches by a partition. Such a law necessarily interfered to some extent with the right of the owner of the property to use it as it saw fit. While this law related to railway companies, the opinion of the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States was not based on that ground. On the contrary, Mr. Justice Harlan, who dissented, referred to the fact that a railway was a quasi public highway, where all might travel. Of course, regulations based on a distinction between the two races must be reasonable and not arbitrary, and the municipal council or other body making them must have authority to do so. In the present case, the petition does not distinctly make the point that the general welfare clause in a city charter does not confer authority to adopt a segregation ordinance, or aver in terms that the ordinance under consideration was unreasonable. It does, however, charge that the ordinance delegated to individuals the right to say how the plaintiffs should use their property. I think that this ground is well taken. If the residence of the two racess in close proximity was a matter requiring regulation by ordinance, the legislative body should determine the fact, and not leave it to depend upon the will of individuals, perhaps the whim of a single resident, and subject to shift from time to time according to the wishes of some of those who for the time being might reside in the block, so that sometimes the block might be classified as "white," sometimes as "black," and sometimes mixed. It provides for no method for determination of the fact by legitimate authority, save as a property owner's neighbors may wish. A similar ordinance adopted in Baltimore, which seems to have been taken as a guide in preparing the ordinance of Atlanta, was declared invalid by the supreme court of Maryland, although that court did not deny the right to use the distinction between the white and black races as a basis of legitimate classification.

The near approach of the end of the term and the rush of business incident thereto, under a provision of our Constitution which requires that all cases shall be decided at the first or the second term, prevent a more thorough discussion of the subject. I agree with the majority of the court that the particular ordinance here involved is unconstitutional and void. But I think the line of reasoning adopted by them may carry them too far.

As to liability of owner for injury inflicted by car while being run by one to whom it has been intrusted for storage or repairs, see note to Segler v. Callister, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 772.

The purpose of the present note is to bring together the cases passing upon the liability of the owner of an automobile for injuries due to the negligence of a third person who is running the car for his own purposes, and not for any purpose of the owner, so that the doctrine of respondet superior does not apply.

There are three different classes of cases within the scope of the note: (1) Cases where the car was taken without the consent of the owner; (2) cases where the owner intrusted the car to a competent and ordinarily careful person, who, however, was negligent on the particular occasion; (3) cases where the owner intrusted the car to a person who was known to be incompetent or negligent, or not known to be competent or careful.

It is clear that in the first class of cases there is no ground upon which the owner may be held responsible, at least in the absence of any negligence on his part in guarding against the unauthorized use of his car.

In the third class of cases, as subsequently shown, there is a tendency, on the part of the later cases at least, to hold the owner responsible because of his negligence in intrusting the car to a person known to be incompetent or negligent.

In nearly all the cases of the second class the liability of the owner has been denied. Cases presenting the second situation, that is, where the owner permits a competent and ordinarily careful person to use the car for his own purposes, and the latter is negligent on the particular occasion, are very numerous. In most of these cases, however, the question has turned upon some phase of the doctrine of respondet superior. As shown in the notes in 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 775, and 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 59, already referred to, some of the cases have extended that doctrine sufficiently to hold the owner responsible for an injury due to the negligence of a member of his own family, though the latter was using the car for his own pleasure, upon the L.R.A.1915D.

theory that, even in so using the car, he was carrying out the purpose for which the car was purchased and kept; and it would seem that that theory might be susceptible of extension to some cases where the person using the car for his own pleasure was an employee of the owner, and not a member of the latter's family. As previously stated, however, the present note is concerned only with the question of the owner's liability when the doctrine of respondet superior is inapplicable. Comparatively few of the cases that have denied the liability of the owner upon the ground that the doctrine was inapplicable have considered the possibility of holding him liable upon the theory of dangerous agency, where he intrusted the car to the person whose negligence caused the injury.

The attempt made to invoke the doctrine of dangerous agency in this class of cases has met with but little favor. In view, however, of the potentiality of high-powered automobiles for mischief, and the growing and increasing danger of injury to innocent persons through the negligence or incompetence of financially irresponsible persons to whom cars are intrusted, it may be questioned whether the courts, or at least the legislatures, will not eventually adopt the position that the owner of a car who intrusts it to another, at least to one generally employed or authorized by him to run the car, shall be responsible for injuries due to the latter's negligence, even though upon the particular occasion he was running the car for his own purposes.

Under the present state of authorities, a pedestrian injured by the negligence of a person other than the owner, driving the car on the highway in a grossly negligent and reckless manner, frequently finds that he is remediless, because, although the owner of the car is financially responsible, he had intrusted it for the particular occasion to a person financially irresponsible. Moreover, even though the car was in fact being used for the purpose of the owner on the occasion in question, the present rule offers a strong inducement for perjury on the point.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petition alleges that the defendants Leitzen are owners of a garage in the town of Mapleton, where they keep automobiles for sale and hire, and hold themselves out to the public as being engaged in that business; that in pursuit of such business and occupation they let for hire to the defendant Kraft a Ford automobile, knowing at the time that Kraft would himself run and operate the car, and was intending to drive it to the town of Ute, where there was to be a large gathering of people attending a carnival of sports. It further alleges that the Leitzens well knew that an automobile driven by an unskilled driver, or by one not familiar with a car of that pattern, was a dangerous machine to be driven among crowds; that said defendants were informed that Kraft had no knowledge of the mechanism of a Ford car, and in fact had never driven one, yet, knowing these facts and the danger attending his use of said car, they carelessly and negligently let the car to said Kraft for the purposes above mentioned. It is further alleged that plaintiff was a spectator, with others, at the carnival in Ute, and in the exercise of reasonable care on his part he was struck and severely injured by said Ford car being then and there operated by said Kraft without due skill and care, as he was being permitted to do through the negligence of the defendants Leitzen. For the injury thus sustained he demands judgment for the recov-

It is not apparent that a rule holding the owner of an automobile liable for the negligence of the person to whom he intrusts the car, at least a person generally employed or authorized to use the car, although upon the particular occasion he is using it for his own purposes, would involve any essential injustice, or at least injustice comparable to that which the injured person frequently suffers under the present state of authorities. The owner may protect himself against the increased liability, either by refusing to lend the car or by taking out insurance against liability from this source.

It may be noted in this connection that the statute which in Daugherty v. Thomas, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 699, was held contrary to the due process and equal protection clause of the Constitution, purported to render the owner liable for injuries to strangers though the car was being used without his knowledge or consent, and that the refusal, in the subsequent cases cited in the note to that case, to apply the statute so as to hold the owner liable when he permitted the car to be taken, seems to have been due to the inability to separate the valid from the invalid portion of the statute.

It seems contrary to public policy to permit the owner of a car, when sued for an injury inflicted by the negligence of his chauffeur, to escape liability by merely showing that, while the car was on the highway with his consent, it was being used on the particular occasion for the pleasure of the chauffeur, a financially irresponsible person, and for no purpose of the owner's. As suggested in a forcible opinion by Spencer, J., in Ingraham v. Stockamore, 63 Misc. 114, 118 N. Y. Supp. 399, infra, holding the owner liable in such circumstances, the court is not limited to the rules applicable to horses, sailboats, and motor launches; but "must make use of the rule which meets the condition, and if there exists no rule applicable, then it must promulgate one that will be applicable."

The great weight of authority, however, has refused to hold the owner of an automobile liable for injuries sustained while it is being used by another for his own purposes, on the theory that such a machine is a dangerous agency, and have in general allowed recovery only in cases where the circumstances were such as to bring the case within the principle of respondet superior.

In accord with the foregoing statement, in the following cases it was held that an automobile is not a dangerous instrumentality to be classed with locomotives, ferocious animals, etc., and that the owners of such machines are not liable on the theory of dangerous agency for injuries occurring while they are being used by third persons for their own purposes, either with or without the owners' consent: Hartley v. Miller, 165 Mich. 115, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 81, 130 N. W. 336, 1 N. C. C. A. 126 (car being used by borrower who was accompanied by owner); Cunningham v. Castle, 127 App. Div. 580, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1057 (chauffeur using for own pleasure with owner's consent); Linville v. Nissen, 162 N. C. 95, 77 S. E. 1096 (use by owner's son with former's consent); Fielder v. Davison, 139 Ga. 509, 77 S. E. 618 (use by chauffeur without owner's consent); Tyler v. Stephan, — Ky. —, 174 S. W. 790 (use of machine by chauffeur without owner's consent); Slater v. Advance Thresher Co. 97 Minn. 305, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 598, 107 N. W. 133 (use for his own purposes of automobile furnished general manager in defendant's business); Danforth v. Fisher, 75 N. H. 111, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 93, 139 Am. St. Rep. 670, 71 Atl. 535 (use by chauffeur for his own purposes without owner's consent); Steffen v. McNaughton, 142 Wis. 49, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 382, 124 N. W. 1016, 19 Ann. Cas. 1227 (car being used by owner's chauffeur without his knowledge or permission).

And this principle was adopted in Goodman v. Wilson, 129 Tenn. 464, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1116, 166 S. W. 752, involving the liability of one joint owner for an injury occurring while the automobile was on the way to the office of the other joint owner in charge of a chauffeur hired by the joint owners.

The court in Tyler v. Stephan, supra, ery of damages from all the defendants. The defendants admit the keeping of a garage by the Leitzens; that they let a Ford automobile to Kraft, and knew that he intended to use it in taking his family to the carnival at Ute. They admit, also, that plaintiff was injured by a wire, which was accidentally struck by said car while being operated by Kraft, but they each and all deny any negligence on their part with respect to the use of said car or to the injury suffered by plaintiff. The evidence, so far as material to the appeal, tends to show that Kraft was accustomed to operate automobiles, but had no previous experience with a Ford car. At the time he hired this car one of the defendants got into the car with Kraft and backed the car out of the garage and gave him some instruction or direction as to its use. Kraft then drove the car to the vicinity of another garage or shop, where he was further instructed as to the manner of operating a Ford. He then drove to Ute, and while there, operating it in a manner which a jury might properly find to have been negligent, caused the injury to plaintiff. Plaintiff having made this showing and rested his case, the court sustained the motion of the defendants Leitzen for a directed verdict in their favor. The plaintiff appeals.

1. In argument for appellant counsel contends that one who lets an automobile for hire is responsible for the proper skill and care of the person to whom he intrusts it. In support of this position we are cited to said: "The rule of law applicable to the care and protection of dangerous instrumentalities does not apply. That rule requires the master to exercise a proper degree of care to guard, control, and protect dangerous instrumentalities owned or operated by him, and to respond in damages for an injury incurred by reason of the improper use of such an instrumentality by a servant, though not then engaged in the performance of his duties. The principle on which liability is founded in such cases is the failure of the master properly to keep within his control such dangerous agencies. Manifestly, an automobile, which becomes dangerous only when negligently operated, cannot properly be placed in the same category with locomotives, dynamite, and ferocious animals. Consequently, the courts have generally rejected this ground of liability."

And in Symington v. Sipes, 121 Md. 313, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 662, 88 Atl. 134, where an injury occurred while the owner's chauffeur was using the automobile for his own pleasure without the owner's consent, the court remarked that it had been the contention in a number of cases that an automobile was a dangerous agency, and that a master who trusts such a machine to his servant for use on the highway is chargeable for injuries resulting from the servant's negligence, but that this theory had been universally rejected.

And it was stated in McNeal v. McKain, 33 Okla. 449, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 775, 126 Pac. 742, where an automobile was being used by the owner's son for his own pleasure with the owner's consent, that an automobile is not a dangerous agency, and that the rules that apply at common law as to servants in charge of vehicles belonging to the master are applicable to chauffeurs or persons in charge of motor cars of the master.

While the subject of dangerous instrumentality was not mentioned in Maier v. Benedict, 123 App. Div. 579, 108 N. Y. Supp. 228, it was held that no liability attached to the owner of an automobile for an injury which occurred while his twenty-year-old son was using it, by reason of his ownership of the car or of the fact that he permitted his son to drive it whenever he wished.

And in Freibaum v. Brady, 143 App. Div. 220, 128 N. Y. Supp. 121, where the defendant's car had been loaned, no direct reference was made to dangerous agency, but it was held that an owner of an automobile could not be held liable simply because he owned the car.

There was held to be no cause of action stated in Doran v. Thomsen, 74 N. J. L. 445, 66 Atl. 897, reversed on another ground in 76 N. J. L. 754, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 335, 131 Am. St. Rep. 677, 71 Atl. 296, where it was alleged that the defendant owned an automobile capable of being run at a speed of 60 miles an hour on the highway, and that he negligently consented and allowed it to be run along the highway at a speed of 60 miles an hour by an inexperienced person, by reason of which it ran over and injured the plaintiff, the court remarking that the count was apparently based upon the erroneous assumption that because the defendant loaned his automobile to someone over whom he had no direction or control at the time of the accident, he should be held liable for the mere loaning, but that no liability attached to him by reason of this fact, unless it was being used in the owner's business at the time of the accident.

In another case it was held that, although a chauffeur employed by the owner of an automobile is not a competent and careful operator of such machines, the owner will not be liable on the theory that an automobile is a dangerous agency, for an injury resulting from the chauffeur's negligence while he is using his employer's car, which he has taken from the garage where it is kept without the owner's knowledge or permission for his own purposes. Jones v. Hoge, 47 Wash. 663, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216, 125 Am. St. Rep. 915, 92 Pac. 433.

And in Lewis v. Amorous, 3 Ga. App. 50, 59 S. E. 338, it was held that an automobile was not a dangerous agency, and that the owner of such a machine, or the proprietors of a garage where it was kept, were certain English cases where the owner of a cab is held liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of the driver. But such cases are parallel neither in fact nor in principle with the one now before us. The proprietor of a cab or hack stand lets his carriages supplied with drivers of his own selection and in his own employment. While to a certain extent the driver under such circumstances becomes the servant of the hirer, he does not cease to be the servant and representative of the cab owner so far as the immediate care and management of the carriage and its motive power is concerned, and if, by his careless or reckless driving, a collision occurs upon the street, and a third person is thereby injured without fault on his own part, the owner is very reasonably and properly held to respond in damages. But the owner of a livery stable or garage making a business of letting teams or carriages or motor cars to customers who propose and expect to do their own driving has never been held to any such rule of responsibility by any court, so far as the precedents have been called to our attention, and we think there is no general rule or principle necessitating such conclusion. Cases may be imagined, perhaps, where an owner recklessly lets his spirited team or his automobile to an immature child, or to a person who is intoxicated or otherwise manifestly incompetent to manage or control it, with the natural result of a collision upon the public street and consequent injury to others. It may not liable for an accident resulting from its negligent operation by a conscious person who had reached the age of discretion who took the car from the garage. With reference to leaving the machine where another could obtain possession of it, the court said: "While it is alleged that the defendants left the automobile where opportunity to take and operate it was given to a person inexperienced in the operation of the machine, yet this is very different from alleging, as is necessary even under the theory of the turntable and other attractive-nuisance cases, that the defendant left the automobile where opportunity to operate it was given to a person whose mental incapacity and indiscretion were such that he would be attracted to interfere with it, and would not know better than to trespass upon it. Even if we could for a moment concede (as in all common sense we cannot) that it would be negligent for a person to leave an automobile in a shop or garage without chaining it down or locking it in, still when the injury which actually happens is directly resultant from the immediate negligence of a conscious, efficient, and responsible actor, with whose conduct the former is in nowise bound by any privity, the leaving of the machine unguarded is not the proximate cause of the injury."

In some cases, as observed in the introductory statement, the view has been taken that an automobile, although not a dangerous instrumentality per se, has such propensities for doing damage when carelessly operated that the owner may become liable in case he intrusts it to an incompetent person.

Thus, in Parker v. Wilson, 179 Ala. 361, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 87, 60 So. 150, it was held that the training needed for the operation of automobiles should impose upon owners a special degree of care in the selection of drivers, but that no liability attaches to the owner for an injury which occurs while his automobile is being operated by another on the ground of dangerous agency, where the one to whom it was intrusted was competent. The court said: "Automobiles are not to be classed with such highly dangerous agencies as dynamite or savage animals. They are not dangerous per se. Prudently driven, they are safer than the horse-drawn vehicle. But the special training needed for their operation, though simple and easily acquired, as well as the temptation to speed, which they constantly present, should impose upon owners a special degree of care in the selection of experienced and judgmatic drivers for them. No doubt, liability will arise where the owner intrusts a machine of such dangerous potentialities to the hands of an inexperienced or incompetent person, whether child or servant. In the case of a mere permissive use, the liability of the owner would rest, not alone upon the fact of ownership, but upon the combined negligence of the owner and the driver, negligence of the one in intrusting the machine to an incompetent driver, of the other in its operation."

In Daily v. Maxwell, 152 Mo. App. 415, 133 S. W. 351, where a recovery was sought against the owner of an automobile for an injury inflicted while it was being used by his son with the owner's consent, the evidence which, among other things, showed that the operator was but sixteen years old, was held to support a charge that the owner of the machine negligently suffered it to be operated by an incompetent driver, and thereby converted it into a dangerous instrumentality. The court said: "No one can deny that an automobile in the hands of a careless and incompetent driver would be a dangerous machine to turn loose on busy streets, and would constitute a menace to travelers. The owner of a car must exercise reasonable care in the selection of a chauffeur, and, failing in this, will be held liable for the consequences of his own negligence in sending out his car in charge of an incompetent operator. Boys are very apt at learning how to run vehicles of all sorts—more apt than men—and the evidence before us is all to the effect that Ernest was a bright boy and careful, too, for one of his years. But he was only a boy, and the jury were entitled to say, from the mere fact that he was only sixteen years well be that under such circumstances the owner would be held liable in damages, not because the hirer is his servant, or because as owner he is required to vouch to the public for the competency of all persons to whom he may let his teams or his cars for hire, but because he knew the incompetency of this particular driver and the imminent peril to which he thereby exposed others who were in the lawful use of the streets, and as a person of ordinary prudence should have refrained from so doing.

old, that he lacked judgment, discretion, and care to be expected of a mature person, and which was essential to the proper and careful operation of a vehicle so powerful as an automobile."

It was held in this case, however, to be reversible error to instruct that an automobile "when run upon the public highway is considered a dangerous appliance as a matter of law," the court remarking: "When carefully handled, it is not dangerous either to its passengers or to other persons using the public highways who are themselves in the exercise of reasonable care. Its great capacity and power endow it with dangerous possibilities, but human agency—wanton or negligent agency—must call them into play. It would seem paradoxical to say in one breath that an automobile is a lawful vehicle, and in the next that it is dangerous per se, as dynamite or a locomotive or a mad bull are dangerous. If it belonged to the latter class, the rules of the common law would not permit its presence on public highways for general use. So far as we are advised, the authorities are all one way on this question."

In Lynde v. Browning, 2 Tenn. C. C. A. 262, the court stated that, although automobiles were not dangerous agencies in such a sense as to make the owners absolutely responsible for all damage occasioned by collision in whosever hands they might be, yet in view of their propensities the most stringent regulations should be applied, and that a very high degree of responsibility rests upon owners, both as to their operation and in the selection of parties to whom they intrust them. The owner in this case was held liable on the ground of agency, for an injury inflicted while his car was being operated by his son for the latter's pleasure with the father's consent.

In Allen v. Bland, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 168 S. W. 35, where an action was brought against the owner of a car which was being used with his consent by his son when an accident occurred, the court held that an automobile is not a dangerous appliance as a matter of law, but stated that it was not willing to hold that a powerful heavy machine in the hands of an 85-pound boy not yet in his teens, speeding along the streets of a populous town, might not become a menace to the lives of persons using the streets.

It was held in this case that the issue of negligence was presented in as favorable a light as the defendants were entitled to have it, by an instruction in effect that, in order to render the parent liable for the son's negligence, it must appear that he might reasonably have anticipated the injury as a consequence of permitting the child to drive the car, and that the defendant's negligence made it possible for the child to cause the injury, and by another instruction to the effect that if the owner permitted the boy to drive the car, and, because of the latter's inexperience and want of fitness and ability to run such a car, he should have anticipated that danger and injury were likely to result to others, and if the operator failed to exercise ordinary care to prevent injury to the plaintiff, and the owner's acts in permitting him to have and run the car were negligent, and the negligence of both defendants was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury,—the owner would be liable. Ibid.

The general holding was not followed in Ingraham v. Stockamore, 63 Misc. 114, 118 N. Y. Supp. 399. It was there held that an automobile is a dangerous machine, and, while it was recognized that the owner would not be liable for an injury resulting while it was being used by another without the owner's consent, yet it was held that the owner was liable for an injury which occurred while his car was being used by his chauffeur for the latter's pleasure with his consent. The court said: "An automobile being a dangerous machine, its owner should be held responsible for the manner in which it is used; and his liability should extend to its use by anyone with his consent. He may not deliver it over to anyone he pleases and not be responsible for the consequences. The learned justice, in the prevailing opinion in Cunningham v. Castle, 127 App. Div. 580, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1057, says: 'It may be that it would be wise and in the public interests that responsibility for an accident caused by an automobile should be fixed to the owner thereof irrespective of the person driving it, but the law does not so provide.' I do not think so stringent a rule is necessary. In cases where an automobile is used without the consent of its owner, the latter should not be responsible; but in those cases where an automobile is operated on the highway with the consent of the owner, he should be responsible."

It has been held that the owner of an electric truck cannot be held liable on the theory of dangerous agency, for damage done by the truck, which was started by boys while it was standing unattended for a short time with brakes set and everything done that could be short of dismantling it, to render it inert, since the rules of law applicable to dangerous instrumentalities do not apply. Vincent v. Crandall & G. Co. 131 App. Div. 200, 115 N. Y. Supp. 600. And to the same effect is Berman v. Schultz, 84 N. Y. Supp. 292.

J. T. W.

Nothing of this manifest want of prudence is shown in this case now under consideration. Kraft, the hirer, is shown to have been a man accustomed to the use of automobiles. True, he had not before used a Ford car, but he had operated several others, and with the explanation and instruction which it is conceded he received concerning the manner of handling this car, we are disposed to hold that defendants cannot be charged with any failure of duty to the plaintiff or to the public in permitting him to drive it. To say otherwise and hold with plaintiff's contention would be to extend the law of liability for negligence to an unprecedented degree, and to place a ruinous burden upon the business of letting vehicles for hire.

Our attention is also called to the case of Tuller v. Talbott, 23 Ill. 357, 76 Am. Dec. 695, where the driver of a stagecoach placed the reins in the hands of a passenger by whose negligence another passenger in the coach was injured, and the owner was held to respond in damages. This and other similar cases cited are to be classed with the English precedents above referred to, and are not here in point. The owner of the stage line was a common carrier of passengers. The passenger who was injured had no control over the driver. The owner was in duty bound to protect the passenger against the negligence of the servant, and the act of the servant in passing the reins to a third person was in legal effect the act of the owner, who thereby became responsible for the negligence of the substituted driver. The defendants in this case were not carriers. They let their vehicles for hire, assuming no responsibility for negligence or recklessness of the hirer, save, perhaps, under exceptional circumstances such as we have already adverted to. In the absence of evident unfitness of a customer applying for a vehicle, we see no reason why the owner should be held to make an investigation into his qualifications as a driver.

II. It is next said that an automobile is of such character that while, perhaps, not per se a dangerous instrument, it may easily become such, and the owner is therefore bound to the exercise of greater care than would be required were there less danger in its operation. There is more or less danger in the use of vehicles of any kind. The motor cycle, the bicycle, the stagecoach, the ordinary carriage drawn by horses, all have their possibilities of peril, and there is room for difference of opinion concerning the various degrees of danger to be apprehended therefrom. The great body of those who use the various instrumentalities of travel are persons of ordinary prudence, L.R.A.19:15D.

while the incompetent or negligent is the exception. The fact that here and there a driver carelessly or recklessly converts his vehicle into an engine of injury or destruction to others is not a sufficient reason for requiring the owner of such vehicles for hire to test and ascertain the competency and skill of every customer before intrusting him with the custody of a car.

Nor is there any likeness, as counsel seems to think, between this case and that of the livery stable keeper who wilfully lets for hire an animal he knows to be vicious or dangerous. If the car in this case was defective in some respect, which rendered it incapable of control or made it a source of special danger, and defendants had allowed it to go out in that condition and thereby plaintiff had been injured, a very different question would be presented. But so far as shown the car was in perfect condition, and the sole cause of plaintiff's injury was the carelessness or forgetfulness of Kraft, who, in an emergency, threw a lever the wrong way, thereby causing a sudden acceleration of speed instead of checking it as he intended. Had he been driving a hired team and in some way had heedlessly got the reins crossed in his hands, thereby running over and injuring the plaintiff, counsel would hardly advise his client that the owner of the outfit was liable in damages for the hirer's negligence. The fact that the vehicle in this case happens to have been an auto car instead of a horse and buggy or a coach and four calls for the application of no different rule.

The testimony in the case discloses no cause of action against the appellees, and the judgment below is therefore affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LORETTA B. GIBSON, Appt.,

v.

WESTERN & SOUTHERN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY et al.

(161 Ky. 810, 171 S. W. 390.)

Tax — payment by stranger — agreement for subrogation — effect.

In the absence of a statute permitting tax officials to assign tax claims, a property owner cannot by contract confer a right of subrogation to the claims of the public upon a stranger who pays his taxes at his request, which will preserve a lien superior to that of existing mortgages on the property, although the tax collector attempted to preserve the lien by an assignment on the tax books.

(December 18, 1914.)

APPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Criminal, Common Law, and Equity Division of the Circuit Court for Kenton County, dismissing a petition filed to obtain subrogation to the liens of the which proves defective, to be subrogated to such lien or encumbrance, see notes in 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 838, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1049; and 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 489.

As to right of surety to be subrogated to priority of state or United States in payment from assets of debtor, see note in 29 L.R.A. 240, 248.

And generally as to right of one paying stranger's debt to be subrogated to the right of the creditor, see notes in 23 L.R.A. 124, and 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 233.

The present note is confined to cases in which the one paying the taxes of another had and claimed no interest in the property to protect. Cases are therefore excluded where the tax was paid by a mortgagee, vendee, or other person having an interest in the property, or by one claiming or believing at the time he paid the tax that he had an interest, even though it afterward proved that he had no interest. The note does not include cases passing upon the question as to the right of subrogation of a purchaser at a tax sale (see note to Holland v. Hotchkiss, L.R.A.1915C, 492, as to right of purchaser at invalid tax sale to reimbursement for taxes paid as a condition of equitable relief); neither does it include cases dealing merely with the right of the one paying the tax to recover the same in a proper action from the taxpayer, as subrogation to the rights of the public in respect to taxes paid involves, of course, more than the mere right of recovery from the taxpayer or the right to an equitable lien on land.

No case has been found in which the facts were similar in all respects to those in GIBSON v. WESTERN & S. L. INS. CO., but the decision in that case appears to be in accord with the principles declared in the majority of the cases passing upon the question of subrogation to the rights of the public of one who voluntarily advances money to pay taxes on land in which he has and claims no interest. In these cases generally, however, there was no agreement for subrogation, and no attempted assignment of the tax lien, as in the reported case. But there is authority for the proposition that without a statute authorizing them to do so, officials cannot assign a tax lien; and in Mersick v. Hartford & W. H. Horse R. Co. 76 Conn. 11, 100 L.R.A.1915D.

city, county, and state for taxes paid by petitioner, and to have her lien adjudged superior to those of existing mortgages on the property. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Mr. A. E. Strickle, for appellant:

Petitioner is not a stranger, intermeddler, or a volunteer, because the taxes upon the parcels of real estate were paid at the instance of the owner of the property, and insured to the benefit of the mortgagees, thereby removing her from the rule of a mere volunteer, stranger, or intermeddler.

Wilkins v. Gibson, 113 Ga. 31, 84 Am. St.

Am. St. Rep. 977, 55 Atl. 664, where taxes of a railroad company were paid by one who the court said was under no obligation to pay them, but who was, it appears, a bondholder of the company, subrogation was denied although there was an understanding between the company and the party paying the taxes that the latter might hold the amount paid as a preferred claim to the same extent as the state treasurer (to whom the taxes were paid) might have held it had payment not been made. In this case the court said that it was the duty of the company to pay the tax; that another at its request had paid the debt, and that the company could not by agreement give him a lien on the mortgaged property which would take precedence over that of the bondholders; also that the transaction was a loan, and the lender did not acquire such lien upon the mortgaged property as the state may have had.

But a tax collector of a town was allowed, it appears, in a district court case in Massachusetts, Re Grant, 14 Am. L. Rev. 801, to prove, as a privileged claim against the estate of a bankrupt, taxes advanced by him for the bankrupt under an agreement made between the collector and the assignee that if the former would advance the amount of the tax, in order to secure the discount allowed if it was paid before a certain day, he might stand in the place of the town assessing the tax.

In Shanks v. Stephens, 4 Ky. L. Rep. 838 (abstract), it is said: "A party who has paid taxes for another, and taken his obligation for the amount so paid, is not entitled to be substituted to the rights of the state, but his claim stands on the footing of an ordinary debt."

And in Kocher v. Kocher, 56 N. J. Eq. 547, 39 Atl. 536, it was held that a son who loaned money to his father to pay benefit assessments which were a lien on land was not entitled to subrogation to the lien of the assessments.

In McInerney v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410, it was held that a city could not assign a special tax for street improvements, so as to entitle the assignee by suit in his own name to collect the same from the taxpayer, and that one who had purchased the property from the city at a void sale for the tax could not,

Mr. S. D. Rouse, for appellee Insurance Company:

Taxes are not a debt; and one paying taxes assessed against the property of another has no right of subrogation, except as provided by statute.

therefore, enforce collection from the taxpayer by a suit in his own name, as the equitable assignee of the city. Regarding the right of the city to make an assignment of taxes, it was said: "It would not do to hold that a city could delegate or farm out either its taxing power or its power to enforce the collection of taxes. It would be a startling proposition to affirm that a city could, for example, sell and assign its tax list to an individual, and authorize him to exercise the high and delicate powers conferred upon the corporation. Why not? The legal answer is that these powers are conferred upon the municipality to be exercised by it, not to be delegated by it to others." It was said also that if the tax were an ordinary debt, and if the ordinary principles of law applicable to dealings between private individuals were applied, it could not be denied that the plaintiff in this instance would become the equitable assignee of the city and subrogated to all its rights; but that the tax was not an ordinary debt arising out of contract, express or implied, though partaking somewhat of the nature of a debt; that without a statute a city could not levy nor collect the tax, and the taxpayer was bound to pay, if at all, only by virtue of the power given to the city to levy and collect; also that to allow the city before judgment to barter and sell assessments by express contract, assign its right to collect, and by virtue of such sale and assignment invest the assignee with the power to sue and collect in his own name, would be to open a most dangerous door, leading on the one hand to fraud against the city, and on the other to oppression of the citizen or property owner.

So, in Brown v. Sheldon State Bank, 139 Iowa, 83, 117 N. W. 289, the court laid down the rule that the right of a county to a lien for taxes was not one capable of assignment, saying that the right of the county is measured not by contract, but by statute, and is the right only to assess and collect, which cannot be farmed out to private individuals; also that it should not require argument to make it clear that, where there is no right or power of assignment, there can arise no right of subrogation.

where the tax was paid by a mortgagee, the court in Sperry v. Butler, 75 Conn. 369, 53 Atl. 899, said: "Subrogation is an equitable, and not a legal, right. Its foundation, it is said, is in equity and benevolence. . . . It is a doctrine, therefore, which will be applied or not according to the dictates of equity and good conscience, and considerations of public policy. When the case is one of the subrogation of the individual to public rights and remedies, the situation assumes an aspect not presented where the substitution relates to private rights. Questions of public policy, questions as to the propriety of turning over the governmental machinery to individuals and conferring upon them the powers of the organized public, at once arise. The inquiry becomes one not of legislative power to provide for a complete or partial substitution, but one of judicial discretion in the administration of equitable principles under equitable considerations. So it is that courts ought to hesitate, and have hesitated, to apply the doctrine of subrogation to cases where the substitution would result in conferring upon individuals rights and powers peculiarly designed for and adapted to public purposes, and as a part of the governmental machinery, without statutory sanction, express or implied. . . . The power of taxation is one of the drastic powers exercised by governmental bodies. Its machinery is skilfully designed to accomplish the desired results most certainly and effectually. It is adapted to its uses, but not to private, unrestrained exercise. Therefore it is that, in the absence of legislation expressly or by reasonable implication authorizing the substitution of the individual for the community, the powers specially created as incidental to the exercise of the public right of taxation ought not to become delegated to private persons by judicial intervention, unless, indeed, it be in rare and extreme cases."

In Griffing v. Pintard, 25 Miss. 173, it was held that a tax collector who advanced money for taxes on property of another was not subrogated to the rights and remedies of the state against the delinquent taxpayer.

So, in Hinchman v. Morris, 29 W. Va. 673, 2 S. E. 863, it was held that in the settlement of a decedent's estate, a sheriff

Mr. Robert C. Simmons, for appellees Leubrecht et al.:

There is no equitable principle presented in this case to support a subrogation.

Caine v. Rich, 33 Ky. L. Rep. 261, 110 S. W. 289; Jones v. Louisville Tobacco Warehouse Co. 135 Ky. 831, 121 S. W. 633, 123 S. W. 307; McInerny v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410; Hinchman v. Morris, 29 W. Va. 673, 2 S. E. 863.

who in the lifetime of the decedent had paid taxes on his property, instead of returning it as delinquent, was not entitled to be subrogated as to the taxes paid to the rights of the state; and that, there being no request, express or implied, by the taxpayer for such payment, and no ratification thereof, the sheriff was not only not entitled to payment out of the estate in preference to the general creditors, but had no enforceable claim against the estate. It was said that a tax in its essential characteristics is not a debt, and that, "if taxes, whether state, county, or municipal, are not debts, but are charges imposed upon the taxpayers in invitum by the exercise of the sovereign power of the state, then, as nothing but debts or contracts can be assigned either at law or in equity, and subrogation, because one has paid a debt to the original creditor, is in effect an equitable assignment of the debt by the creditor, it must follow that taxes of no description can be assigned at law or in equity; and so, of course, one who pays the taxes of another, whether or not he be the sheriff or collector, has no right to be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the state, county, or municipality, as the case may be. The power to collect the tax is conferred by the sovereign state on a county or a municipality, or, in case of the state tax, the power is exercised by the state itself both of levying and collecting. This sovereign power to collect taxes in the mode prescribed by the state cannot, if correct principles are followed, be exercised by any individual for his own benefit, any more than the other sovereign power of levying taxes can be exercised by him. . . . To sell a citizen's land for the nonpayment of taxes on it in the way authorized by the law is the exercise of a sovereign power of the state, which can be justified only by the absolute necessity that the state should receive promptly the taxes to which it is entitled, in order to carry on the government and prevent its coming to an end. For this reason the legislature thought proper by the provisions of the Code of 1860 to permit the enforcement of the lien on land for taxes assessed on it, by a sale of the land or of a portion of it at public auction for cash, without any suit or other legal proceedings. It would indeed be a L.R.A.1915D.

Olay, C., filed the following opinion:

Sidney Arthur and others are the owners of two apartment buildings in the city of Covington, and the lots on which they are located. On April 29, 1905, they mortgaged one of the buildings to the Western & Southern Life Insurance Company to secure a loan of $27,000, for which they executed their promissory note payable eleven years from date. Thereafter they mortgaged the same building to Thomas H. Phillips and George Leubrecht to secure certain promissory notes aggregating $6,900. On August 8, 1906, the same parties mortgaged the other building to the Western & Southern startling proposition to affirm that under our law a sheriff, or anyone else for his own benefit, could thus enforce a lien on land. Yet if the sheriff without any statute can be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the state for the collection of taxes, he can, of course, enforce the lien in this arbitrary manner. For if one is entitled to be subrogated to the rights of another, such subrogation acts as an equitable assignment of the debt, and carries with it not only all the creditor's rights, but also all his remedies." It was said, also, that if the sheriff was subrogated to the rights and remedies of the state, he would be entitled to enforce any of these rights, and to resort to any of the remedies after any length of time; for subrogation, being an implied assignment, transfers not only the right, but also all the remedies, which, but for the assignment, the assignor would have had; and, as there is no statute of limitation which bars any of the remedies of the state, except as to the time within which taxes may be distrained for, the sheriff, when subrogated to the rights of the state, would be subjected to no such bar.

The court in Hinchman v. Morris, supra, referred with approval to the case of McInerny v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410, saying that, while the latter was a case of municipal taxation, in its general reasoning it was equally applicable to state and county taxes; that there may be some special reasons why the power to collect municipal taxes should not be communicable to individuals; but that on the other hand there are special reasons why the power to collect state taxes should not be communicable to anybody, and that the reasons which forbid such a transfer are at least as strong as those which forbid the transfer of municipal taxes.

Hinchman v. Morris, supra, was decided under the statute law of West Virginia as it was prior to 1881. In that year, as appears from the case, a statute was enacted providing that if a sheriff pays any taxes into the treasury before he has collected the same, he shall have the same remedy for the collection thereof by distress, or otherwise, as if the same had not been paid to the state, except that he shall not have a lien

Life Insurance Company to secure a loan of $30,000, represented by nine promissory notes. While all these mortgages were in full force and effect, the owners defaulted in the payment of half the city taxes for the year 1908, and all the taxes for the years 1910 and 1911. They also failed to pay the state and county taxes for the year 1910. The city of Covington, through its delinquent tax collector, regularly advertised the taxes as delinquent on each of said parcels of real estate for said years. The sheriff of Kenton county advertised and sold each of the parcels for state and county taxes for the year 1910, and purchased same in the name of the commonwealth. Thereafter suit was instituted by the county attorney to enforce the lien of the commonwealth. The city taxes on the first parcel of land for the years mentioned were $1,843.27. The state and county taxes, with interest and penalty, were $418.44. The city taxes on the second parcel of land amounted to $1,827.44, while the state and county taxes, including interest, costs, and penalty, amounted to $418.44. The city of Covington, through its delinquent tax collector, was about to institute action in the Kenton circuit court to enforce its lien on said parcels of land for the taxes due for therefor on the real estate on which the taxes are assessed.

In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Hart, 35 L.R.A. 352, 22 C. C. A. 473, 40 U. S. App. 559, 76 Fed. 673, it was held that a county treasurer who received checks for taxes required to be paid in cash, and thereupon paid over the amount to the state, city, or board of education, made such payment voluntarily, and was not entitled to be subrogated to their rights in the taxes paid; and the court assigned, as an additional reason for refusing subrogation, that it was claimed in this instance as against bondholders under a mortgage from the taxpayer, authorizing foreclosure in case of default in payment of taxes, the taxes having, because of the treasurer's action for several years, appeared upon the record as paid, and the bondholders having no knowledge or notice that they had not been paid by the mortgagor.

And where a sheriff accounted for, but failed to collect, taxes, when the owner had personal property on the premises from which collection could have been made, it was held in Allen v. Perrine, 103 Ky. 516, 41 L.R.A. 351, 45 S. W. 500, that the sheriff's right of subrogation, if any, to the lien of the state for the taxes, was subject to the prior equity of a mortgage, the lien of which had attached before the lien for taxes.

Also, in Wallace's Estate, 59 Pa. 401, it was held that in the settlement of a decedent's estate, a tax collector who, during a period of six years, in the decedent's lifetime, while there was sufficient personal property to satisfy the claim for taxes, had paid taxes on his property and obtained a judgment therefor against him, was not entitled to be subrogated to the priority of the state's lien for taxes, so as to obtain a preference over a prior judgment creditor of the decedent. It was said that when the collector paid the taxes to the proper officers entitled to receive them, the lien for taxes was discharged; that, although discharged at law, the lien, if justice required it, might be kept alive in equity for the benefit of a paying surety; but that the tax collector could not be regarded as a surety. "It was his duty to collect the taxes and pay them over without delay, and he had no authority to grant indulgence, or to L.R.A.1915D.

extend the time of their payment. Public policy and the law require that an officer intrusted with the collection of taxes necessary to the support and proper administration of the government should discharge his duties with promptness and fidelity, and if he has been remiss or delinquent in the performance of his trust, it may well be doubted if he is entitled to subrogation under any circumstances. But, however this may be, it is clear that he is not entitled to it to the prejudice of the rights of others."

The court also in Chaffe v. Ludeling, 34 La. Ann. 962, intimated that one paying taxes on the property of another was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the state to a preference over the claims of a mortgagee. In this case, where a vendee of property subject to a mortgage claimed the right of subrogation to the lien of the state for taxes in preference to the mortgage, the court said that if he paid the taxes before he acquired the property, under no circumstances could he have a claim to subrogation.

In Furche v. Mayer, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 29 S. W. 1099, it was held that the plaintiff, who, at the request of the defendants, in order to prevent a sale of the latter's property for taxes, paid them and received a note for the amount advanced, was not entitled to subrogation to the lien for the taxes in favor of the state and city. The court said: "In the case of ordinary liens, one who discharges the lien at the request of the lien holder, or does so by agreement between the debtor and lien holder, or to protect himself from the lien, becomes subrogated to the rights of the original lien holder. We find no well-considered case holding a person entitled to subrogation where he pays off the lien debt simply upon the request of the debtor, unaccompanied by an agreement of subrogation to the discharged lien, or circumstances from which such an agreement may be implied. No agreement of subrogation, or facts from which it may be reasonably implied, were alleged in this case, and we do not think the facts alleged entitled the appellant to that relief. . . . Aside from this view of the case, we do not think the statutory lien existing in favor of the government for taxes due is that character the years above set forth. Sidney Arthur, one of the owners of the property, prevailed upon appellant, Loretta B. Gibson, to pay all the foregoing taxes under an agreement whereby she should be subrogated to the rights of the taxing authorities to the extent of the taxes so paid by her. On February 9, 1912, she paid the city of Covington, the county of Kenton, and the state of Kentucky all the taxes due them. On November 29, 1912, the Western & Southern Life Insurance Company brought two suits to enforce its mortgage liens on the two parcels of land. Phillips and Leubrecht became parties and asserted a lien on tract No. 1 superior to all other liens except that of the Western & Southern Life Insurance Company. Thereafter appellant, Loretta B. Gibson, became a party to the action, and filed a petition alleging substantially the facts above set out. She further alleged that all the mortgages above referred to were in full force and effect at the time the taxes became delinquent and were paid by her, and that by reason of her payment of the taxes the mortgagees were benefited in that the owners of the buildings were enabled to pay interest on the

of lien to which one may enforce the equitable right of subrogation."

So, in Repass v. Moore, 98 Va. 377, 36 S. E. 474, it was held that the plaintiff, who as county treasurer had paid taxes owing by the defendant, was not entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the county and state therefor. The court said that in this case the treasurer, without previous request or subsequent promise of indemnity, and with no assignment of the tax lien, if it were capable of assignment, voluntarily paid the tax which he now sought to recover, into the county and state treasuries; that there was no such duty imposed upon him, but that it was his voluntary act in derogation of the duty imposed upon him by law; and he was therefore not within the broadest and most comprehensive definition of the right of subrogation; but that it would not undertake to say that a case might not arise in which the right of subrogation would be enforced for the protection of a collector of taxes.

And in Page v. Claggett, 71 N. H. 85, 51 Atl. 686, it was held that an agreement between a tax collector and a town, whereby the former for a sum of money guaranteed the town against loss on account of unpaid taxes, and the latter agreed that the tax warrants should continue in force until all the taxes were collected, was unauthorized and void. Regarding the assignability of the tax warrants, it was said: "Governmental necessity for prompt and efficient means of obtaining money to meet the public expense has brought into use, for the collection of taxes, instrumentalities which, applied in enforcement of ordinary obligations, would violate the most sacred rights of person and property. . . . The propriety and legality of these summary and drastic measures when employed in the prescribed way for the public benefit, and under the restraints and safeguards which responsibility to the public imposes and provides, are unquestioned. . . . But a tax warrant, with its peculiar attributes, is inseparable from the public for whose sovereign need it exists. It cannot be assigned with the taxes to whosoever will pay them, nor can it be employed by the collector to reimburse himself for taxes he has been compelled to pay for others, whether in fulfillment of a special contract of guaranty with the town, or to answer for his official default. It is only available to the public and for the public, and subject to the restraints and safeguards which public use and attendant public responsibility afford. . . . No case has come to our attention where a collector who had extinguished all public interest in the taxes by full payment and satisfaction was afterwards permitted, unrestrained by the right of abatement or the general safeguards arising from public interest and superintendence, to pursue the delinquent taxpayers by means of the remedies incident to his former office, including the right of arrest and commitment. No man should be permitted to employ for his own personal benefits those drastic remedies devised solely and justified only to meet sovereign necessity; nor should any man be permitted to serve the most arbitrary process known to the law in his own behalf. The fact that after a certain time taxes are subject to extraordinary rate of interest furnishes a peculiar reason why such policy should not be countenanced. It would encourage official speculation, offer a premium to official neglect, and open wide the door to oppression and abuse."

It was held also in Page v. Claggett, supra, that the authority to collect on the tax warrants as the assignee of the town was not given the collector by a statute providing that his powers should continue until all the taxes in his list were collected, the court regarding the taxes as "collected," within the meaning of the statute, when paid by the collector to the town.

To permit tax warrants and the remedies for the collection of taxes to be assigned would afford such opportunity for abuse and oppression that legislative authorization should not be found except upon clear enactment to that effect. Ibid.

And it was held in Page v. Claggett, supra, that a taxpayer whose taxes the collector had advanced to the town, pursuant to the agreement, was subject to arrest for nonpayment thereof, as the payments by the collector were inoperative, the tax still remained due, and the warrants were enforceable by the collector for the town's benefit.

In White v. State, 51 Ga. 252, it was held that a tax collector who had settled with the state and county for taxes uncollected by mortgage liens, which the mortgagees would not otherwise have received. It was further alleged in her petition that the liens for said taxes were not to be canceled, but that the delinquent tax collector and the county clerk were to make such entries on their books as would show that such tax bills had been paid by and assigned to the plaintiff, in order that the lien for the same might remain unimpaired. The delinquent tax collector indorsed on the city tax bills the fact that payment was received of appellant, and that the bills, including interest and penalties, were assigned to her. The county clerk noted on his books the fact that payment was made by appellant. Appellant asked that she be subrogated to the liens of the city, county, and state for the taxes so paid by her, and that her liens be adjudged superior to all other liens or encumbrances on the two parcels of land. A demurrer was sustained to the petition, and the petition dismissed. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

Briefly stated, appellant's contention is that, as she paid the taxes at the instance of the owners of the property, and with the distinct agreement that she was to be him was not entitled to the immunity from judicial interference allowed by statute to the state in the collection of taxes.

Although subrogation to the rights of the public of one voluntarily advancing money to pay the tax on property in which he had and claimed no interest has been generally denied, there are several cases in which, under special statutes, the right of subrogation has been upheld.

Thus, in Hart v. Tiernan, 59 Conn. 521, 21 Atl. 1007, it was held that under the statutes applicable to the case requiring a tax collector to pay over all taxes, whether collected or not, within one year after they became due, and providing that if any taxes remained unpaid to the collector after settlement, he might maintain an action in his own name and recover the same, a tax collector who had accounted for uncollected taxes of the defendant succeeded to the rights and remedies of the public as to the tax liens, and might maintain an action in his own name to foreclose the same, and this, too, without an assignment of the liens. See also Cole v. Rice, 74 Conn. 680, 51 Atl. 1083, recognizing the right of a tax collector in that state to succeed to all the rights under a tax lien that can be asserted by the municipality.

And subrogation of a county treasurer to the right of the state and county was said in Schaum v. Showers, 49 Ind. 285, to arise under the Indiana statute providing that whenever any county treasurer or collector shall have charged himself with and accounted for a tax that shall not have been paid to him, such tax shall be deemed as due to him personally, whether in or out of office, and may be collected by him in the same way as other taxes due and unpaid are collected. It was held, however, in this case, that a treasurer who had advanced money for taxes was not entitled to a lien on the property prior to that of mortgagees, by virtue of a statute providing that if he on a settlement stands charged with taxes remaining unpaid, and does not receive a credit therefor, he may collect the tax for his own use, at any time within a year after settlement, by distress and sale or by an action of debt in his own name.

Under the Indiana statute an assignee of a county treasurer who had accounted for L.R.A.1915D.

taxes uncollected was held in State ex rel. Riley v. Taggart, 148 Ind. 431, 47 N. E. 831, not entitled to a writ of mandamus to compel the county auditor to place the taxes on tax duplicate for collection for her benefit, where no excuse was offered for not attempting to collect the tax out of the personal property within a year, and nearly twenty years had elapsed since the payment by the treasurer, during which, it was insisted, the real estate had passed to innocent parties. The court said it was true that if the taxes were still due the state, the lien would continue in its favor until they were paid, but that the assignee of the treasurer had no such right.

The general rule was laid down in Title Guarantee & T. Co. v. Haven, 196 N. Y. 487, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1308, 89 N. E. 1082, 1085, 17 Ann. Cas. 1131, on facts not within the scope of the note, that there is nothing in the nature of a lien for taxes or assessments, or in the fact that such lien exists in favor of a sovereign taxing power, to prevent the application of the equitable doctrine of subrogation when justice demands it.

That a purchaser of land of a corporation on foreclosure, who, before the sale is approved or he has complied with his bid, voluntarily pays a claim for taxes, without knowledge of any dispute as to its validity, and is denied credit therefor when completing his purchase, may be subrogated to the claim for such part of the taxes as the property was clearly subject to, see Walters v. Charleston Mills, 48 L.R.A. 503, 40 C. C. A. 108, 99 Fed. 825.

In Thomas v. Hammer, 13 Lea, 620, it was held that a tax collector who had accounted for taxes on land sold by him therefor, and bid in for the county, the sale not being recognized as valid, was entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the state and county for the tax.

Under a provision of the Municipal Code that assessments may be recovered or the lien enforced in the name of the corporation, an assignee from a municipality of a claim for a sewer assessment cannot sue upon it in his own name, although the Code expressly authorizes the assignment of such claims. Scully v. Ackmeyer, 2 Cin. Sup. Ct. Rep. 296. R. E. H.

subrogated to the rights of the taxing authorities, she is not a volunteer, and is therefore entitled to a lien on the property under and by virtue of the general doctrine of subrogation, applicable to cases where a third party, by agreement with the owner, discharges a lien or encumbrance on the owner's land. 27 Cyc. 468. In this state we have no statute authorizing assignment of tax claims by the taxing authorities, and subrogating a stranger who pays taxes under an agreement with the owner that he will be so subrogated to the lien of the taxing authority. The only statutes which we have on the subject provide that a lien holder, or the occupant or tenant of land, or the bailee or person in possession of personal property, may pay the tax which the owner ought to pay, and recover from the owner, and give him a lien on the property taxed to secure the payment thereof. Kentucky Statutes, §§ 4032, 4033. We also have a statute providing that the purchaser of property at an invalid tax sale shall have a lien on the property for the amount of taxes and costs paid by him, and for which the property is liable. Section 4036. Aside from the authority contained in these statutes, it is also generally held that a person who has an interest in property, and who, in order to protect that interest, is compelled to pay the taxes thereon, is entitled to subrogation. This rule is applied in favor of mortgagor and mortgagee, vendor and vendee, grantor and grantee, tenants for life, tenants in common, lessor and lessee, executors, etc. Cooley, Tax, pp. 812-824. Then, too, in some jurisdictions subrogation is allowed where payment is made under a mistake as to ownership (Kemp v. Cossart, 47 Ark. 62, 14 S. W. 465; Goodnow v. Moulton, 51 Iowa, 555, 2 N. W. 395; Ingersoll v. Jeffords, 55 Miss. 37; Schaefer v. Causey, 8 Mo. App. 142), though this doctrine is denied by the Federal Supreme Court (Iowa Homestead County v. Valley R. Co. [Iowa Homestead Co. v. Des Moines Nav. & R. Co.] 17 Wall. 153, 21 L. ed. 622).

In the case before us appellant had no interest whatever in the property. She did not pay the taxes under a mistake that she owned the property. She paid the taxes at the instance and request of the owner, and under an agreement that she was to be subrogated to the lien of the city, county, and state. As before stated, there is no statute in this state conferring on tax collecting officers the power to assign tax claims. The state and its various subdivisions are given broad powers in matters of taxation. These powers are conferred on state and municipal officers to be exercised by them, and not to be delegated to others. McL.R.A. 1915D.

Inerny v. Reed, 23 Iowa, 410. Therefore, in the absence of statutory authority, the taxing officers upon whom these broad powers are conferred have no authority to assign tax claims and vest in the assignee the power to enforce their collection. This disposes of appellant's case in so far as she relies on the assignment by the delinquent tax collector. Counsel for appellant insist that appellant is not a volunteer because of the special agreement. It must be remembered, however, that a tax is not a debt in the ordinary sense of the word, and is not therefore subject to the control of the parties. As neither the state nor any of its municipalities may assign their tax claims, we are unable to see upon what theory or sound public policy it can be held that the owner of property can, in effect, make such an assignment by procuring a stranger in interest to pay the taxes under an agreement that he will be entitled to subrogation. If this were the rule, the effect would be the same as if the taxing authority themselves had made the assignment. In our review of the authorities bearing on the question, we have been unable to find any well-considered case holding that a stranger who has no interest to protect is entitled to subrogation where he paid the taxes under a mere agreement with the owner that he was to be subrogated. In every case we have been able to find, subrogation is applied under the authority of particular statutes, or on the ground that the payment was made to protect some property right. We are not therefore disposed to hold that all the machinery for collecting taxes may be turned over to an entire stranger in interest under and by virtue of a mere agreement made with the owner of the property. In our opinion, sound public policy forbids it. Powers intended to be exercised by public officers would be conferred on private individuals. Not only so, but mortgagees and other lien holders would be frequently placed at a great disadvantage. They might go on for years in the belief that the taxes had been regularly paid by the owner, only to find that they had been paid by a stranger who was asserting a lien on the land in an amount sufficient practically to destroy the value of their security.

There is no merit in the contention that mortgagees would not be prejudiced. If the taxes were paid by the owner, the lien would be discharged. If paid by a stranger, the lien would continue in force. If not paid by the owner, and the law did not permit a stranger in title to pay them, the mortgagees could take prompt steps to protect their interests. While not a volunteer in the ordinary sense of that word, appellant was a volunteer in its legal sense, for subrogation to the lien of the taxing authorities upon the payment of the taxes was not authorized by any statute, nor was it necessary to protect any interest which she had in the property. We, therefore, conclude that, in the absence of a statute authorizing subrogation, a mere stranger who has no interest in the property to protect, but who pays the taxes thereon merely under an agreement with the owner that he should be subrogated to the lien of the taxing authorities, is not subrogated to such lien as against persons having valid liens on the property.

Judgment affirmed.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

LOUISVILLE & NASHVILLE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.,
v.

J. P. GADDIE.

(162 Ky. 205, 172 S. W. 514.)

Carrier — carrying passenger beyond station not regular stop — liability.

A railroad company is not liable for carrying past his destination a passenger who

Note. — Carrier: duty and liability to passenger who boards a train that does not stop at his destination.

The general rule seems to be that one who boards a train not scheduled to stop at his destination may be required to leave the train at the first regular stopping place prior thereto, if there be one; if the first regular stop is beyond his destination, he must pay fare to such place, and on refusal the train may be stopped and he must get off or suffer ejection. As subsequently shown, there is some conflict as to the rights and duty of the passenger when he has been misdirected by an employee.

That a rule that certain trains only shall stop at certain stations is a reasonable rule which a railroad company has the right to prescribe in the absence of statutory regulation or prohibition has been held in Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Carmichael, 90 Ala. 19, 9 L.R.A. 388, 8 So. 87; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Maxwell, — Ala. —, 66 So. 669; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Atchison, 47 Ark. 74, 14 S. W. 468, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 136; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gants, 58 Kan. 608, 5 Am. St. Rep. 780, 17 Pac. 54; Hancock v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 434, 85 S. W. 210; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miles, 100 Ky. 84, 37 S. W. 486; Duling v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 66 Md. 120, 6 Atl. 592; Logan v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 77 Mo. 663; Sira v. Wabash R. Co. 115 Mo. 127, 37 Am. knowingly boards a train not scheduled to stop there, although the gateman and brakeman made no objection to his boarding the train, if the conductor, upon ascertaining his destination, informed him that the train would not stop, and advised him to leave it at a suitable intermediate stopping place and wait for another train.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for defendant's alleged breach of duty in refusing to stop one of its trains at plaintiff's destination and permit him to alight therefrom. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Black, Black, & Owens, with Mr. Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellant: Defendant was not liable for carrying plaintiff past his destination.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miles, 100 Ky. 84, 37 S. W. 486; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Warfield, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 352, 98 S. W. 313; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cruise, 123 Ky. 463, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 299, 96 S. And it seems also to be a well-settled rule that it is the duty of a person about to take passage on a train to inquire when and how he can go or stop according to regulations, and if he makes a mistake which is not induced by the agents of the railroad company, he has no remedy against the company for the consequences. Mr. B. B. Golden for appellee.

Hannah, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

J. P. Gaddie sued the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company in the Knox circuit court to recover damages resulting from an alleged breach of its duty as a common carrier of passengers in refusing to stop one of its fast passenger trains at the place of plaintiff's destination and permitting

So, an instruction that recovery may be had for failure to stop the train at a passenger's destination notwithstanding a regulation that such train shall not stop at such place, if a passenger boards it without knowing that it would not stop there, and is accepted as a passenger without protest, is erroneous where it ignores the duty of the passenger to exercise ordinary care to ascertain whether the train which was boarded was the proper train. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Campbell, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 35, 69 S. W. 451.

But in Delmonte v. Southern P. Co. 2 Cal. App. 211, 83 Pac. 269, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 81, in affirming a judgment for ejection of a passenger who boarded a through train in reliance on its custom to stop at an intermediate station, it was held proper to instruct the jury to the effect that while it is the duty of a passenger before he takes a train to ascertain whether it will stop at his destination, yet he may depend on custom or wait until he gets express notice from some source of a change.

And where, under the regulations of a railroad company, a freight train carries passengers to a certain station whenever there is necessity for handling freight at that station, and it is the custom, when no passengers are to be taken, to lock the caboose or to announce before leaving that no stop will be made there, one who has traveled on that train before has a right to L.R.A.1915D.

him to alight therefrom. There was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for $1,000. The railroad company appeals.

Plaintiff testified that he is now the president of the People's Bank at Pineville, and resides in that city, but that in January, 1912, he lived in a brick building about 250 yards from the depot at Ely's, a station in Knox county on defendant's line of railroad; that on January 17, 1912, he purchased from the defendant's ticket agent at Frankfort a ticket which entitled him to be transported to Elys, via Louisville; and that he left for home that afternoon. At Louisville he changed trains, boarding the next train out of Louisville for Corbin, arriving at Corbin about midnight. There it was again necessary to change trains, assume that such stop will be made, unless notified otherwise in the customary manner, and so is not bound to make special and independent inquiry. Wieland v. Southern P. Co. 1 Cal. App. 343, 82 Pac. 226.

Liability for refusal to stop through train at passenger's destination.

A railroad company which establishes reasonable rules and regulations for the running of its trains, incurs no liability because of failure to stop all its trains at every station, especially where there is no evidence that ample facilities and accommodations are not afforded to all who may desire to reach a particular station at which the train does not stop. Kyle v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 105 C. C. A. 151, 182 Fed. 613.

And especially has a railroad company the right to run through trains, where it is using the tracks of another company, and under a traffic arrangement it is bound not to do a local business. Flood v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2135, 80 S. W. 184.

So, in the absence of a special contract to that effect, a passenger has no right to require a train to stop at a particular station where, according to the regulations of the company, it is not scheduled to stop, and does not ordinarily stop. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cameron, 14 C. C. A. 358, 32 U. S. App. 67, 66 Fed. 709.

Therefore where one boards a train, knowing before hand that it will not stop at his destination, he cannot recover damages for being carried past such destination. Texas & P. R. Co. v. White, 4 Tex. App. Civ. Cas. (Willson) 451, 17 S. W. 419.

And one who, through his own fault or mistake, gets on a train which does not stop at his destination, cannot recover damages for refusal of the conductor to stop the train at such place, contrary to the regulations. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Applewhite, 52 Ind. 540.

And where one boards a through train without making any effort to ascertain and to take passengers upon a train running from Corbin to Norton; Elys being on that line and about 25 miles east of Corbin.

There were two trains leaving Corbin daily on this line that were scheduled to stop at Elys; one leaving about 8 in the morning, the other about 2:30 in the afternoon, each requiring about 1½ hours to reach Elys. There was also a fast train leaving over this road at about 3:45 in the morning; but this train was not scheduled to stop at Elys, and plaintiff waited in and around the station until this train was due to leave and boarded it. When the conductor came to collect Gaddie's fare, and saw that his ticket was for Elys, he immediately informed him that the train would not stop at that place, and that he would have to alight at Flat Lick, an intermediate station, one mile west of Elys. This plaintiff said he would not do. Later, as the train was nearing Barbourville, the county seat of Knox county, the conductor asked Gaddie if he would not rather alight at Barbourville, where he could get a hotel, than at Flat Lick; but plaintiff declined to accept the suggestion, and he says that the conductor did not speak to him after that.

When the train stopped at Flat Lick plaintiff failed to alight. He admits that he knew that Elys was not a regular stop for that train, having lived at said station for years, but testifies that he did not think the conductor would be so contrary whether it will stop at his destination, the bare refusal of the conductor to stop there is no dereliction of his duty, and it is not negligence, to be visited on the company. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rosenberry, 45 Ark. 256, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 122.

So, also, one who boards a train which, under traffic arrangements of the railroad company over whose lines it is running, is not permitted to stop at the place of such person's destination, cannot, by offering the fare to such place, require that the train stop there. Flood v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. supra.

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Townsend, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 616, 101 S. W. 455, it was held that an action for refusal to stop a train at the place where passenger wished to alight could not be maintained, it being inferable from the evidence that plaintiff, when he boarded the train, knew it would not stop at his destination, the place having been discontinued as a station, and none of the railroad company's trains stopping there, and he was given an opportunity to alight at a regular stop 1 mile from such place, and this although the auditor took the plaintiff's fare to the place at which he wished to get off, but, on being informed by the conductor that that was not a regular stopping place, informed the passenger of his mistake and gave him an opportunity to alight at the station 1 mile before reaching the place to which he wished to go.

In Miley v. Northern P. R. Co. 41 Mont. 51, 108 Pac. 5, action to recover statutory penalty for refusal to stop train at station, the court, while intimating that the statute did not require the railroad company to stop the train at every station, reserved its decision on that point, holding that plaintiff did not bring herself within the provisions of that statute so as to entitle recovery, as the statute provided that the regular fare must be tendered, and she tendered an excursion ticket at a reduced rate.

If one through his own neglect embarks on a mere "wild train" which is not scheduled to stop at his place of destination, and which the conductor cannot delay without the danger of throwing the passenger and freight travel of the road into confusion, it is the conductor's duty to refuse to stop merely for such passenger's accommodation, and the fact that the conductor took the passenger's ticket would not alter the rule under such circumstances. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rosenberry, 45 Ark. 256, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 122; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Atchison, 47 Ark. 74, 14 S. W. 468, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 136.

And in Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Randolph, 53 Ill. 510, 5 Am. Rep. 60, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 574, where a passenger boarded a freight train, desiring to go to a station at which such train stopped only as transportation of stock or freight might require, in holding the railroad company not liable for failure to stop at such point, there being no stock at that place for shipment, the court said that it is but reasonable that a railroad company may exclude all passengers from such trains or only carry them to places at which they are accustomed to stop; and if a person gets upon such a train without any agreement that it will stop at an unusual place of stopping, he cannot require the company to change the usual course of its business for his accommodation and to serve his convenience. Should a person get on such a train without the consent of the employees of the road, the taking up of his ticket merely, without an agreement to stop at the desired station, would not amount to an undertaking by the company to put him off at that place. In such a case the passenger is in the wrong and has no right to insist that he be safely put off at the point he desires, or be carried without further charge.

Also in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Byas, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 572, 29 S. W. 1122, action for refusal to stop at place of destination of one who boarded a through special excursion train by mistake, which left at about the same time as the regular passenger train, a charge that it was the duty of the railroad company to stop its train at such point in any event was held incorrect, as, although it was the duty of the railroad company to stop its train at each station a sufficient time for passengers to alight, yet the com-as not to stop there for him to get off. However, he was mistaken in this, and was carried on past Elys to the next regular stopping place—Four Mile. There he voluntarily left the train and proceeded to walk the 2 miles back to Elys. He testifies that it was so dark that he could not see anything, and that he fell into a ditch and over some cross ties, and skinned his legs, and was badly injured; that the coach was very warm when he got off, and coming out in the cold air, and having to walk so far on the ice and sleet, he was chilled, and contracted a cold, and suffered greatly.

pany was permitted to run special excursion trains between two points without stopping at intermediate stations. The court stated: "The train upon which plaintiff traveled was not a regular passenger train; the defendant had not by running it undertaken that it should stop at all way stations. As it furnished a train for such passengers as plaintiff, it had the right to run a special train through without stopping unless by its conduct it had entitled plaintiff to demand that it should stop at his destination. If he was not informed and did not know of the difference between the two trains and was justified by the manner in which defendant managed its train at Houston, in believing that the train which he entered was a proper one upon which he was to be carried, we are of the opinion that he had the right to expect defendant to let him off at his destination, and in case of his failure to do so to recover such damages as resulted to him therefrom. And his rights would, we think, be the same if the officers in the train recognized him as a passenger to Harrisburg by taking up his ticket and promising to put him off there and failed to do so though he may have entered the cars with knowledge of the character of the trains. Or whether he was misled by defendant's conduct or not, if he entered the train believing in good faith that it was the regular passenger train, or that it was to stop at his destination, and if defendant's servants learned of his presence in the train and his destination before passing Harrisburg, they were bound to treat him as a passenger, and if Harrisburg was the first station passed after defendant's servants learned of plaintiff's mistake under such circumstances we think it would be required to put him off there. But if, when he entered the train, he was informed or knew the train was a special one which did not stop at Harrisburg, and if there was no such recognition of his right as a passenger by the employees on the train as is above supposed, he had no right to demand that those operating the train should stop to let him get off. The charge assumed that he was entitled to have the train stop in any event, and hence was erroneous."

1. It has been held that a carrier has a right to make and enforce reasonable rules and regulations for the operation of its trains, that it is the duty of a person proposing to become a passenger to ascertain before boarding the train whether it stops at his destination, and that a passenger who boards a train not scheduled to stop at the station to which he desires to go cannot recover damages for the failure of the conductor to stop thereat. In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Miles, 100 Ky. 84, 37 S. W. 486, it was said that "if it be within the power of a passenger by getting aboard of a train to compel it to stop at any station he may on a railroad company to carry a holder on any passenger train that does not, in accordance with the public running arrangements of the company, stop at the place named, and to stop there contrary to those arrangements to discharge him. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Swarthout, 67 Ind. 567, 33 Am. Rep. 104. The court stated that the words were probably intended to prevent any implication that the company was bound to carry the holder on freight trains, or anything but passenger trains.

But in Hutchinson v. Southern R. Co. 140 N. C. 123, 52 S. E. 263, 6 Ann. Cas. 22, one who boarded a train not scheduled to stop at her station was held entitled to recover damages for failure of the conductor to stop at such point, on the ground that the defendant failed in its duty to have someone at the gate to examine the tickets, and prevent anyone from boarding the train for a station at which the train was not scheduled to stop. The court said: "There was nothing on the face of her ticket to show that it was not good on that train. It was the duty of the defendant to have had an agent at the gate (as is usual) to examine the tickets and allow no one to get upon a train which does not stop at his destination. Not having done this, but having received the plaintiff into this train without objection, with a ticket calling for Liberty, a regular station, as her destination, and she not knowing that this train did not stop there, it was the duty of the defendant to stop the train at that point for her." The court further said that if the plaintiff had been aware that the train did not stop at her station she could not complain if she had been put off at the first stop, with her ticket indorsed with leave to pursue her journey by the next train stopping at her destination; but that she testified that she had no such information, and, on the contrary, that she had twice in eighteen months previously been on the same train, which stopped and put her off at Liberty; and that the notice on the printed schedule of the company was not brought home to her, and there was no evidence that she had any actual notice that the train did not stop there. This case, in holding that the railroad company was bound to stop its train at the passenger's destination although it was not scheduled to stop at that designate, then the authority of the company to make reasonable rules for the conduct of its business and the running of its train is destroyed, the traveling public would be seriously interrupted, a railroad could no longer calculate upon its trains making certain connections with trains on other roads, and the hazard of operating them would be increased."

The rule stated in that case, however, is subject to the limitation expressed later in the opinion in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott, 141 Ky. 538, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 206, 133 S. W. 800, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 547, where-in it was held that a railroad company is place, seems to be out of harmony with the decisions of analogous cases, as where one has been misdirected, and where it is held that the railroad company was not bound to stop its train, but that the passenger had an action for breach of contract to carry, or in tort for negligence in misdirecting.

And it has been held that where a passenger boards a train, his destination being a station at which the train is not scheduled to stop, and to which station no tickets are sold for such train, but his fare to such station is received by the conductor, he may recover for injuries sustained as a result of failure to stop the train sufficient time to allow him to alight, where it is shown that while not scheduled to stop at the station, the train is required by law to stop at a railway intersection 500 feet beyond; that passengers had for several years been received on this train to be carried to such station, the conductor collecting the fare to such place, and they being in the habit of getting off at the place where the train stopped before reaching the intersection, which at times was at the station platform, and in reliance on such custom and on the fact that the train came to a full stop, the injured passenger attempted to alight. McNulta v. Ensich, 134 Ill. 46, 24 N. E. 631, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 675. It may be stated that the defendant laid no particular stress on the fact that the passenger had boarded a train not scheduled to stop at his destination, but based its nonliability on the fact that the train stopped beyond the station, where passengers alighted with safety, and that the plaintiff should have waited until the train reached such place; but the court based the liability on the fact that at the time the conductor received the fare the passenger should have been notified that no stop would be made at the station, and in the absence of such notification and because of the fact that the train slackened its speed before reaching the station platform and finally stopped at it, the passenger was justified in believing that that was the place for him to alight.

A railroad company which sells a ticket to a certain place does not enter into a con-ordinarily bound by the act of its ticket agent in agreeing with or informing the purchaser of a ticket to a certain station that the train proposed by the passenger to be taken will stop at the station for the purpose of permitting the passenger to alight thereat.

2. In the case at bar Gaddie had no information from or agreement with any ticket agent that the train he boarded would stop at Elys; but he claims and testified that, when the train upon which he took passage at Corbin was announced, he went through the gate through which all passengers were required to pass in order to reach tract with the one purchasing and accepting such ticket that such person will be carried to the place indicated on the ticket on a train which does not stop, under the rules and regulations of the railroad company, at such place. Usher v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Kan. 375, 80 Pac. 956.

So, also, a railroad company by selling a ticket to a certain point does not obligate itself to stop a through express at the latter station, nor is the sale of a ticket in itself an assurance that the purchaser will be carried through to his destination on a through express without change of cars. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Cameron, 14 C. C. A. 358, 32 U. S. App. 67, 66 Fed. 709.

And the fact that a ticket was sold to one and he is permitted to enter the cars of a train which does not stop at his destination does not require that the train be stopped at such place, if it is not in accordance with the regulations of the company to stop there. Haskins v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 4 Ohio L. J. 961.

A sale of a ticket as a train is approaching is not a representation that that train will stop at the station for which the ticket was purchased. Duling v. Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. 66 Md. 120, 6 Atl. 592.

Nor is the fact that the ticket is marked "For this day and train only" a representation that that train will stop at the place for which the ticket was purchased. Ibid.

And in Noble v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 4 Okla. 534, 46 Pac. 483, it was held that the fact that one asked a ticket agent when a certain train was due, and, upon being informed that it would arrive in a few minutes, asked for a ticket to a certain place at which the train by its schedule did not stop, will not, where such person boarded the train and was ejected upon his refusal to pay fare to the first regular stop of the train, entitle him to an action to recover damages, based on the ground that he was misled or misinformed by the agent, or that a special agreement was made by the railroad company through its agent by which he was to be put off at the station to which he had purchased the ticket. The court stated that in order to sustain this contention it is necessary that it should clearly appear in the evidence that it was the intention of the passenger to take the through the train; that the gateman called for the exhibition of tickets; that he held his ticket up, and the gateman pointed and called out the number of the track on which was standing the train which he boarded. He further testified that, as he was about to step on the train, the brakeman asked him where he was going, and he replied that he was going to Elys, and went on in the train without objection upon the part of the brakeman. Because of these facts it is contended that it was the contractual duty of the company to stop the train at Elys.

The greater weight of authority supports the rule that where a passenger, by reason of incorrect information of the carrier's employees, boards a train not scheduled to stop at the station for which he has a ticket and to which he desires to go, the carrier has a right to correct the mistake, and to require the passenger to alight at a regular stopping place, which is a suitable place, from which he may take the next regular train that does stop at his destination; and that it is the duty of the passenger to stop off at such place and wait for such train. Carter v. Southern R. Co. 75 S. C. 355, 55 S. E. 771; Black v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 82 S. C. 478, 64 S. E. 418; Runyon v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 74 N. J. L.

train then due in eight or ten minutes, which, by the regulations of the company, did not stop at his destination, and that it was not his intention to wait from that time until an hour later, and take the local train, which, by the regulations of the company, did stop at his destination, and that at the time the agent of the company knew that such was the intention of the passenger, and that the agent consented to this arrangement and that the regulations of the company should be waived to suit this proposition and purpose of the passenger; and it must also specifically and clearly appear that the passenger acted upon the agreement thus intentionally and knowingly made between the agent of the company and himself. It must also appear that the passenger was himself in the exercise of due care in making this agreement, and that he had taken pains to inform himself that the through passenger train which he took did or did not, under the regulations of the company, stop at his destination, and that the agent of the railroad company was fully aware and knew by what transpired between them at the time that it was the intention of the passenger to take the through passenger train, and that the agent understood it to be agreed upon between them that that train should stop at his destination.

But in Texas & P. R. Co. v. Cole, 66 Tex. 562, 1 S. W. 629 (action to recover damages for physical and mental suffering resulting from walking to destination where one who boarded a train which did not stop at her destination was carried to the first stopping place beyond such destination, the conductor refusing to stop at the place for which she had a ticket), although the verdict for the plaintiff was reversed on the ground that the injuries were proximately caused by the passenger's own negligence, yet the court, in the course of its opinion, stated that the railroad company's first breach of duty toward such passenger was in selling her a ticket to her destination when the train did not stop at that place, and that this was the foundation upon which her right of recovery rested. There is nothing in the opinion to indicate as to why the court thought that the ticket agent should not have sold the ticket, and the only way to harmonize this statement with decisions in L.R.A.1915D.

similar cases would be to assume that from the time the train went, and other circumstances surrounding the purchase of the ticket, the ticket agent should have known that the purchaser intended to take that train, and should have advised her that she could not reach her destination by such train, and should have refused to sell her a ticket for that place if he knew that she was going to take that train with the thought of alighting at such place.

—effect of misdirection of ticket agent.

In Marshall v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. 78 Mo. 610, where one, at the direction of the ticket agent, boarded a train which did not stop at her destination, and was carried to the first stopping station beyond, it was held that an action for damages predicated on the conductor's refusal to stop the train at her destination could not be maintained, but that the action should be predicated on the negligent misdirection of the ticket agent. The court stated that the conductor was not guilty of negligence in refusing to stop his train at the passenger's destination, for he was forbidden to do so by the rules of the company; and if he had stopped there in violation of his duty and the regulations of the company, and injury had resulted to anyone from such violation of duty, the company would have been held liable therefor. If the conductor of a through train, which, by the regulations of the company, is permitted to stop only at a few important stations on its transit, can be required to stop his train at any way station on the statement of a passenger that he was informed by some agent of the company authorized to give such information that the train would stop at such station, and that he had been directed to take that train, the movement of such train would virtually be withdrawn from the control of the company, and placed under the control of the passengers; and in lieu of that precision, regularity, and security which should be required in the management of passenger trains, only uncertainty, irregularity, and insecurity would prevail. In many instances the conductor would have no means of testing the good faith of the representations made to him by the passenger, and he would have to Pierce*, 47 Mich. 277, 11 N. W. 157; Turner v. McCook, 77 Mo. App. 198; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Wallace, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 312, 74 S. W. 581; St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Townsend, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 616, 101 S. W. 455. This we think to be a sound rule of law.

We do not mean to be understood, however, as holding that when the passenger, at the time he purchases his ticket, is informed by the ticket agent that the train he proposes to take will stop at his destination to permit him to alight, although it is not a regular scheduled stop for such train, the carrier may correct such error, and the passenger be required to alight at an intermediate station, for the carrier in such case has made its contract, and that contract the passenger has a right to enforce. But, where no specific agreement for such stopping of the train is clearly shown to have been effected at the time of the purchase of the ticket, then the mere act of a gateman or brakeman, in making no objections to the boarding of the train by the passenger, ought not and will not estop act blindly at the risk of injury to his master and to the passengers committed to his care. When any servant of a railroad company having the requisite authority misdirects a passenger to his injury, the company should be responsible therefor; but in an action for such injury the petition should be founded upon such misdirection.

In Carter v. Southern R. Co. 75 S. C. 355, 55 S. E. 771, action to recover damages alleged to have resulted from the refusal of the conductor to stop his train, which had been boarded through inadvertent misdirection of the ticket agent, at an unscheduled stop, it was held that while a railroad company will be liable for damages resulting from misdirection of a ticket agent, yet where a passenger refuses to get off at a station preceding her destination, where a local train could be taken to such destination a few hours later, and, insisting on the train stopping at her destination, is carried on and gets off at the first regular stop beyond her destination, which necessitates a walk back of several miles over a rough mountain trail, through heat and storm,—damages for sickness and injury resulting from such walk could not be recovered. The court said: "Assuming, then, that the plaintiff's being on the wrong train was due to the mistake of the railroad company, and not to any fault of her own, what were the relative duties in these circumstances of the railroad company and the passenger? Ordinarily the duty of a railroad company is to stop its train to let off passengers at stations to which it has undertaken to carry them. But where, as in this case, a passenger is on a train by the mistake of a ticket agent, which, under the rules of the company, does not stop at the station called for by his ticket, the prompt and safe transportation of other passengers is also to be considered by the conductor in deciding whether he will adhere to his schedule or stop for the particular passenger; and if, in good faith, he decides it to be his duty not to stop, then it is the duty of the railroad company to correct the mistake of the ticket agent as far as practicable with the least possible damage and inconvenience to the passenger, and to compensate the passenger for such damage as resulted from the mistake as the proximate cause. L.R.A.1915D.

The duty of a passenger in the situation of the plaintiff is to use all reasonable means known to herself or suggested by the conductor to minimize her damage, especially when it is conceded, as in this case, that the fault alleged against the ticket agent in misleading the passenger was due to inadvertence; and the passenger cannot recover for loss or injury which could have been avoided by the use of such means. . . .

In the application of this principle of the right and duty of the carrier to correct its mistake and of the duty of the passenger to minimize the damage, as a general rule where a passenger, on account of the mistake of the carrier's agent, boards a train not scheduled to stop at his station, the carrier has a right to correct the mistake by letting the passenger off at a stopping place of that train before passing the passenger's destination, so that he may take the next train scheduled to stop at his destination; and it is the duty of the passenger to stop off and wait for such train. . . . In such cases, however, the common carrier is, of course, liable for any damage or loss of time resulting from the passenger's stopping off which would not have been incident to waiting for the local train at the point where the passenger had to commence his journey." The court distinguished this case from Richardson v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 71 S. C. 445, 51 S. E. 261, stating that in the Richardson Case the conductor not only refused to stop at the passenger's destination, but demanded of the passenger additional fare to the stop beyond, which was the only stop anywhere in the vicinity of his destination, and upon the passenger's refusal to pay, stopped the train and put him off against his will, as a trespasser.

In Humphries v. Illinois C. R. Co. 70 Miss. 453, 12 So. 155, action to recover damages alleged to be the result of refusal to stop through train at passenger's destination, it was held to be a question for the jury as to whether there was a special contract to stop the train at such place, where there was evidence that a ticket agent sold the ticket knowing it was to be used for such train, and there was also some evidence that the train would customarily stop there for the purpose of allowing interstate passengers to alight.

the company from a correction of the error by the conductor requiring the passenger to leave the train at a suitable intermediate point, there to wait for and take passage upon a train which does stop at the passenger's destination. Nor do we hold that where a passenger makes inquiry of the gatekeeper, or those in charge of the train, as to the train he should take, and, acting under their directions, is caused to board the wrong car, that he cannot recover for lost time and increased expenses necessarily incurred by reason of such incorrect information. This question is not before us here.

What we do hold is that, under the circumstances testified to by plaintiff, the defendant owed plaintiff no duty to stop its fast train at Elys for the purpose of letting him off. It was his duty, when informed by the conductor that the train would not stop at Elys, to elect to stop at some one of the intermediate stations at which the train would stop before reaching Elys, and this he refused to do, and he has no cause of action against the defendant. The court improperly refused to instruct the jury to find for the defendant.

The judgment is reversed, for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

—effect of agreement of conductor to stop train.

Regulations as to the running and stopping of trains are absolutely necessary for the transaction of the company's business and for the safety of the employees and passengers; and their violation at the will of the employee or for the convenience of the passenger ought not to be tolerated. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Ludlam, 6 C. C. A. 454, 13 U. S. App. 540, 57 Fed. 481.

So, the conductor cannot bind the company by a promise to stop a train at a place where, by the rules and regulations of the company, it is not permitted to stop. Schiffler v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 96 Wis. 141, 65 Am. St. Rep. 35, 71 N. W. 97, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 121.

And the fact that a conductor takes a passenger's ticket and agrees to let him off at his place of destination as indicated thereby will not bind the company to stop the train at that station, contrary to its rules and regulations. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Hatton, 60 Ind. 12. The court said: "It is not competent, we think, for a conductor to agree with an individual passenger to carry him to a given place, and stop at that place to allow him to leave the train, and thus bind the railroad company, unless the place at which he is to stop is a regular station of the train which he is conducting. Such a power cannot be implied as within the proper duties of a conductor; nor would it be consistent with public policy. A railroad company that holds itself out to the public as a common carrier of passengers, establishes its routes and stations, and advertises its running arrangements, thereby pledges itself to the public to run accordingly; and if it was in the power of a conductor to stop at different stations from those established for the lines, or alter the running arrangement of the road, to accommodate a particular passenger, he would thereby greatly incommode the public generally, for the sake of a single passenger. The duty of a conductor is to run the trains according to the public arrangements, and he has no power to change them; and a passenger has no right to infer that a conductor has any such power from his general duties as a conductor, and no reason to suppose I.R.A.1915D.

that he could bind the railroad company by any such agreement."

And especially where the passenger must have known that the conductor had no power to make such an agreement from the fact that before the train started the conductor informed the passengers that the train did not stop at that station, and could not stop there, and it was also shown that on the passenger's ticket it was stated that it was "good only on trains stopping at stations named." Ibid.

A passenger who contracts with a railroad conductor to be left at a station at which such conductor's train is not scheduled to stop, after having been notified, by being refused a ticket for passage to such station by that train, that it was against the rules for the conductor to stop there, cannot recover damages from the company if the conductor breaks the contract and carries him past the station; at least, where other trains are provided by which such station could be reached. Alabama G. S. R. Co. v. Carmichael, 90 Ala. 19, 9 L.R.A. 388, 8 So. 87.

But where a passenger by mistake boards a train which does not stop at his destination, the conductor's agreement to put him off at such place will bind the company where there is evidence that though by the rules and regulations of the company the train was not permitted to stop there, the conductor frequently did stop the train there to let passengers off. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Elliott, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 31, 54 S. W. 410.

The taking of a ticket or fare by the conductor does not constitute a binding contract upon the company to stop the train at the point of destination mentioned in the ticket. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rosenberry, 45 Ark. 256, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 122; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Randolph, 53 Ill. 510, 5 Am. Rep. 60, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 574; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Atchison, 47 Ark. 74, 14 S. W. 468, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 136; Haskins v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 4 Ohio L. J. 951; Trotlinger v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. 11 Lea, 533.

So, the fact that a passenger who has boarded a train which does not stop at his destination succeeds in getting his ticket into the hands of the conductor, and then, after the latter has found where he wishes to get off, refuses to take it back, adds nothing to the merits of the passenger's case in an action against the company for damages for refusal of the conductor to stop at the place of destination. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Applewhite, 52 Ind. 540.

But, on collecting fare to a station at which a train is not scheduled to stop, it becomes the duty of the conductor to notify the passenger so paying that the train will not stop at that station, or to carry him to such station and then give him sufficient time to get off in safety. McNulta v. Ensich, 134 Ill. 46, 24 N. E. 631, 2 Am. Neg. Cas. 675.

Right to eject.

A passenger who boards a train which does not stop at his destination may, when his mistake is discovered, be required to leave the train at the first regular stopping place unless, after the mistake is discovered, the railroad company's agents do something which precludes them from enforcing the privilege they had of compelling such passenger to leave the train short of his destination. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Campbell, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 35, 69 S. W. 451.

One who, without being misled in any way, boards a train which does not stop at her destination, may be required to alight at any regular stopping place where she can get a train to her destination, and the company will not be liable. Plott v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 63 Wis. 511, 23 N. W. 412.

So, one who is required to transfer at an intermediate station to an accommodation train cannot recover as for a breach by the railroad company of its duty to permit him to remain on the train until the place to which he had a ticket was reached. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Thomason, 6 Ala. App. 365, 60 So. 506.

So, also, one who is forced to leave at another place cannot recover for a wrongful ejection, in the absence of showing that needless force was used. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Bills, 104 Ind. 13, 3 N. E. 611.

One who is on a train which does not stop at his destination, he knowing that fact when he boarded the train, may be ejected at any reasonably safe place between stations; the company is not required to carry him to the next station, or to the next highway, or the next place that would be convenient for him to get off. New York, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Willing, 24 Ohio C. C. 474. The court stated that he has no claims upon the company; he is not paying for his transportation; he is a trespasser upon the train, and they have a right to relieve themselves of him as speedily as possible, but without exposing him to any unusual or extraordinary dangers. The mere fact of putting him off the train on the railroad track or within the right of way, in the night, if he is unlawfully on the train, is L.R.A.1915D.

not exposing him to unusual or extraordinary peril.

A railroad company may discontinue or suspend the right of passengers to ride on freight trains to a certain station whenever there is necessity for handling freight there, and a passenger notified either under this right or in the customary manner that the train would make no stop is in duty bound to leave the train, and if he does not he can be lawfully ejected. Wieland v. Southern P. Co. 1 Cal. App. 343, 82 Pac. 226.

A passenger who refuses to pay fare to the first place at which the train regularly stops beyond the place at which the passenger wishes to alight, and at which the train does not stop, may be lawfully ejected before his destination is reached, at the regular stopping place nearest thereto. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Maxwell, — Ala., —, 66 So. 669; Logan v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 77 Mo. 663; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Dice, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 168 S. W. 478.

And there is not a denial of a complete performance of contract to carry a passenger to his destination where his ticket is given back to him with an indorsement thereon showing that he has a right to proceed to the station indicated thereby on a train which stops at such station. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Maxwell, supra.

Under a statute requiring a railroad company to stop a train at a junction point to permit passengers to be transferred, the company is under no duty to stop the train at such point unless there is a passenger to be transferred; and so, where, under the rules and regulations of the railroad company, a train will not stop at a junction point unless there are passengers to be transferred to another road, one whose destination is such point cannot require the train to be stopped where there are no passengers to be transferred, and, on refusal to pay fare to the first stopping place beyond, may be lawfully ejected before such place is reached, at the nearest regular stopping place thereto. Logan v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 77 Mo. 663.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moore, 98 Tex. 302, 83 S. W. 362, 4 Ann. Cas. 770, a passenger boarded a train which, under the regulations of the railroad company, stopped at his destination only to permit passengers coming from connecting lines to alight, and was required to leave at the first regular stopping station of his train. In an action to recover damages for refusal to carry him to his destination, brought on the theory that the regulation which allowed passengers coming to the defendant's line from other roads to get off at all stations, while denying the same privilege to those traveling entirely on its own line, gave to the former an "undue and unreasonable preference or advantage," and subjected the latter to "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage," and denied to the latter "reasonable, proper, and equal facilities," within the meaning of the interstate commerce law, the court refused to decide whether the statute, if applicable, had that effect, as in any event the action could not be sustained in the state court, as, by the terms of the act, it could be enforced only in the United States courts or before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The conductor is under no obligation to take the first opportunity to inform a passenger who has gotten on a train not scheduled to stop at his destination without previously informing himself, when, where, and how he can go or stop, that the train does not stop at the station to which he is destined, so that he can exercise the right to leave the train at any station he chooses before reaching the destination named in his ticket. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Ludlam, 6 C. C. A. 454, 13 U. S. App. 540, 57 Fed. 481. The court stated that the conductor on a train has many and various duties to perform, all under the regulations of the company which he is serving, and without proof to show that he is authorized to vary the rules of the company in regard to the stopping of his train at a station not permitted under the rules, his mere silence under such circumstances cannot vary the obligation of the company in respect to the contract of carriage.

Where the first regular stop of the train is beyond the passenger's destination, he may be ejected upon refusing to pay fare to that place. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lightcap, 7 Ind. App. 249, 34 N. E. 243; Usher v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 71 Kan. 375, 80 Pac. 956; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gants, 38 Kan. 608, 5 Am. St. Rep. 780, 17 Pac. 54; Flood v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2135, 80 S. W. 184; Fink v. Albany & S. R. Co. 4 Lans. 147; Albin v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 43 Tex. Civ. App. 170, 95 S. W. 589.

In such case he becomes a trespasser. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gants, 38 Kan. 608, 5 Am. St. Rep. 780, 17 Pac. 54; Flood v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. 25 Ky. L. Rep. 2135, 80 S. W. 184.

And is none the less a trespasser although he tenders a fare, if it is one that the conductor is not authorized to receive, or offers to pay fare only to a station for which the train does not receive passengers. Flood v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. supra.

Where one boards a train which is not scheduled to stop at his destination, he may be required to pay his fare to the first regular stop, and on refusal be ejected.

And the mere fact that the train was required by law to stop and did stop at such place on account of railroad crossings, will not give the passenger a right of action for alleged wrongful demanding and receiving of fare to the first regular stop, and the resulting injury to his feelings, Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lightcap, 7 Ind. App. 249, 34 N. E. 243.

And he may be ejected between stations. Albin v. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. 43 Tex. Civ. App. 170, 95 S. W. 589.

And he may be lawfully ejected between stations although such train occasionally stops at the point of his destination, as to receive or let off passengers destined for a L.R.A.1915D.

certain place, and especially where, on the day in question, the train conductor informed such passenger that the train would not stop at that place, and, according to the evidence, it did not stop there. Fink v. Albany & S. R. Co. 4 Lans. 147.

A passenger purchasing a ticket for transportation to a station on the carrier's line contracts to take his passage on a train scheduled to stop at that point. Hancock v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 27 Ky. L. Rep. 434, 85 S. W. 210.

So, an action does not lie against a railroad company for refusal to take one to his destination on its fast train, where he boarded a train which did not stop at the place for which he purchased a ticket, and did not offer to pay a full fare to a place where the train did stop, although he did offer to surrender the ticket and pay the additional amount to such stopping place, the court stating that the conductor had no right to accept such ticket for any purpose, it being to a place at which the train did not stop. Ibid.

A railroad company may eject between stations one who has boarded a train which does not stop at his destination, and who refuses to pay fare to the first regular stop, which is beyond the place of his destination, and need not wait until the distance covered by the ticket has been traveled. Caldwell v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 467. Otherwise, as the court said, a passenger can compel the company to accept one of two courses: either to stop at the place of destination, which is just what is desired, or carry him further, over a distance for which he refuses to pay fare. If one by his own wrong or by his own mistake may compel the stopping of a train at a place not a regular stopping place for that train, one or more persons may take passage on the same train, desiring to stop at each station on the road, and upon tendering tickets for the respective stations, and refusing to pay beyond them, force the company to make the train an accommodation train, to the prejudice of its rights and the comfort of the general traveling public.

But an expulsion at a station before reaching the place of a passenger's destination, on the ground that the train did not stop at such place, is unlawful, although, before purchasing his ticket, the passenger knew that the railroad company had promulgated a rule prohibiting that train from stopping at such place, if, by continuous nonenforcement of the rule, the company had permitted it to become obsolete, or if the passenger was misled by the conduct of the company's ticket agent and conductor, and thereby induced to believe that the train would stop at such place. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Herring. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 130 S. W. 1039.

And in Pennsylvania Co. v. Wentz, 37 Ohio St. 333, where one boarded a train which did not stop at his destination, and on refusal to pay fare to a point beyond his destination, the first stopping place of the train, was ejected between stations, it was held that, in view of a statute that required all trains to stop at all stations containing three thousand inhabitants, it was no defense to an action for ejection that, by the rules and regulations of the company, the train did not stop at the destination of such person, as such place contained over three thousand inhabitants.

And the court stated further that even laying out of view the statute, it was difficult to maintain the proposition that the ejection was justifiable where it was not at a station nor at any habitation, but in or near a woodland, and the time was 1 o'clock at night. Ibid.

One purchasing a round-trip railroad ticket good only on the day of purchase may recover damages in case he is ejected from the only train passing his station on its return trip on that day, for the reason that the ticket is not good on that train, because the train is not scheduled to stop at that station. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Harris, 81 Miss. 208, 59 L.R.A. 742, 95 Am. St. Rep. 466, 32 So. 309.

And a statement by the agent when selling the ticket that in case the only train returning that day is late, the purchaser may have difficulty in getting it to stop to let him off, has no effect upon his rights under the contract. Ibid.

Nor is the right to return upon that train affected by the statement of a flagman, when the holder of a round-trip ticket attempts to board the train, that it does not stop at his destination, and his agreement to leave the train at the last stop before his destination. Ibid.

One who boards a train which does not stop at the place of his destination, he having been prevented from ascertaining that fact because the ticket office was closed, is entitled, upon offering to pay fare to the first regular stop, to remain on the train as a passenger; and so a refusal by the conductor to receive the fare to such place, and requiring that he leave the train at night in a dangerous place, away from any dwelling, station, or stopping place, constitutes a wrongful ejection for which the railroad company is liable. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Norris, 17 Ind. App. 189, 60 Am. St. Rep. 166, 46 S. E. 554, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 579.

And one who boarded a train which did not stop at his destination was held in Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Ashby, 79 Va. 130, 52 Am. Rep. 620, to have been wrongfully ejected and entitled to recover damages therefor where the conductor refused to permit him to ride on such ticket to the first regular stopping place of the train, which was short of his destination, and stopped the train in a low swamp, late in the afternoon, when night was coming on, with no habitation near, and put him off, in the midst of a drizzling rain, in an eastern blow or a northeastern storm, though he was sick with malarial fever.

So, also, in Stevens v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 1 Mo. App. Rep. 247, it was held that under a rule of the railroad company that if a passenger got aboard a train which did not stop at his destination, he should be put off either at the station where he got aboard, or at the first station at which the train stopped, an ejection at a point other than a station or a regular stopping place was wrongful, and the company was liable, although, as in this case, the place at which he was forced to alight was only 1½ miles from the place where he boarded the train. The opinion does not disclose as to whether the conductor demanded fare to the nearest stopping place, and he attempted to justify the ejection on the ground that, under the rule mentioned, he had a right to expel such a person while near to or in the vicinity of the station, although not immediately thereafter; but this was held to be untenable.

One who boards a train which he should know does not stop at a station for which he has a ticket, in the hope that it will do so, and so afford him an opportunity of reaching his destination, and who refuses to pay the additional fare to the first stopping place upon the conductor's demand, is a passenger within the meaning of a statute requiring the ejection of passengers at usual stopping places. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Harper, 69 Ark. 186, 53 L.R.A. 220, 86 Am. St. Rep. 190, 61 S. W. 911.

Although a conductor may require a passenger who boards a train which does not stop at his destination to leave the train at a regular stop prior to reaching such destination, or pay fare to a regular stop beyond, yet, if he uses language which imputes a falsehood to such passenger and also disgraceful conduct, which humiliates and distresses the passenger, damages may be recovered therefor. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Morgan, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 138 S. W. 216.

—where passenger is misdirected by employee of carrier.

In cases where the passenger relied upon a misdirection by a ticket agent or other employee of the carrier, the first question in logical order is whether the passenger had a right to rely upon such misdirection; or, in another form, whether the carrier is responsible for the misdirection. That question, so far as misdirection by ticket agents is concerned, is discussed in the note to Hayes v. Wabash R. Co. 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 232. As shown in that note, the general rule seems to be that a carrier will be bound by representations made by its ticket agent as to the stoppage of a train at the passenger's station; and most of the cases cited under the present heading, whether involving misrepresentations by ticket agents or other employees, seem to proceed upon that assumption.

But in Wells v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. 67 Miss. 24, 6 So. 737, it was held in effect that a passenger, in taking a train that did not stop at her destination, acted at her own peril, it appearing that before embarking she twice applied to the ticket agent to purchase a ticket to such destination, but was refused because the train did not stop there, notwithstanding that she was directed by the station policeman to board the train, and the conductor collected a fare which was the proper amount for transportation to her destination, but was also proper for the nearest stopping place.

Assuming, however, that the passenger was entitled to rely upon the misrepresentation by the ticket agent or other employee, it is clear that he has some right or remedy against the carrier in the event of its failure to discharge him at his destination, but there is a conflict of opinion as to the character and extent of that right or remedy. Some of the cases—and considering only those within the scope of the present note, they are perhaps in the majority—take the view that even when the passenger has been misdirected by an employee for whose act the carrier is responsible, nevertheless it is the passenger's duty, at the request of the conductor, to leave the train at the first station before reaching his destination, or to pay his fare to the first station beyond such destination, and that in the event of his refusal to do so, he may be ejected, without unnecessary force, and if so ejected, will have no right of action as for a wrongful ejection, his remedy in such event being confined to an action for breach of the contract, or at least an action based upon the misdirection rather than upon a wrongful ejection. Other cases, however, as subsequently shown, take the view that while the company would have no right to complain of the conductor's act in ejecting the passenger in such circumstances, the ejection is nevertheless wrongful as between the carrier and the passenger, and the latter may complain of it as such. It may be noted here that a similar conflict of authority exists as to the right and duty of a passenger when, through the fault of other employees of the carrier, he is unable to present to the conductor the proper token of his right to transportation. See notes in 43 L.R.A. 706; 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 695; and 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 779.

As to the duty of passenger to pay fare wrongfully demanded, in order to avoid expulsion and lessen damages, see notes to Sprenger v. Tacoma Traction Co. 43 L.R.A. 706, and Light v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 282.

The case of a passenger on a wrong train through misdirection by an employee for whose act the carrier is responsible may perhaps be distinguished so far as the question under discussion is concerned, from the case of a passenger who, through the fault of an employee of the carrier, has not the proper ticket or token of the right to transportation. In the former case, compliance with the passenger's demand that he be discharged at his destination would necessitate an interruption of the regular train schedule and involve perhaps risks of accident or delay that the carrier ought not to assume; whereas in the latter case, compliance with the passenger's demand would at most merely involve the risk of a loss of fare in the event that the passenger's claim is false or mistaken.

That an action for wrongful ejection will lie where one boards train in reliance on the information of the ticket agent that the train will stop at his destination, and is required to leave before such point is reached, was held in Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. v. Little, 66 Kan. 378, 61 L.R.A. 122, 97 Am. St. Rep. 376, 71 Pac. 820, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 524; Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Roberts, 91 Ga. 513, 18 S. E. 317; Atkinson v. Southern R. Co. 114 Ga. 146, 55 L.R.A. 223, 39 S. E. 888, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 32; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 55 Ohio St. 370, 60 Am. St. Rep. 706, 45 Atl. 712.

Unless he knew or had reason to believe that the information given him by the ticket agent was incorrect, or that there was a rule or regulation of the company making the agent incompetent to give the information, or prohibiting the conductor from stopping the train at that station. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Roberts, 91 Ga. 513, 18 S. E. 317; Atkinson v. Southern R. Co. 114 Ga. 146, 55 L.R.A. 223, 39 S. E. 888.

So, also, one who, before purchasing a ticket, is told by the ticket agent that a specified train stops at a given place, and is given a time-table showing that such train is scheduled to stop, has by the contract a right to have the train stop at such place, and his ejection at the last preceding station is wrongful. McDonald v. Central R. Co. 72 N. J. L. 280, 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 505, 111 Am. St. Rep. 672, 62 Atl. 405, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 378.

And if a passenger is informed by a ticket agent at the time he purchases his ticket that he will reach his destination that night, and he boards the only train which passes his destination that night, is rightfully on board that train as a passenger for his destination, and his ejection before reaching his destination, upon refusal to pay fare to the first stop beyond, is unlawful, the rule of the company not to stop that particular train at his destination, whether reasonable or not, being subordinate to the rights of the passenger on board under a contract made under circumstances implying that the train would stop there. Richardson & Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 71 S. C. 444, 51 S. E. 261.

And in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Scott, 141 Ky. 538, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 206, 133 S. W. 800, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 547, it was held that if a ticket agent agreed with an excursion party that a through train would make an unscheduled stop, and in reliance on such agreement the party boarded such train expecting that it would stop at such station, they are entitled to compensatory damages at least for wrongful ejection where the conductor refused to stop the train at their destination, and required them to leave at the first regular stop preceding.

In Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Reynolds, 55 Ohio St. 370, 60 Am. St. Rep. 706, 45 Atl. 712, in denying the contention of the railroad company that the action should be for breach of contract, the court said: "There are some cases which seem to support the contention of the plaintiff in error, but they, as does the reasoning of the plaintiff in error, depend upon what seems to be an evident fallacy. They assume as a premise that the act of the conductor in putting the plaintiff off was rightful, and therefore the company cannot be held guilty of a tort. But the act of the conductor is immaterial except as it affects the liability of the company. The suit is not against him, but against the company. As between the conductor and the company, the latter may have no right to complain of him. He violated no duty he owed to the company. He simply obeyed his instructions as received from the company, applicable to such a case. Therefore, it may well be said that as between him and the company, the conduct of the conductor was rightful. But as between the company and the passenger, the question is wholly a different one. Where a company, by the act of a proper agent, causes a passenger, as in this case, to take the wrong train,—one that does not stop at his station,—it must be held to have contemplated that, under the instruction given its conductor, the passenger would be put off the train as soon as the error should be discovered by the conductor, unless he should, as demanded, pay additional fare and be carried beyond his station. The act of the first agent of the company, misdirecting the passenger, is the wrongful act for which the company becomes liable in tort, and the act of the conductor in ejecting him is a consequence of the first wrongful act,—is the proximate cause of the passenger being ejected; and as against the passenger, the act of the conductor in ejecting him, being the act of the company, is wrongful. The fallacy, as before stated, arises out of the mistaken assumption that the act of the conductor is rightful as against the passenger. This can in no instance be the case where the company is responsible for the mistake of the passenger in taking the wrong train. All the cases cited in support of the contention of the plaintiff in error, that in any way do so, are based on the fallacy that the conductor had the right to eject the passenger, when, as a matter of law, the real question is whether the act of the company, done by its agent, is rightful as against the ejected party. The question may be simplified by eliminating the fact of agency in each instance; that is, by supposing that the common carrier in each instance acts for himself or itself. Here no mind would doubt but that the carrier, having instructed the passengers to take one of his trains, with knowledge of his destination, would be a wrongdoer, should he, on discovering his own mistake, eject him from the train, on the ground that he had taken the wrong train. But the intervention of an agent, by whom the act is done in each instance, does not change the case. For each act of the agent, done in the scope of his agency, must be imputed to the principal,—is, in law, the act of the principal.”

On the other hand, it has been held that a passenger who has taken a train which is L.R.A.1915D.

not scheduled to stop at the station for which he holds a ticket, by reason of misinformation received from the agent from whom he had purchased his ticket, may be lawfully ejected at a regular station preceding his destination, where he has been notified by the conductor that the train does not stop at the point for which he holds a ticket, and requested that he leave the train at a stopping point short of his destination, but has refused to comply with the request. Runyon v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 74 N. J. L. 225, 68 Atl. 107. The court stated that the railroad company was under no obligation to stop its train at the passenger's destination, notwithstanding the representation made to him by the ticket agent, and it was the duty of such person when informed that the train would not stop at that station either to tender such fare as would entitle him to ride to some stopping point beyond, or else to comply with the request of the conductor, and change cars at a stopping point short of his destination; that in the operation of a railroad the safety of those traveling upon it requires that the trains running over it shall be moved according to a prearranged schedule, and this safeguard would be practically destroyed if a conductor was bound to stop his train at a station not a scheduled stopping point, whenever a passenger was wrongfully informed by a ticket agent that the train would take him to that station. The court added that the view expressed in the decisions of some jurisdictions, that misinformation as to the stopping of a train at a particular station, given by a ticket agent to an inquiring passenger, and acted upon by the latter, constitutes a contract between the railroad company and the passenger, had not been accepted by the courts of New Jersey. The court distinguished this case from McDonald v. Central R. Co. 72 N. J. L. 280, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, 111 Am. St. Rep. 672, 62 Atl. 405, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 378, stating that it lacked a vital element which was present in the McDonald Case; namely, the furnishing of a time-table by the railroad company's agent to the passenger, showing that the train concerning which he made inquiry was scheduled to stop at the station to which he purchased his ticket.

And in Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Pierce, 47 Mich. 277, 11 N. W. 157, a judgment predicated on wrongful expulsion was reversed. The court stated that having been informed by the ticket agent that such train stopped at his destination, if the passenger was not otherwise in fault in starting on the train, it was difficult to find any reason why the company should not carry him in some way to the place of his destination, as it had agreed to do; and he had in such case a right of action for such damages as a failure to perform that contract involved; that the company could not be justified in refusing to carry him to his destination, and to do so as agreed. But in holding that this did not necessarily give him a right to remain on the train after he had been told that it would not stop at his destination, the court said: "Whatever remedy he may have against the company for its breach of contract, he had no right to determine for himself on what train he would travel. The business of railroads can only be carried on safely by having regularity. If trains are arranged in a certain way, and their time fixed with regard to limited stoppages, a conductor would never be safe if he were bound at his peril to ascertain from any mere stranger the existence of an agreement by the company to change the arrangement and stop at an unusual place. A passenger cannot compel a conductor to deviate from his appointed scheme, and if truly informed concerning the rule as to stoppages, he is bound to conform his own movements to it, and seek redress in some other way. Everyone is bound to know that the conductor is not invested with general power to run his train as he pleases, and that so far as he is concerned the trains must conform to the schedule." The court added that the passenger ought to have left the train at a regular stopping place; and then, if not furnished with passage to his destination, the expense of such passage would be a proper element of damages in addition to such, if any, as were occasioned by the failure to take him through on the train which he was told he could take, and the consequent delay; that he ought to have known that if he persisted in remaining on the train the conductor would probably remove him, and such a removal was not a distinct wrong in itself, because, after leaving the regular stopping place, he was wrongfully on the train, and so could not recover damages unless for some unlawful violence beyond the necessity of the removal; because it was lawful to take such steps as were necessary to remove and keep him removed from the train. Thus, such an one cannot complain of an indignity which it is his duty to avoid incurring and which he is bound to expect, the company having power, subject to damages for any breach of contract involved, to determine for itself what trains shall take passengers to their destination.

Also in White v. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. 133 Ind. 480, 33 N. E. 273, it was held that an action for wrongful ejection based on a negligent misdirection of the ticket agent could not be maintained.

So, also, in Miller v. King, 21 App. Div. 192, 47 N. Y. Supp. 534, it was held that where a ticket is sold to an intending passenger by a ticket agent who erroneously informs the purchaser, prior to the issuance of the ticket, that the train will stop at his destination, and he boards such train relying on that statement, the railroad company is not bound to stop the train at that station when it is not scheduled to stop there, and the passenger may be properly ordered to leave the train at an intermediate stopping place, and the railroad company is only liable to the passenger for a breach of the contract to carry him to his destination.

And it may be assumed from the decision in Black v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 82 L.R.A.1915D.

S. C. 478, 64 S. E. 418, that an action for unlawful ejection could not be maintained, but that the action should be predicated on a breach of contract to carry.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Hassell, 62 Tex. 256, 50 Am. Rep. 525, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 514, it was held that one who boards a through train in reliance on the negligent information of the ticket agent that it would stop at his station must leave the train at a regular stop preceding his destination, and on refusal to do so may be ejected. Judgment for plaintiff, however, was affirmed on the ground that the manner of ejection was improper.

While a passenger has a right to rely upon information received from a ticket agent, when purchasing his ticket, as to matters relating to the places where the train upon which he desires to embark will stop, and to recover from the company all resulting damages in case he is misled without his own fault, he has no right to remain upon a train without paying additional fare, contrary to the rules of the company, after he has been notified that the train will not stop according to the information received from the ticket agent. The conductor cannot be required to deviate from the rules under which he is compelled to run his train, nor to run his train except in conformity to the schedule, which the law requires shall be posted up for the information of all, upon the statement by a passenger of information received from a ticket agent. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Bills, 118 Ind. 221, 20 N. E. 775. This being an action for wrongful ejection by use of excessive force, the remedy where a passenger is ejected without the use of force was not involved; but the court intimated that an action for damages in such a case should be based on the negligent misdirection of the ticket agent.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moorman, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 46 S. W. 662, action for damages sustained by being removed from train which was boarded in reliance upon the statement of the one in charge of the ticket office that it would stop at passenger's destination, judgment for plaintiff was affirmed. Although not so expressly stated, it is probable that the action was based on the negligent misdirection.

In International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kilgo, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 71 S. W. 556, action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by being forced to alight from train because it did not stop at passenger's destination, where it was alleged that the train was boarded on information of ticket agent that it would stop at such destination, an instruction was held erroneous which predicated a recovery entirely upon the contents of the ticket, and not upon the conversation of the passenger with the ticket agent.

A conductor has a right to refuse to stop a train at a station at which, under the rules and regulations of the company, it is not permitted to stop, although a passenger destined for such a station was directed by an employee of the company to take that train, and so, where a passenger, at the direction of an employee of the railroad company, boards a train which does not stop at his destination, and he is required to leave at the nearest regular stopping place before reaching such place of destination, action for wrongful ejection will not lie; but in such case, if damage results, it must be attributed to the misdirection. Sira v. Wabash R. Co. 115 Mo. 127, 37 Am. St. Rep. 318, 21 S. W. 905.

So where, through the negligent direction of the employees of a railroad company, a passenger boards a train which does not stop at his destination, and is ejected at a regular stopping place of the train, such passenger, though rightfully ejected under the rules of the company, has a right to sue the company for breach of contract to carry him to his place of destination, or for the tort,—the ejection from the train. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Spirk, 51 Neb. 167, 70 N. W. 926, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 400.

And one who boards a train which does not stop at his destination, though directed to take such train by a servant of the company, may be ejected by the conductor upon refusal to alight at the first regular stopping place of the train, and an action for ejection will not lie. Turner v. McCook, 77 Mo. App. 196. The court stated that where a ticket holder has purchased a ticket for passage, and through the negligent mistake or misdirection of a servant of the company, whose duty it is to direct passengers, enters a train which, under the rules of the company, does not stop at the station named in his ticket, he has no right to continue passage on that train after the conductor has given him notice that the train does not stop at the station to which he seeks passage, and has requested him to leave the train, and afforded him a reasonable opportunity to do so; and if he then persists in remaining, he is then wrongfully thereon, and the conductor, in the performance of his duty, may eject him if he acts in good faith and without malice, and uses no more force than is necessary for the purpose. If in such case damage results, it must be attributed to the negligent mistake or misdirection of the servant of the company.

One who has boarded a train which does not stop at his destination cannot recover as for wrongful ejection upon his refusal to pay fare to the first stopping place or to get off when the train has stopped at a suitable place, although such person was informed by the conductor of a connecting line or branch of the same railroad company that that train was the one which he should take to reach his destination. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Gants, 38 Kan. 608, 5 Am. St. Rep. 780, 17 Pac. 54.

And although one boards a train which does not stop at his destination, upon the advice of the conductor of another train, that if he boarded that train, having a ticket for a certain place, the conductor would have to stop and let him off, yet he may be ejected by the conductor of the latter train upon refusal to pay fare to the first L.R.A.1915D.

stopping place of the train, which was beyond his destination, and so action for wrongful ejection will not lie. Whether or not, under the circumstances, an action would lie for breach of contract of carriage, the court refused to decide. Allen v. Wilmington & W. R. Co. 119 N. C. 710, 25 S. E. 787.

If a passenger boards a train which does not stop at her destination, having been directed by the gate-keeper and brakeman to take that train, and she is ejected when the train reaches a station at which it regularly stops, the railroad company will be liable in damages. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Summers, 133 Ky. 684, 118 S. W. 926. An action in such a case would, of course, be predicated on the negligence of the company's agent in directing the passenger to take such a train, and not on the fact that the conductor had no right to eject the passenger, the train being a through one, and not stopping at her destination.

But in Distler v. Missouri P. R. Co. 163 Mo. App. 674, 147 S. W. 518, it would seem that recovery in an action for wrongful ejection by one who was ejected from a train which did not stop at his destination was permitted on the ground that there was a negligent misdirection by a servant of the railroad company as to the proper train for the passenger to take. As in the Turner Case, supra, the passenger in the instant case purchased a ticket for a certain station and was directed by the company's servant to enter one of the cars of the train at the station, and later, the conductor, having ascertained his destination, informed him that the train did not stop at such station, and ejected him between stations. A judgment for plaintiff, awarding both actual and punitive damages, was affirmed, the punitive damages being held to be warranted under the evidence that the conductor was abusive and discourteous, and his behavior was such as to arouse the attention of the other passengers on the train to what was being said and done, and thus to bring the passenger under suspicion as a wrongdoer.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

v.

GRACE E. LEWIS.

(220 Mass. 364, 107 N. E. 970.)

New trial — communication between judge and jury in absence of counsel.
A written answer to a written question

Note. — Effect of judge communicating with jury not in open court.

This note is supplementary to the note appended to State v. Murphy, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609.

These notes include cases in which there sent by a jury which has retired, to the judge, who is waiting in the lobby of the court to receive the verdict, without requiring the attendance in court of the parties and their counsel, is, although the answer is accompanied by a statement that the question and answer are immaterial, ground for new trial, where the nature of the communication is never disclosed to the contending party, notwithstanding a statute requiring errors relating to pleading and procedure to be disregarded which do not injuriously affect the substantial rights of the parties.

(February 27, 1915.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of an action brought was some actual communication, oral or written, between the judge and jury not in open court, and cases in which the judge entered the jury room, whether he actually communicated with the jury or not; but do not include any cases involving communications made in open court in the absence of, or without notice to, parties or counsel.

In accordance with the general rule, it is held in the following cases to be error for the trial court to have any communication with the jury not in open court.

Thus, it is error for which a judgment will be reversed for a trial judge to hold any communication with the jury in regard to the instructions in the case except in open court, and it is immaterial whether the instructions given were right or wrong. Mound City v. Mason, 262 Ill. 392, 104 N. E. 685.

It was error for the trial judge to enter the room where the jury were deliberating, and in the absence of accused and his counsel answer questions there propounded and give them advice with respect to the law on the case or the verdict to be returned by them, such action being not only a violation of the Criminal Code, which requires that when the jury desires to be informed upon a point of law they should be brought into court and the information given by the court in the presence of, or after notice to, the accused and his counsel, but also calculated to put the court in a position to be misjudged and its motive questioned. Bentler v. Com. 143 Ky. 503, 136 S. W. 896.

In Texas Midland R. Co. v. Byrd, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 110 S. W. 199, the assignment of error was upon an alleged statement made to the foreman of the jury by the judge, which, if it had been made, would have had a tendency to coerce the jury into arriving at a verdict, and the assignment was overruled on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the judge did make the statement to the foreman. Apparently no objection was made on the ground that the judge and the foreman held a private conversation apart from the jury after the jury had retired to deliberate upon their verdict. L.R.A.1915D.

to recover on an account annexed for goods sold and money advanced to defendant. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Ham, Frederick, & Yont, for defendant:

No communication should take place between the judge and the jury after the cause had been committed to them by the charge of the judge, unless in open court and, where practicable, in the presence of counsel in the case.

Sargent v. Roberts, 1 Pick. 337, 11 Am. Dec. 185; O'Connor v. Guthrie, 11 Iowa, 80; Read v. Cambridge, 124 Mass. 567, 26 Am. Rep. 690; Low v. Freeman, 117 Ind. 341, 20 N. E. 242; Smith v. McMillen, 19 Ind. 391; Coolman v. State, 163 Ind. 503,

But upon an appeal, reported in 102 Tex. 263, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 429, 115 S. W. 1163, 20 Ann. Cas. 137, the supreme court took notice of the fact that a statement appended to the bill of exceptions by the trial court showed the fact that the court conferred with the foreman of the jury apart from the rest of the jury, and not in open court, and reversed the judgment on that ground, saying that in deciding the question it was not required to enter into a discussion as to how the conference between the judge and the foreman would have affected the verdict, if at all.

In Berst v. Moxom, 163 Mo. App. 123, 145 S. W. 857, where it appeared that the judge entered the jury room upon request of the jury, who could not agree, but declined to give any opinion in regard to their questions, although he did give them an instruction in writing that a verdict could be brought in by three fourths of the jury, the judgment was reversed on the ground that any communication in the jury room between the judge and jury in the absence of counsel, and without their consent, after the jury had retired to consider the issues, is reversible error.

Where the foreman of a jury had a communication with the judge after the jury had sealed their verdict, but, because of circumstances arising later, the jury, upon agreement of both parties, retired to further consider their verdict, a new trial was properly granted. Dralle v. Reedsburg, 135 Wis. 293, 115 N. W. 819.

In Greely v. Weaver, — Me. —, 5 Atl. 267, it was held to be error requiring a new trial for the court, in response to a question sent to it by the jury after the court had adjourned for the day, and while they were deliberating on their verdict, to send to them a note reciting a rule of law already given in the charge.

The fact that the trial judge, without the consent of appellant, communicated with the jury during their deliberations upon a case, is ground for a new trial. Holliday v. Sampson, 42 Tex. Civ. App. 364, 95 S. W. 643.

A justice of the peace has no more right

Hockenberger, 31 Misc. 587, 65 N. Y. Supp. 566; Danes v. Pearson, 6 Ind. App. 465, 33 N. E. 976; State v. Murphy, 17 N. D. 48, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 609, 115 N. W. 84, 16 Ann. Cas. 1133; Havenor v. State, 125 Wis. 444, 104 N. W. 116, 4 Ann. Cas. 1052; State v. Wroth, 15 Wash. 621, 47 Pac. 106; Kirk v. State, 14 Ohio, 511.

Messrs. Arthur F. Breed and Joseph G. Wright, for plaintiff:

As to the written communication between the jury and the judge, the question is as to whether there was such misconduct as to require the verdict to be set aside. But in a jury room while the jury is deliberating than any other person, and his presence there is clearly error. Gibbons v. Van Alstyne, 56 Hun, 639, 9 N. Y. Supp. 156.

But, while no cases approve of the practice of private communication between judge and jury, some courts refuse to disturb a verdict because of such communication when no prejudice could have resulted from such communication.

Thus, in Martin v. Martin, 76 Neb. 335, 124 Am. St. Rep. 815, 107 N. W. 580, 14 Ann. Cas. 511, the court recognized the general rule that all instructions to the jury should be delivered in open court, but said it did not mean to say that where, as often happens, the court is engaged in a trial when a request for further instructions is presented, it cannot, by consent of the parties, send its answer to the jury by the bailiff in charge, but that the record ought to show that consent is given in order that no controversy may thereafter arise; and where it did not appear whether an exception taken by the plaintiff at the time such an instruction was sent to the jury was meant to apply to the form of the instruction or to the manner in which it was given, and it appeared in view of the special findings of the jury that the action of the court was without prejudice to the plaintiff, it was held that any error committed by the court in the manner of instructing the jury was immaterial.

In Glenn v. Hunt, 120 Mo. 330, 25 S. W. 181, where, after the cause had been argued and submitted to the jury, the court, upon written request of the jury, and against the defendant's objections, sent to the room an additional instruction, it was held that, while the court committed error in sending that communication to the jury, it was not such prejudicial error as should reverse the judgment, the advice asked by the jury not being in reference to any controverted fact which the jury was required to decide, and the fact and the law communicated to the jury by the judge both being undisputed.

In Miller v. State, 13 Ga. App. 440, 79 S. E. 232, it appeared that, after the jury had been out until late at night, the judge, L.R.A.1916D.

to have this effect, it must appear that the misconduct was such as might have prejudiced the defendant. The presiding justice found as a fact that the defendant was not prejudiced, and that finding was conclusive, unless the facts reported are inconsistent with it and show that it was erroneous in law.

Com. v. Desmond, 141 Mass. 200, 5 N. E. 856; Johnson v. Witt, 138 Mass. 79; Clapp v. Clapp, 137 Mass. 183; Munde v. Lambie, 125 Mass. 367; Com. v. White, 147 Mass. 76, 16 N. E. 707; McCutchen v. Loggins, 109 Ala. 457, 19 So. 810; Mahoney v. Decker, 18 Hun, 365.

It is impossible to ascertain that the conduct of the court had any prejudicial effect upon the jury, and in the absence accompanied by the sheriff, went to the door of the jury room and asked them if they desired to be put to bed, or were likely to agree on a verdict, when one of the jurors asked him a question concerning instructions, to which he gave an answer which did not amount to a recharge, but was equivalent to an instruction as to the form of a verdict which the jury were authorized to render, and within a few minutes the judge informed counsel for defendants as to what had occurred, and no objection was made at the time. It was held that, even though the action of the judge was an irregularity, it did not and could not have resulted in injury to the accused, and the evidence of his guilt being strong and clear, a judgment of conviction was affirmed.

In Dishmaker v. Heck, 159 Wis. 572, 150 N. W. 951, where the jury were unable to decipher a word in the written form for a special verdict given to them by the judge, and the foreman returned to the court room, where another case was being tried, and asked the judge what the word was and was told that it was "punitive," the court said that, while no court had been more careful than it in insisting that all communications between the court and jury should be in open court and free from even a suspicion of secrecy, it would be little less than absurd to hold that because the trial judge correctly told a jurymen what a given word in the special verdict was and what it meant, there should be a new trial.

A statute which makes a communication with a jury during its deliberations sufficient ground for a new trial, if the communication is found to be material, is broad enough to include a communication to the jury by the trial judge, but where it appears that such a communication had no effect whatever upon the minds of the jury in reaching their verdict, it will not be reversible error. Whitaker v. Browning, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 155 S. W. 1197.

In Wood County v. Shinnew, 30 Ohio C. C. 158, where it appeared that after the jury had retired for deliberation they asked the court for further instructions, whereof anything going to show to the contrary it must be presumed that the action of the court in the premises was unobjectionable.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff and the husband of the defendant were copartners in the coal business. The defendant was appointed administratrix of the estate of her husband. After some negotiation an agreement was reached whereby the plaintiff bought the share of his deceased partner in the business for $40,000. An "indenture of sale" was executed by the defendant both as administratrix and individually, transferring to him all the right, title, and interest of the estate of his former partner in the firm assets, including all accounts and bills due to the copartnership, he assuming all its debts and obligations. In the meantime, after the decease of the husband, but before the sale, the plaintiff advanced to the defendant $720, through checks of J. E. Lewis & Company, the style of the former firm, and coal to the value of $60.75. This action is brought to collect these charges. No mention was made of this account at the time of transfer of the share of the deceased in the partnership, and the plaintiff did not then inform the defendant that she would be required to pay it. No reference is made to the matter in the indenture of sale. The evidence was in conflict touching the point whether before the sale bills therefor had been sent to the defendant and a demand for payment had been made upon her.

upon the judge entered the jury room, closed the door, and held some communication with them, and then reported to counsel that the jury wanted further instruction, and that he informed them that he had given them all the instructions upon the law which he was able to give, and counsel then suggested that he ascertain upon what points they desired instruction, whereupon the court and the attorneys for both parties entered the jury room and the court inquired of the jury upon what point they desired instruction, and explained the matter upon which they were having difficulty, a judgment was affirmed, inasmuch as nothing hurtful to the parties complaining occurred during the time the judge was alone with the jury, and during all the remaining transactions the counsel were present, and no exception was taken to the additional instruction given.

In Continental Casualty Co. v. Ogburn, — Ala. —, 64 So. 619, it was held that the fact that a member of a jury went into the clerk's office and held a conversation over the telephone with the presiding judge, who was at his home, concerning the inability of the jury to agree, was not reversible error, but the court said: "We think it would be safer, however, for trial courts to communicate with jurors in all instances in a body and in the presence of counsel when practicable."

In State v. Borchert, 68 Kan. 360, 74 Pac. 1108, where the jury sent a written communication to the judge asking if a verdict of guilty accompanied with a recommendation for mercy would be received by the court, and the judge, without calling in the jury or notifying the parties, answered on the same piece of paper in the affirmative, L.R.A.1915D.

the verdict was sustained, because the communication related only to the form of the verdict, and the facts failed to indicate that defendant could have suffered any prejudice from what took place.

Where, after a jury retired to deliberate on its verdict, and while the court was in session, and in the presence of both counsel, the court officer handed to the court a paper which was a communication from the jury, to which the court made no reply, it was not error for the court to refuse to inform defendant's counsel as to the nature of the communication. People v. Sauerbier, 173 Mich. 521, 139 N. W. 260.

See also Whitney v. Com. 190 Mass. 531, 77 N. E. 516, which is set out sufficiently in LEWIS v. LEWIS.

In Wichita Falls Compress Co. v. Moody, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 154 S. W. 1032, where a jury was deliberating in a room opening out from the court room where the court was trying another case, the door of the jury room being in view of the court, and the jury sent to the judge written communications asking him questions which he answered on the same slip of paper, signing his name, and directing them to retain the slip, the appellate court, while stating that it did not approve the practice, said that it felt constrained to hold that there was a substantial compliance with a statute which provided that when the jury wished to communicate with the court, they should be brought into open court in a body and, through their foreman, state to the court verbally or in writing the questions of law upon which they desired further instructions, and that any further instructions should be given in writing. R. L. S.

ever sound in law these requests may be, they were not germane to the issue raised. Here was no question of concealment, fraud, or misrepresentation. It is not contended that the price agreed upon for the sale of the partnership interest was not fair. There was no doubt about the fact that the items in the plaintiff's account had been furnished to the defendant. The real point of disagreement was whether the parties intended to extinguish liability for these items by transactions connected with the sale. The presiding judge performed his duty by stating the simple issue and leaving it to the jury as a plain controversy of fact far better than by undertaking to lay down principles of law more or less remotely connected with the general relations of the parties, but which had nothing to do with the matter in dispute. No error is disclosed in the requests refused or in the rulings given.

The troublesome aspect of the exceptions is this: After retiring for deliberation, the jury sent a written request for information to the judge, who was in his lobby. Without causing the jury to be brought into open court, and without returning to the court room, he gave an answer in writing, and thereupon the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff. Both parties, with their counsel, were in the court room during the entire period from the time when the jury retired until the verdict was returned. The nature of the communication was not given out, is not disclosed on the record, and the excepting party is ignorant of the contents of the communication from the jury to the judge and from the judge to the jury. Immediately upon learning these facts the defendant filed a motion for a new trial founded upon them. After a hearing the judge denied the motion, filing therewith a statement printed in the footnote.¹

It is plain that apart from Stat. 1913, chap. 716, this irregularity would have required a setting aside of the verdict. This was settled in 1823 by Sargent v. Roberts, 1 Pick. 337, 11 Am. Dec. 185, where, in an illuminating opinion by Chief Justice Parker, the principle was established: "That no communication whatever ought to take place between the judge and the jury after the cause has been committed to them by the charge of the judge, unless in open court, and, where practicable, in presence of the counsel in the cause. . . . The only sure way to prevent all jealousies and suspicions is to consider the judge as having no control whatever over the case, except in open court in presence of the parties and their counsel. The public interest requires that litigating parties should have nothing to complain of or suspect in the administration of justice."

This case has been recognized generally as a leading case, and has been widely cited and approved. See notes in 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 609; 16 Ann. Cas. 1133, 1141; 14 Ann. Cas. 511, 514, where a large number of authorities are collected. It has been followed always in our own decisions. Read v. Cambridge, 124 Mass. 567, 26 Am. Rep. 690. In Merrill v. Nary, 10 Allen, 416, it was held that for the judge to permit the jury to take a copy of the statutes to their room without the knowledge of the parties was such an irregularity as to require the setting aside of the verdict. It was said by Chief Justice Bigelow that "the only regular and safe mode of conducting trials is for the court to instruct the jury on all material points before they retire to deliberate upon their verdict, and, if they have occasion for further information, they should return into court and state the questions on which they wish for further advice, and receive in open court such directions as may seem to the judge material and necessary."

But, as was said by Chief Justice Shaw in Com. v. Roby, 12 Pick. 496, at page 516: "It is not every irregularity which will render the verdict void and warrant setting it aside. This depends upon another and additional consideration, namely, whether the irregularity is of such a nature as to affect the impartiality, purity, and regularity of the verdict itself."

In that case it was held, after a full review of authorities, that the irregularity of furnishing refreshment to the jury after they had agreed upon their verdict, but be-

¹ "The written instructions referred to in the motion for a new trial consisted of a written answer to a written question sent to the judge by the foreman of the jury under the following circumstances:

"The judge had retired to the superior court lobby to await the verdict on the last case of the session, court not having been adjourned. The communication referred to was brought to the lobby between 1 and 2 P. M.

"The judge, believing that counsel had gone to their offices, and that an answer to L.R.A.1915D.

the question, which in his opinion was immaterial to any issue submitted to the jury, did not require counsel to be put to the inconvenience of returning to the court room, sent a written answer, accompanied by the statement that the question and answer were immaterial.

"The action of the judge, although it may be deemed irregular, did not, in my opinion, injuriously affect the substantial rights of the parties, and therefore, in accordance with the provisions of the Stat. of 1913, chap. 716, the motion is denied."

fore it was returned into court, at their own expense, through the agency of the officer in charge, without direction of the court, although reprehensible, did not require a new trial. In Kullberg v. O'Donnell, 158 Mass. 405, 35 Am. St. Rep. 507, 33 N. E. 528, it was held that it was not reversible error for the judge, after the jury had been deliberating for a considerable time and had failed to agree, to call them into the court room and there openly give additional instructions in the absence of counsel, it being the duty of counsel or the parties to remain in court after the trial of an action was begun until it was finished, if they desired to be present at all proceedings in the cause. But it there was said by Chief Justice Field: "It is plain . . . that all instructions to the jury must be in open court."

In Com. v. Heden, 162 Mass. 521, 39 N. E. 181, it was held that it was not error for the judge to communicate to the jury through the officer in charge of them, that upon agreeing on a verdict it might be put in writing and they might separate. In Moseley v. Washburn, 165 Mass. 417, 43 N. E. 182, the amount of the verdict depended upon two executions. Full instructions were given as to the computation of interest upon these sums, to which no exception was taken. Later, the jury sent a note to the judge by the officer, inquiring the date from which interest should be computed. Thereupon, by direction of the judge, the officer procured from the jury room the executions, and the judge showed to him the date on each execution which had been pointed out to the jury in the charge as the date from which interest should be computed, and directed him to return the executions to the foreman and to point out to him the dates which thus had been indicated. The officer followed these instructions and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff with interest computed accordingly. It there was said that, although the practice was not to be commended, it was not necessary to set aside the verdicts, on the ground that the dates from which interest was to be reckoned had been pointed out correctly in the charge in open court, and the interest became, therefore, a mere matter of method of computation, which the record showed had been cast correctly. The opinion of the court, by Chief Justice Field, concluded as follows: "Under these circumstances it is certain that the instructions sent to the jury by the officer had no tendency to influence the decision of the jury upon the merits of the causes, and the irregularity does not seem to us of sufficient importance to require the verdicts to be set aside on the ground that there is or should be an absolute rule of law in such a case."

In Whitney v. Com. 190 Mass. 531, 77 N. E. 516, these facts appeared: Late in the evening, after the judge had gone home, a distance of several miles, the jury, having agreed upon their verdict, were in doubt which of several forms handed them to use in expressing their decision, which doubt was communicated to the judge by the officer in charge of the jury. Thereupon the foreman, in the presence of all the jury and the officer, and with no other person present, telephoned the difficulty to the judge, who over the telephone repeated to the foreman in substance what had been said in the charge as to which forms were intended to express the different conclusions reached. The foreman then repeated this statement to the jury in the telephonic hearing of the judge. The jury were within the hearing of everything said by the foreman, and the foreman repeated to the jury everything said by the judge. It was said by Chief Justice Knowlton in delivering the opinion of the court, in effect, that this was a direction to the whole jury "merely as to the proper way to exhibit and preserve their verdict on paper, after they had decided upon it, so that there might be no mistake in presenting it to the court. The communication was in principle not very different from the common direction given through the officer to a jury who agree in the nighttime, to seal up their verdict and bring it into court the next day. . . . It went a little further in telling them how to use the machinery that had been provided for that purpose, but the information was limited to assistance in the use of this machinery, and did not touch any matter that could affect the substance of the verdict itself before it was agreed upon. There are grave objections to any communication with a jury made as this was. The possibility of misunderstanding or mistake involved in it is such as should preclude the adoption of it unless in cases of great emergency; but the facts stated in this case make it certain that no miscarriage of justice has resulted. Limited as this communication was to a collateral direction as to the manner of using the papers supplied for the reception of the verdict, it does not require us to set the verdict aside."

In all these cases where it has been held that the irregularity was not fatal, the facts were disclosed fully and all that was communicated by the judge to the jury was plainly set forth on the record. In the case at bar, the excepting party did not know at the time, and does not know now, the substance or nature of the communication from the jury to the judge, nor of his reply. The statement filed by the judge throws no light upon the subject, and we are as ignorant as the excepting party. The question is whether under these circumstances a new trial is required, in view of Stat. 1913, chap. 716, § 1, whereby it is provided that "no new trial shall be granted in any civil action or proceeding on the ground of improper admission or rejection of evidence, or for any error as to any matter of pleading or procedure, if, in the opinion of the judge who presided at the trial when application is made by motion for a new trial, or in the opinion of the supreme judicial court when application is made by exceptions or otherwise, the error complained of has not injuriously affected the substantial rights of the parties."

The judge who presided at the trial has expressed his opinion of harmlessness as to the matter under review in the phrase of the statute.

The statute does not reach to such a situation as that here presented. It is not plainly stated that the question of the jury and the answer of the judge related to a matter of law. But it is almost inconceivable that a jury should propound any question to a judge whose purpose was not to gain some information about the law. The statement of the judge seems to indicate that it related to law. The inference from all the circumstances is almost irresistible that it concerned some matter of law, and hence must be treated on that footing. The giving of secret instructions as to the law is not comprehended within the words "pleading or procedure." It is to be noted that our statute relates only to pleading and procedure, and does not extend to "misdirection," as does order XXXIX. r. 6 of the English Rules of the Supreme Court. Bray v. Ford [1896] A. C. 44, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 213, 73 L. T. N. S. 609. Correct instructions upon matters of law are of the very substance of jury trial at common law. Bothwell v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 215 Mass. 467, 476, L.R.A. —, 102 N. E. 665, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 275. This is different in kind from mere procedure. It is of last importance that parties and their counsel duly vigilant in the performance of their duty touching an action on trial have the opportunity to know the principles of law which are laid down for the guidance of the jury. Secret instructions or clandestine communications, no matter if given with the best of intentions, contravene this fundamental and essential conception of common-law trial by jury. One of the distinguishing characteristics of the common law is that its trials are public. The incentives to the maintenance of correct principles and high ideals in the administration of justice, which arise from the consciousness on the part of those who participate in trials that they are open to the public, are important safeguards for the purity, impartiality, and learning of courts, and for the uprightness, sound sense, and integrity of juries. Hearings in camera in common-law courts are so contrary to the spirit of that law as to be regarded as almost, if not quite, impossible. See Scott v. Scott [1913] A. C. 417, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 614. That is the general rule. It has its roots far back in the history of the common law and of free institutions. It appears to be one of its most signal advantages. This feature is a priceless inheritance and one to a high degree calculated to preserve to the future the precious privilege of equality before the law. It is not necessary to discuss any apparent or real exception to this general rule, for certainly the present case cannot in any view fall outside that rule.

The communication in the case at bar must be treated as having been an instruction as to law. It was given in secret, and not disclosed to counsel nor spread upon the record. All that is known respecting it is that the judge who gave it regarded it as immaterial. If it was immaterial, it ought not to have been given, though the giving of it publicly might not have been reversible error. But the fatal objection is that nobody else can tell whether it was immaterial or not. It was the right of the parties to know what it was, in order that they might determine that question for themselves and assent to it expressly or by silence, or to ask to have it reviewed on exceptions. That right was one of substance, and not of form. It was denied. The failure to recognize it was not a mere error as to pleading or procedure, but as to an essential feature of trial by jury.

Exceptions sustained.

SAME.

JEREMIAH WILLIAMS et al.,
v.

SAME.

(220 Mass. 397, 107 N. E. 990.)

Trial — basing verdict on auditor's finding.

1. A verdict by a jury may be based on an auditor's finding, unless it is not supported by the facts found, or they are so inconsistent as to neutralize each other, or are overcome by other evidence.

Evidence — negligence — conduct of others.

2. The practice of others engaged in the same business is evidence upon the question of negligence in not maintaining an elevation of a warehouse above the possible reach of tides, so as to render the owner liable for injury by tides to property stored therein.

Warehouseman — act of God — unusual tide — liability.

3. That a tide which injured property in a warehouse was the highest for a period of nearly sixty years does not alone relieve the warehouseman from liability for the injury, if the floor of the warehouse was below the height reached by the tides several times during that period, and lower than was regarded as safe by experts in the locality.

Same — assumption of risk.

4. Mere knowledge of one depositing goods for storage in a warehouse of the location and condition of the place where the goods are kept does not place upon him an assumption of risk of injury from a high tide, or relieve the warehouseman of liability for negligence in leaving the property in danger thereof.

Note. — Duty of warehouseman to protect goods against high water.

In order to relieve a warehouseman from liability for injury to goods by an unusual flood which may be deemed an act of God, he must not be in any way guilty of negligence which contributed as the proximate cause to the damage. Carolina Rice Co. v. West Point Mill Co. 98 S. C. 476, 82 S. E. 679.

So, where crystalized eggs were rendered unfit for use by backwater which came into the basement of defendant's warehouse by means of the sewer during unusually high water, there being no device to prevent the backwater from coming up the sewer, and, although defendant knew that the water was rising, it did not take steps to remove the eggs to a higher level, and did not keep watch of the water during the night to see that it did not reach a dangerous level, a verdict for plaintiff was sustained, the court saying that if, under all the circumstances, such as the prolonged rain, the downspouts connecting themselves with the drain, the low sewer grade, the enormous volume of surface water, the high stream, and the absence of all protecting devices against back flow, defendant had notice of a situation which would put a reasonably prudent person on guard to discover the entrance of water in any way, and would require him to take steps to remove the goods, then it ought to be held liable. It was also held that plaintiff was not obliged to take care of the goods, to watch the effects of the storm on the basement, and to remove the goods therefrom on need of it. Nor was plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence in using the eggs for animal food after they had been contaminated by the surface water, instead of trying to cure them for human food. Springfield Crystallized Egg Co. v. Springfield Ice & Refrigerating Co. 259 Mo. 664, 168 S. W. 772.

See also H. A. Johnson & Co. v. Springfield Ice & Refrigerating Co. 143 Mo. App. 441, 127 S. W. 692, involving a similar state of facts and reaching the same conclusion.

In Baltimore Refrigerating & Heating Co. v. Kreiner, 109 Md. 361, 71 Atl. 1066, which was an action for damage to poultry stored in the basement of defendant's warehouse, L.R.A.1915D.

due to the flooding of the basement by the breaking of a city water main, it was held that the question of defendant's negligence should have been submitted to the jury, where plaintiff's evidence showed that defendant's cellar was not properly constructed, that there was no drain to carry off surplus water, and that the freezer in which the poultry was stored was not air-tight or water-tight.

In Prince v. St. Louis Cotton Compress Co. 112 Mo. App. 49, 86 S. W. 873, an action for damage to cotton stored in defendant's warehouse, by water due to an unprecedented rise in the Mississippi river, the court said that, while defendant was powerless to stop the rise in the river, and was under no legal duty to improve the dike to prevent its breach or overflow by the waters of river, it did owe the duty to its customer to exercise ordinary care and diligence to remove the cotton to a place of safety after it saw that the same was likely to be submerged, and a verdict for plaintiff was sustained where defendant's officers knew that the danger of its warehouse being flooded from the waters of the river was hourly increasing, and that the bank was liable to break or be overflowed at any time, but failed to make every reasonable effort in its power to remove the cotton to a place of safety.

And where a shipment of books was stored on a wharf which was well covered, and was in other respects, save its proximity to the water, a safe and secure place for the storage of such goods, and it was there damaged by water during a storm of rain and wind of unusual violence, which caused the tide to rise to an unusual height and submerge the dock, a part of which had not been submerged more than once during a period of twenty years, the part on which the books were placed never having been submerged before, defendant was held liable for the injury to the goods, it appearing that at other times the water had risen to within a few feet of the floor of the wharf, and at the prior time when the other part of the wharf was submerged, the water rose to within a few inches of the wharf where the books were stored, and that the tide had been rising steadily all day, so that defendant had sufficient notice to have enabled it to remove the goods to a safe place had it exercised proper care. Merchants' & M.

Parties — bailment — transfer of title — injury to property.

5. One who has sold and received payment for goods deposited in a warehouse and identified so that the title has passed cannot hold the warehouseman liable for negligently permitting the property to be injured.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiffs and defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of actions brought to recover damages for injury by salt water to wool stored by Transp. Co. v. Story, 50 Md. 4, 33 Am. Rep. 293.

But when a warehouseman uses ordinary care to anticipate danger to goods stored with him, or to prevent damage to them after the danger becomes apparent, he will not be held liable.

Thus, while warehousemen are not bound to keep on hand special facilities to meet and overcome possible, but unexpected and unprecedented, emergencies, which are included in what we called the act of God, such as an unprecedented flood, they are required, if imminent danger presents itself, to use such appliances and means as the ordinary safe conduct of their business requires them to possess, and such as are at hand, and to use them with promptness such as would be expected of ordinarily careful and prudent men in regard to their own property or property intrusted to their care under like circumstances. And if, after reasonable information of danger, the warehousemen promptly commenced the removal of seed from the first to the second floor, and did so as rapidly as reasonably could be done under the circumstances, and the flood came suddenly before all could be so removed, they would not be guilty of negligence as to that part not removed. Backus v. Start, 13 Fed. 69.

So, an unprecedented high stage of water in the Mississippi river, which caused the ground upon which defendant's warehouse was built to soften, permitting the foundation to sink and letting plaintiff's malt which was stored in the warehouse into the water in the basement, so that some of it was destroyed and the remainder damaged, was an act of God, and defendant could not be held to respond for the value of the malt received by it unless it appeared from the evidence that defendant was guilty of negligence directly contributing to the loss or damage; and where, although it knew that water was accumulating in the cellar, it had no reason to expect the collapse of the building until it was too late to remove the goods, it was held that it was not liable. American Brewing Asso. v. Talbert, 141 Mo. 674, 64 Am. St. Rep. 538, 42 S. W. 679.

Likewise, where salt stored on defendants' wharf was damaged by water due to a rise of the water at that point because of a violent windstorm on Lake Erie, it was held L.R.A.1915D.

plaintiffs in defendant's warehouse, which resulted in verdicts for plaintiffs. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. David A. Ellis and S. M. Whalen, for plaintiffs:

The tide was not an "act of God," as a matter of law, on the facts which the jury might find in the plaintiffs' favor.

that defendants were not liable for the damage, where it appeared that their storehouse and wharf were as high as any others; that the water had never before risen so high as upon the occasion of the loss; that had the salt been placed in the storehouse instead on the wharf, the damage would have been about the same, and that the rise was so sudden that it did not appear that the salt could have been saved. Knapp v. Curtis, 9 Wend. 60.

And where, because of an unprecedented rainfall and the condition of the street, the ordinary sewers were unable to carry away the water, and it flowed across the sidewalk and into defendant's basement damaging plaintiff's trunk which was stored there, it was held that defendant was not bound to foresee this chain of circumstances, and would be liable only if he failed to take reasonable care to protect the trunk after it became evident that the rainfall could not be carried away in the usual channels; and where he commenced to remove the trunks which were stored in the basement as soon as the danger became apparent, but plaintiff's trunk was damaged before all the trunks could be removed, defendant could not be held liable for negligence because he failed to provide in advance means by which they could be removed more quickly. Murray v. Hayes, 151 N. Y. Supp. 1.

In Powers v. Mitchell, 3 Hill, 545, where plaintiff's goods were destroyed while in defendant's warehouse by a sudden freshet which caused the water of the river to rise and flow into the room where they were deposited, it was held that defendant was not liable for their loss, inasmuch as every exertion was made by men in his employ to save them from the water, although the fact that the goods were totally destroyed by the water was held not to relieve the warehouseman from liability for damage to the goods prior to the flood by his negligently permitting oil to drip on them.

Plaintiffs' knowledge and acquiescence, as such, are immaterial; there must be a contract, express or implied, to modify or waive the legal incidents of the contract of bailment, and knowledge accompanied by long acquiescence without objection might be evidence of such an agreement, but only if the knowledge was a full one of all material facts and circumstances in relation to the situation.

Messrs. F. W. Bacon and O. T. Russell also for defendant.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These are actions of contract wherein the plaintiffs seek to recover damages caused by the wetting with salt water of wool severally stored by them with the defendant, a warehouseman on the water front in Boston. The direct means of the injury was the tide of December 26, 1909, which rose to such height as to come into the sheds of the defendant, where the wool of the plaintiffs was stored, to a depth of several inches.

No question now is made as to the fact of damage. The main contention of the defendant is that this tide was of such extraordinary character as to amount to an "act of God" within the meaning of that phrase in the law. In its juridical sense an act of God may be defined as the action of an irresistible physical force not attributable in any degree to the conduct of man, and not in reason preventable by human foresight, strength, or care. Perhaps no definition could be framed in terms comprehensive enough to include every state of facts, but this is sufficient for the present cases. See The Majestic, 166 U. S. 375, 386, 41 L. ed. 1039, 1043, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 597, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 282, and 1 Corpus Juris. 1172 et seq., for other definitions. Tides are manifestations of the forces of nature quite beyond the power of man to control. Human agency does not in any degree enter into their creation, their flood or their reflux. In this sense tides always are the act of God, for which man is not responsible. When damages are sought at law in such connection, the test of liability of a defendant upon whom a duty is cast, is whether the injury caused by the tide is an inevitable accident due wholly to the violence of the natural phenomenon, and not referable in any degree to the participation of man by unreasonable failure to anticipate danger, to put forth appropriate preventive measures or protective instrumentalities, or to employ rational means to ward off the probable consequences of the event. The human element enters into damages resulting from a cause like a high tide only in omission seasonably to be vigilant to avert the disaster or to mitigate its consequences by the use of such expedients and safeguards as reasonably might be expected under all the circumstances. Through failure in this respect man may concur as a contributing proximate cause with the forces of nature. But the use of the means to which prudent and careful persons in the same line of business ordinarily have recourse is all that can be required. If, having done this, a defendant is overpowered by storm or tide or flood, he is free from liability. The highest ingenuity of the intellect is not demanded. Nothing more can be exacted than such wisdom and provision as the ordinary man would have manifested to avoid a hazard or forestall a danger of which some warning actually had been given by previous experience, or fairly would be disclosed by the application of sound judgment to an observation of general climatic conditions, prevailing customs, and all available sources of information naturally to be resorted to by a reasonable man. Nugent v. Smith, L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 423, 438, 45 L. J. C. P. N. S. 697, 34 L. T. N. S. 827, 24 Week. Rep. 237, 3 Asp. Mar. L. Cas. 198, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 216; Nichols v. Marsland, L. R. 2 Exch. Div. 1, 46 L. J. Exch. N. S. 174, 35 L. T. N. S. 725, 25 Week. Rep. 173, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 262; Gray v. Harris, 107 Mass. 492, 9 Am. Rep. 61; Cork v. Blossom, 162 Mass. 330, 332, 26 L.R.A. 256, 44 Am. St. Rep. 362, 38 N. E. 495.

The precise point to be determined in the cases at bar is whether this particular tide was of such extraordinary height that the resulting mischief would not have been guarded against by the prudence, foresight, care, and skill reasonably to have been expected of the defendant in the performance of its duty as warehouseman.

The determination must rest upon a consideration of all the facts which the defendant within reason might have been required to know in the careful conduct of its business before this particular tide. It cannot be held to the exercise of a degree of sagacity which a reasonable warehouseman using due caution for the preservation of goods at the present time deposited with him, in the light of the experience gained from that tide, now would put forth, but would not have thought of practising before that event. The legal obligation of the defendant was to use the ordinary care of the man of common prudence in keeping the kind of goods deposited with it, in view of the facts accessible to and likely to be considered and acted upon by a reasonable person before the event complained of. Willett v. Rich, 142 Mass. 356, 56 Am. Rep. 684, 7 N. E. 776; Maynard v. Buck, 100 Mass. 40, 47, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 901; Murray v. International S. S. Co. 170 Mass. 166, 64 Am. St. Rep. 290, 48 N. E. 1093. This is the same rule put in equivalent words as a requirement to exercise the care of "a reasonably careful owner of similar goods" in the management of his own concerns, and an exoneration from liability for "loss or injury to the goods which could not have been avoided by the exercise of such care." The warehouse receipt act, pt. 2, § 22 (Stat. 1907, chap. 582); Sullivan v. Scripture, 3 Allen, 564, 565; Maynard v. Buck, 100 Mass. 40, 47, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 901. Stated broadly, the principles of law respecting liability for damages arising from high tides are no different from those which govern liability flowing from different natural phenomena and the manifold other conditions constantly presented in everyday affairs. The test is whether the due care of the reasonable man under all the circumstances has been exercised.

The facts in the cases at bar must be examined to determine whether as matter of law it could have been found that the defendant failed in the performance of this duty.

There was an auditor's finding in favor of the plaintiffs. Unless the facts stated in the report were not sufficient to support the conclusion, or were so inconsistent in themselves as to neutralize each other, or were overcome by other evidence, that was evidence sufficient to warrant a verdict by the jury in favor of the plaintiffs. Fair v. Manhattan Ins. Co. 112 Mass. 320, 331; Newell v. Chesley, 122 Mass. 525; Fisher v. Doe, 204 Mass. 34, 90 N. E. 592.

The elemental facts were not very much in dispute and might have been found to be as follows: This tide was described by witnesses as extraordinarily high. The height reached by it was 15.6 feet above the arbitrary level in common use in the neighborhood, known as Boston base, which was about .64 feet below mean low tide. This height had been exceeded slightly by the tide of 1851, which destroyed Minot's Ledge Lighthouse. There were also tides higher than 15 feet in 1830 and in 1847, and on seventeen other occasions from 1850 to 1905 the tide had risen to 14 feet or more. The tide in question was 3.86 feet above its predicted height. This was attributed to an accompanying severe storm, low barometer, and a northeast wind of great velocity. None of these three factors was excessive, and not infrequently had been equaled. Within the twelve previous years the tide on four different occasions had risen 3 feet or more above its predicted height, and one tide had exceeded its prediction by 4.1 feet, surpassing in this respect the tide in question by almost 2 inches. An increment of this magnitude on the normal or predicted height of tides appreciably lower than that of the one here in question would have brought the water to the level.

A severe storm, known as the Portland storm because a steamer of that name was lost, occurred in 1898. Its accompanying tide rose to a height of 14.94 feet, and water then entered two of the three sheds of the defendant which were wet by the 1909 tide. The floors of those sheds were raised thereafter, but subsequently settled so that, although some parts were higher, there were places in each of the sheds as low as 14.10 feet, 14.24 feet, and 14.40 feet above Boston base, on December 26, 1909. These levels were lower than the recorded heights of several other tides.

The records of tide heights about Boston harbor, including those above mentioned, were available at the city engineer's office, and had been published in his reports for a number of years, and reference had been made to them in other public records. There were several civil engineers in Boston who had made special study of the subject of tides, and were prepared to and did advise numerous persons as to the elevation of structures in order to be secure from damage by tides.

Considerable testimony was introduced from experts on tides to the effect that the minimum height for storage of wool, in the light of experience and knowledge available before the date in question, was 15.6 feet above Boston base. The practice of others engaged in the same business as to the elevation of storerooms was evidence competent to be considered as bearing upon the negligence of the defendant. Case v. Boston & L. R. Co. 14 Allen, 448; Pitcher v.

Old Colony Street R. Co. 196 Mass. 69, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 481, 124 Am. St. Rep. 513, 81 N. E. 876, 12 Ann. Cas. 886; McCrea v. Beverly Gas & Electric Co. 216 Mass. 495, 498, 104 N. E. 365; Canadian Northern R. Co. v. Senske, 120 C. C. A. 65, 72, 201 Fed. 637. Some evidence of this sort showed elevations higher than that maintained by the defendant in its sheds where the plaintiffs' wool was stored.

It is apparent from what has been said that the plaintiffs' cases did not rest upon the bald fact that the tide which caused the damage was the highest for nearly sixty years. There were many other circumstances bearing upon the issue. The subject of high tides was one to which the attention both of experts and of the public had been directed to a greater or less extent. The partial flooding of the defendant's own premises in 1898 had called its notice pointedly to the dangers incident to high tides. Reasonable caution might have been found to require not only bare avoidance of known precedents, but a slight factor of safety in the presence of such powerful forces as tides. The defendant was conducting its business not in a new and untried country, where there must be something of the unknown even in the recent past, but in one of the oldest and most highly commercialized cities of the continent, where records appear to have been kept for a long period with considerable accuracy and studied with care, so that the teachings of experience might have been found to have been available to the ordinarily prudent business man, even though himself lacking in exact knowledge. The state of society, the customs of others, and the limits of reasonable expense sometimes may be decisive elements in exonerating a defendant from liability for damages resulting from unusual, though not unprecedented, storm or freshet, cold or flood. On these grounds perhaps Cowles v. Pointer, 26 Miss. 253, and Pearce v. The Thomas Newton (D. C.) 41 Fed. 106, may be distinguished. The defendant's business was not of a nature to render impracticable the avoidance of damages from the tides. All that appears to have been required was the elevation of the floor level of its sheds or some degree of waterproofing. The improbability of the occurrence of the event is not the sole consideration, but the feasibility of preventing injurious results flowing from it often is a potent factor in determining whether there is liability. Cormack v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 196 N. Y. 442, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1209, 90 N. E. 56, 17 Ann. Cas. 949; Jones v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 91 Minn. 229, 103 Am. St. L.R.A.1915D.

Rep. 507, 97 N. W. 893, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 355, and like cases, are instances where human diligence and sagacity were powerless in reason to avert the consequences of the operation of snow or storm or cold. But they are distinguishable from the cases at bar.

There was much evidence coming both from the testimony of witnesses and from the fair inferences from other facts which tended to exonerate the defendant from negligence. But we are of opinion on the whole that its weight was for the jury, and that it could not have been ruled as matter of law that there was nothing upon which to rest a finding of negligence on the part of the defendant. The cases are very close on their facts. Verdicts in favor of the defendant certainly would have been warranted. But the jury hardly could have been directed that there was no evidence of negligence worthy of consideration. This conclusion is supported by Nitro-Phosphate & O. Chemical Manure Co. v. London & St. K. Docks Co. L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 503, 39 L. T. N. S. 433, 27 Week. Rep. 267, 1 Eng. Rul. Cas. 276; Carney v. Caraqueet R. Co. 29 N. B. 425; and Burt v. Victoria Graving Dock Co. 47 L. Reliance is placed by the defendant on The C. H. Northam (D. C.) 181 Fed. 986. That, however, was a finding as matter of fact by a district judge upon the evidence before him, and does not rest upon any principle of law at variance with the conclusion here reached.

The defendant presented several requests for instructions in different forms, to the effect that if the plaintiffs knew where their wool was being stored, and continued for a series of years without objection to deposit with the defendant, they consented to the particular place of storage and assumed the risks arising therefrom. These requests rightly were refused. The acceptance of the wool on storage for hire involved the obligation on the part of the defendant to use due care for its safety and protection. That was implied from the relation it assumed as warehouseman. Mere knowledge and acquiescence by the owner as to the place of storage are not enough to modify that contractual obligation. Essential elements as to the care required by the contract of storage in the cases at bar lie outside the mere place of storage. Nothing as to waiver of that obligation respecting protection of the goods from the danger of injury from tides was tacitly inferable from such knowledge and acquiescence as was attributable on the evidence to the plaintiffs. Conway Bank v. American Exp. Co. 8 Allen, 512; Moore v. Larry, 15 Gray, 451; Brabant v. King [1895] A. C. 632, 641, 64 L. J. C. P. N. S. 161, 11 Reports, 517, 72 L. T. N. S. 785, 44 Week. Rep. 157; Searle v. Laverick, L. R. 9 Q. B. 122, 43 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 43, 30 L. T. N. S. 89, 22 Week. Rep. 367. The decisions relied on by the defendant upon this point are distinguishable. Knowles v. Atlantic & St. L. R. Co. 38 Me. 55, 61 Am. Dec. 234, arose out of gratuitous bailment. Brown v. Hitchcock, 28 Vt. 452, 458, and Parker v. Union Ice & Salt Co. 59 Kan. 626, 68 Am. St. Rep. 383, 54 Pac. 672, rest upon peculiar facts which showed such intimate familiarity with all the attendant conditions or personal directions touching the storage as to amount to a waiver of the usual terms of the contract of bailment. No such circumstances are to be found in the cases at bar.

The plaintiffs Hecht and others, and Brown and others, sold certain bags of wool stored with the defendant, before December 26, 1909, and received full payment therefor. The ruling of the superior court that these plaintiffs could not recover damages for injury to the wool thus sold was right. The liability of the defendant is to be determined according to the principles of the common law, for the bill of exceptions contains no reference to the warehouse receipts act, nor to the kind of receipts, if any, issued by the defendant. It simply is stated that the defendant was a public warehouseman. It may be assumed under all the circumstances that it assented to the sale, if that affects favorably its liability. The title to this wool had passed from the plaintiffs to their customers. Each bag was identified by definite marks. The wool, therefore, was "specific goods in a deliverable state," and under the sales act (Stat. 1908, chap. 237, § 19, rule 1) the title vested in the purchaser upon the L.R.A.1915D.

making of the contract of sale. It further is provided by § 22 of the sales act that such goods are at the buyer's risk whether delivery has been made or not. Thus, the difficulties as to change of possession and assent suggested in Hallgarten v. Oldham, 135 Mass. 1, 9, 46 Am. Rep. 443, and Selliger v. Kentucky, 213 U. S. 200, 205, 53 L. ed. 761, 764, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 449, are eliminated. The plaintiffs do not contend that they had suffered loss on account of these bags, but they ask to recover damages, and to hold the proceeds as trustees for the true owners. See Boyden v. Hill, 198 Mass. 477, 487, 85 N. E. 413. The owner of goods, or one having some general or special interest in them, commonly is the one to bring action for damage to them. See Commercial Nat. Bank v. Bemis, 177 Mass. 95, 58 N. E. 476. Plainly the plaintiffs are not the owners, and they do not contend that they are. They seek to maintain these actions only on the authority of Blanchard v. Page, 8 Gray, 281, and Finn v. Western R. Corp. 112 Mass. 524, 17 Am. Rep. 128. These have been recognized generally as leading decisions, and would be followed implicitly in similar cases. But the principles there declared are not applicable to the facts in the cases at bar. In the former of these two cases, the shipper, the agent for an undisclosed principal who was not the consignee, was permitted to recover of a shipowner for breach of the contract of carriage. In the latter case the consignor, who delivered goods to a common carrier, was permitted to recover damages for breach of the contract of carriage in the absence of evidence to the effect that the consignee was the owner and did not acquiesce in recovery of the full value of the goods by the consignor. But the relation between a depositor of goods and a warehouseman, the owner and agister, and generally of a bailor and bailee, is not the same as that of a shipper and common carrier. The obligation of the carrier is to perform its contract for transportation, generally set forth in a bill of lading to which the consignor is a principal party. The duty of the bailee is commonly to deliver to the owner when he is known, in instances where there has been transfer of title during bailment, and not to the depositor. The obligations respectively resting upon the parties (apart from statute) are not in kind like those arising out of the issuance of a bill of lading by a common carrier. Krulder v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 36, 7 Am. Rep. 402; Merchants' Despatch Co. v. Smith, 76 Ill. 542; Dawes v. Peck, 8 T. R. 330, 3 Esp. 12, 4 Revised Rep. 675. The relation between a bailor who has sold the goods bailed, and the purchaser, is not naturally one of trust and confidence. They are at arm's length as to each other. Therefore the bailor shows no right to recover the value of the goods bailed if he has parted with all title.

Note. — Gifts: delivery of certificate of stock without indorsement or transfer on books.

This note is supplemental to the note to French v. White, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 806 (so far as gifts are concerned), where the earlier cases are collected.

For necessity of actual delivery of certificate to complete gift of shares of stock, see note to Dewey v. Barnhouse, 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 166.

As may be seen by the earlier note, the court in HERBERT v. SIMSON, in sustaining a gift of a delivered certificate of stock without formal assignment or transfer, follows the general rule, and this rule is also sustained by other recent cases.

Thus, where a father handed certificates of stock to his son with a statement that the son was to have them on a condition imposed that after the father's death the son should pay certain sums to two certain grandchildren of the father (not his own children), it was held that this was a completed gift and the title vested in the son. Smith v. Meeker, 153 Iowa, 655, 133 N. W. 1058, where the donor died about a year after the gift, and it does not appear that it was other than a gift inter vivos.

In Grimes v. Barndollar, — Colo. —, 148 Pac. 256, it was considered that a good gift inter vivos was effected by the delivery of unindorsed certificates of stock, but the parties beneficially interested in the residuary estate had agreed that the donee should have the stock.

In Talbot v. Talbot, 32 R. I. 72, 78 Atl. L.R.A.1915D.

RESERVATION by the Supreme Judicial Court for Middlesex County for consideration of the full court of a question arising upon appeal by respondent from a decree of the Probate Court on petition by the executor of Adeline L. Nickerson, deceased, for instructions as to the disposition to be made by him of a certificate for corporate stock held by him as executor, and claimed by respondent as an alleged gift from the testatrix. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Robert W. Nason and Thomas W. Proctor, for respondent Simson:

An effectual gift of the stock was made by testatrix to respondent. There were present all the essential elements of a gift.

535, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1221, the court, in holding that a delivery of an unindorsed certificate of stock with a separate deed of assignment to one of several trustees, the deed not identifying the particular certificate, was a valid gift inter vivos in presenti, said: "We are of the opinion that the principle . . . that the delivery of the instrument which is the evidence representing a chose in action constitutes a valid gift should be applied to the delivery of a certificate of stock. Although the question has not heretofore been determined in Rhode Island, the decisions in other jurisdictions of this country are almost unanimous in holding that such delivery, either with or without written assignment or indorsement, and without registration on the books of the corporation as required by its by-laws and certificates, constitutes a valid gift,—whether it be to trustees or directly to the beneficiaries, and whether it be inter vivos or mortis causa."

In Apache State Bank v. Daniels, 32 Okla. 121, 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 901, 121 Pac. 237, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 520, where a gift causa mortis was defeated on the ground that there had been no delivery, it seems to be suggested by the opinion that the certificate was unindorsed, and there is possibly an implication that if there had been a delivery the gift would have been good.

And perhaps there is a similar implication in Sullivan v. Hess, 241 Pa. 407, 88 Atl. 544, where a man, several years before his death, handed his sister certificates of stock in his name without any written assignment or transfer, and he continued to collect the

Mr. Harold W. Orcutt for respondents Fielding et al.

De Courcy, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is settled by the finding of the single justice that on the 5th day of December, 1908, for the reasons set forth in the reservation, Mrs. Nickerson undertook to make a gift to Mrs. Simson of ten shares to the preferred stock of the American Agricultural Chemical Company; that pursuant thereto she delivered the unindorsed certificate for the shares to Mrs. Simson, who then dividends thereon until his death, and it was held that the facts were consistent with a finding that he delivered the stock to her for safe-keeping, against her claim that it was given to her to be held in trust for the benefit of her children and the children of her sister.

It may be noted that it has been held that a delivery of a certificate without the transfer tax stamps is insufficient to effect a gift. Thus, in Re Raleigh, 75 Misc. 55, 134 N. Y. Supp. 684, where it does not appear whether the certificate was indorsed or not, it was held that there could be no valid gift of a certificate of stock which did not bear the tax transfer stamp when delivered by the donor to the donee, if the question was properly pleaded, although the donor delivered the certificate to the donee a day or two before his death, when stricken with a fatal illness. The statute provided that "no transfer of stock . . . on which a tax is accepted it on the terms on which it had been delivered to her. Thereafter it was kept by Mrs. Simson in her trunk in her own room. The question before us is whether the alleged gift was incomplete, and therefore ineffectual, because of the failure on Mrs. Nickerson's part to assign the certificate by signing the form on the back thereof, or by executing some other written instrument.

The charter and by-laws of the corporation contain no provision concerning the transfer of certificates of shares; and no statute of the state of its incorporation has been called to our attention that affects the question. No rights of creditors or other third parties are involved, but only those of donor and donee. It should be added that Stat. 1910, chap. 171, § 9, which provides for such a case as this, was passed after the gift in controversy.

The failure of Mrs. Nickerson to indorse the share certificate was important evidence bearing on the intention with which the delivery was made; but it is settled by the finding of the single justice that she did in fact intend to make a completed gift, and irrevocably to renounce dominion and control of the stock, and that Mrs. Simson accepted it as her own property. Nevertheless, without the written assignment Mrs. Simson did not acquire the legal title to the shares,—the ownership in the sense that no further act was required to perfect her right. Fisher v. Essex Bank, 5 Gray, 373; Stone v. Hackett, 12 Gray, 227; note to Milroy v. Lord, 1 Ames, Cases on Trusts, 149. What she did acquire was, as between herself and the donor, the equitable title to the shares and some legal as well as equitable rights. The gift was complete, and not inchoate; and a court of equity has jurisdiction to compel a formal assignment by the executor of the imposed by this article, and which tax is not paid at the time of such transfer, shall be made the basis of an action or legal proceedings, nor shall proof thereof be offered or received in evidence in any court in this state."

In view of the decision in Matthews v. Hoatland, 48 N. J. Eq. 455, 21 Atl. 1054, cited in HERBERT v. SIMSON, and discussed in the earlier note, holding that a valid gift inter vivos of a certificate of stock could not be made by its delivery without formal transfer or assignment, it may be noted that in Farrell v. Passaic Water Co. 82 N. J. Eq. 97, 88 Atl. 627, it was held that there was a good gift inter vivos of a delivered corporate coupon bond, registered as to principal, without written assignment or transfer on the books of the company, followed by many years of collection of interest by the donee.

donor, and a transfer on the books of the corporation.

The general rule is now well established that choses in action, of which the legal or equitable title can pass by delivery, may be the subject of a valid gift. And the delivery of the chose in action, without formal indorsement or assignment, is sufficient to effectuate the gift where it is the intent and purpose of the donor to transfer the ownership at once. The principle has been applied by this court to the gift of a promissory note payable to the order of the donor, and not indorsed. Grover v. Grover, 24 Pick. 261, 35 Am. Dec. 319. It was held in Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425, 37 Am. Rep. 371, that the delivery of a savings bank book (which is analogous to a stock certificate in many respects), without a written assignment or order, was sufficient to constitute a valid gift. A share of capital stock is property of a peculiar kind. Accurately speaking, it does not consist in an interest either legal or equitable in the property of the company. It is personalty, although the corporation may own real estate. If not a chose in action it is in the nature of a chose in action. The share certificate is evidence of title, and for some purposes may possess some of the incidents of property. While not negotiable, shares are freely assignable, and in this respect resemble negotiable choses in action and tangible property, rather than other non-negotiable choses in action. As was said by Rugg, Ch. J., in Kennedy v. Hodges, 215 Mass. 112, 115, 102 N. E. 432, 434: "Modern commercial usage treats certificates of stock as possessing some of the attributes of property. They are generally bought and sold and pass by delivery when properly indorsed like ordinary chattels."

There is nothing in the nature of a share of stock to prevent the passing of the equitable title to the share, as between the donor and donee, by the delivery of the share certificate, where such is the manifest intent of the parties.

The question now before us has not been decided in this commonwealth, although it arose in Morse v. Meston, 152 Mass. 5, 24 N. E. 916. But in the large majority of cases where it has arisen in other jurisdictions in this country, it has been decided that the delivery of the share certificate, with the intention of passing title to the donee at the time, but without formal assignment, will constitute a valid gift. Brown v. Crafts, 98 Me. 40, 44, 56 Atl. 213; Bond v. Bean, 72 N. H. 444, 101 Am. St. Rep. 686, 57 Atl. 340; Reed v. Copeland, 50 Conn. 472, 47 Am. Rep. 663; Walsh v. Sexton, 55 Barb. 251; Gilkinson v. Third L.R.A. 1915D.

Meeker*, 153 Iowa, 655, 133 N. W. 1058; Leyson v. Davis, 17 Mont. 220, 31 L.R.A. 429, 42 Pac. 775, Id. 170 U. S. 36, 42 L. ed. 939, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 500. And see Burnsville Turnp. Co. v. State, 119 Ind. 382, 385, 3 L.R.A. 265, 20 N. E. 421; Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 572, 11 L.R.A. 684, 21 Am. St. Rep. 758, 26 N. E. 627; Talbot v. Talbot, 32 R. L. 72, 78 Atl. 535, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1221; Watson v. Watson, 69 Vt. 243, 39 Atl. 201. Contra, Matthews v. Hoagland, 48 N. J. Eq. 455, 21 Atl. 1054; Baltimore Retort & Fire Brick Co. v. Mall, 65 Md. 93, 57 Am. Rep. 304, 3 Atl. 286.

The injustice of a contrary conclusion is well expressed by Dean Ames in his note to Milroy v. Lord, ubi supra (page 156): "Even in jurisdictions where the gift is ineffectual unless the shares or deposits are transferred on the books of the company or savings bank, the donor would not be allowed to recover the certificate or bank book after he had once delivered them with the intention of vesting them in the donee. . . . We should have, then, this extraordinary condition of things: the donee unable to transfer the shares or collect the deposit, because the gift is not deemed complete; the donor equally helpless, because he cannot produce the certificate or bank book; the company or bank, on the other hand, in a position capriciously to recognize the donor or the donee as dominus of the claim, or indeed, unless they come to some compromise, to refuse with safety to recognize either."

We are of opinion that the delivery by Mrs. Nickerson to the respondent of the share certificate and its acceptance by the latter constituted a valid gift, and vested in the donee the equitable title to the property. The provision printed on the certificate, that the shares are "transferable only on the books of the company," affects the shareholder's relation to the corporation only, and not her relation to a third party who has become equitably possessed of the stock. See cases cited in Talbot v. Talbot, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1235, note.

The decree of the Probate Court is reversed, and a decree is to be entered instructing the executor that the certificate for ten shares of the preferred stock of the American Agricultural Chemical Company is the property of the respondent Malvina J. Simson, and directing him to assign the same to her.

FARMERS' MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.

(165 Mich. 406, 131 N. W. 87.)

Insurance — divisible policy — increase of risk — partial recovery.

A policy insuring for a single premium specified sums on the dwellings on a farm and its barns, sheds, furniture, products, equipment on the premises, and live stock anywhere in certain specified counties, is divisible, and the insurance on the personalty is not avoided by breach of warranty as to condition of chimneys on the dwellings and the placing of an encumbrance on the realty without authority, except so far as it is contained in the buildings as to which the risk is increased.

(Hooker and McAlvay, JJ., dissent.)

(May 8, 1911.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Grand Traverse County to review a judgment permitting a partial recovery on a fire insurance policy alleged to be void for breach of warranties. Affirmed on condition.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Halstead & Halstead and Parm
C. Gilbert for appellant.Messrs. Pailthorp & Hackney for ap-pellee.Blair, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On live stock, carriages, harnesses, and farm tools, while in said barns or on said premises	1,500

"Live stock insured against loss or damage by fire or lightning anywhere in Charlevoix, Emmet, and Cheboygan counties.

"The said company agrees that it shall be held responsible, to make good and satisfy the assured, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, all loss or damage by fire and lightning to the property hereby insured, as specified in articles 4 and 13 of the charter of this company; provided, this insurance is equal to that amount. Provided also, this insurance shall not be liable for any loss or damage occasioned by the violation of any of the requirements as expressed, either in the application for insurance, the charter, by-laws, or rules and regulations of this company; and it is further mutually agreed that in case the buildings hereby insured shall be used for other purposes than stated in the application for insurance, without the written consent of this company, whereby the risk is increased and rendered more hazardous, then this insurance shall not be liable for any loss or damage that may occur in consequence of such use.

"And it is hereby declared and mutually agreed between the assured and this company, that this policy of insurance is made and accepted with special reference to the application for insurance, and all the conditions therein stated; the charter and by-laws of this company, or as may be amended hereafter, or as amended since the application for insurance was first taken, and all the conditions hereto or thereto annexed and appended, which form a part of this agreement, and are to be resorted to in order to settle and explain the rights and obligations of the assured and of this company, in all cases not herein specifically provided for."

By the terms of the application, such insurance was expressly made "subject to the condition of the charter, by-laws, and policies on the property specially described in this application and schedule." In the application, among other questions and answers, there appears the following: "Q. Are your chimneys all secure? A. Yes." Article 4 of defendant's charter provides, among other things: "No dwelling shall be insured unless provided with suitable brick or tile chimneys." In by-law No. 8 the following appears: "This company may insure all farm buildings without special reference to the distance of each to the other, provided all buildings in which fire is used shall be provided with good and safe tile and brick chimneys," etc. The policy of insurance contains the following clause: "And it is hereby declared and mutually agreed between the assured and this company that this policy of insurance is made and accepted with special reference to the application for insurance, and all conditions therein stated," etc. The by-laws also provide: "All applicants for insurance shall state the amount of encumbrance on the premises whereon the property to be insured is situated. . . . Should additional encumbrance be placed on said premises without the written consent of the secretary, such policy shall be void, and the company will not be liable for any loss under them," etc.

Plaintiff testified:

Q. What kind of chimneys were actually on the buildings that were burned?

A. They were mossback chimneys.

Q. A stovepipe running up through the hole?

A. Yes, sir; protected by iron.

Plaintiff also admitted that he placed $1,500 encumbrance on the real estate, "on the premises where the property insured was located," without the knowledge of the company. The total insurance was $3,100. The premium was all paid as one sum, not divided as to real estate and personal, nor in any other way. Plaintiff's declaration was upon the common counts, and specially upon the policy of insurance, and treats the policy as an entirety, claims damages $3,100, being in full of the face of the policy. Plaintiff filed a bill of particulars stating that he sued "to recover the value of all property described in the several counts of declaration," etc. Defendant's plea gave special notice of the want of chimneys on the dwellings and of the placing of encumbrance on the premises, contrary to the by-laws, application, and charter. In the trial court the defendant contended that there could be no recovery; that the policy was void. The court allowed plaintiff to recover for personal property, including that in log dwelling No. 1, but held the policy void as to real estate by reason of the encumbrance placed on the premises by plaintiff. In other words, the policy was held to be divisible, void in part, and valid as to other property. The burning of the property insured was caused by the spreading of forest fires to plaintiff's premises.

Defendant has brought the record to this court for review upon writ of error, challenging our attention to the following questions: "(a) What is the effect upon this insurance of the misstatements contained in the application as to chimneys and encumbrance? (b) Was the entire policy rendered void by the assured placing encumbrance upon the premises unknown to defendant company?"

the real property, we need only consider whether the contract was divisible. Was the contract divisible? We are of the opinion that it was. The author of Briefs on the Law of Insurance, at the close of his examination of the subject, states his conclusion as follows: "Though in some jurisdictions the fact that the consideration for the policy is entire has led the courts to declare the contract entire, an examination of the cases justifies the statement that the rule established by the weight of authority is that, if the policy covers separate classes or items of property, separately valued and insured for separate amounts, the contract is divisible, and a breach of warranty or condition which affects only one of the classes or items covered will not avoid the insurance on the other classes or items. The fact that the policy contains a declaration that the entire policy shall be void on a breach of condition does not change the rule. Reason and justice require, however, that the rule should be modified when the various classes of property are so situated in respect to each other that the risk is substantially the same on all, and in such case a breach of condition or warranty which increases the risk on one class or item of the property insured should forfeit the whole insurance." 2 Cooley, Briefs on Ins. 1925. See also 19 Cyc. 674. Merrill v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 452, 29 Am. Rep. 184, is very similar on its facts to the case before us, and supports the ruling of the circuit judge. The case of Aetna Ins. Co. v. Resh, 44 Mich. 55, 38 Am. Rep. 228, 6 N. W. 114, does not conflict with our conclusion. The facts of that case bring it within the modification proposed by Mr. Cooley.

In the present case it was not contemplated that the property should remain within the buildings insured except as to the household furniture, etc., in log dwelling No. 1. The other personal property was insured anywhere on the premises, and the live stock "anywhere in Charlevoix, Emmet, and Cheboygan counties." It was error, however, to authorize the inclusion of the personal property in log dwelling No. 1 in the verdict, and for this error the judgment must be reversed, unless the plaintiff shall remit the amount thereof within thirty days, in which event the judgment will be affirmed for the remainder.

Ostrander, Ch. J., and Moore, Brooke, and Stone, JJ., concur with Blair, J.

Hooker, J., dissenting:

I am of the opinion that the plaintiff's breach of warranty is fatal to his case. 2

Comp. Laws, § 5180, does not relieve him, if it can be said to be applicable to a breach of warranty in any case (see Shelden v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 124 Mich. 303, 82 N. W. 1068), for the reason that the fire occurred during the continuance of the defective condition. This statute has been held not to relieve an insured person where the breach of condition extended to the time of the fire in Boyer v. Grand Rapids F. Ins. Co. 124 Mich. 461, 83 Am. St. Rep. 338, 83 N. W. 124; A. M. Todd Co. v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 137 Mich. 188, 100 N. W. 442; King v. Concordia F. Ins. Co. 140 Mich. 266, 103 N. W. 616, 6 Ann. Cas. 87. The fact that the misrepresentation was innocent does not relieve the plaintiff from the consequences of the misrepresentation. The defendant could not have insured the dwelling under its articles and by-laws had the truth been stated, and the falsity of the representations avoided the policy under § 19, under which it was sufficient if the answer was false, whether it was fraudulent or not. It is said that we may hold this policy void as to the building, and not void as to the personal property. If that were so, in my opinion the doctrine should not be carried so far as to apply it to the contents of a building whose condition is such as to make the policy void. It is incredible that the parties could have intended or supposed that the policy would be void as to the building, and not as to its contents.

But, as some of the personal property was not in dwelling No. 1, either when the fire occurred or when the policy was written, we must examine the case further. We held in Shelden v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra, that the statute (§§ 5150, 5182, 5187) had no application to a breach of warranty which was involved in this case. See also McGannon v. Michigan Millers' F. Ins. Co. 127 Mich. 650, 54 L.R.A. 739, 89 Am. St. Rep. 501, 87 N. W. 601, for discussion of warranty. I consider this point conclusive unless the doctrine of divisibility is applicable to the case. There is another reason why it has no application. Were we to say that only a condition was violated, inasmuch as the breach continued up to and including the time of the fire, the case does not come within the statute. Niles v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 119 Mich. 252, 77 N. W. 933; Cronin v. Fire Asso. of Philadelphia, 123 Mich. 277, 82 N. W. 45; Shelden v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. supra; Boyer v. Grand Rapids F. Ins. Co. 124 Mich. 455, 83 Am. St. Rep. 338, 83 N. W. 124; McGannon v. Michigan Millers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. 127 Mich. 637, 54 L.R.A. 739, 89 Am. St. Rep. 501, 87 N. W. 67; A. M. Todd Co. v. Farmers'

Mut. F. Ins. Co. 137 Mich. 188, 194, 100 N. W. 442; King v. Concordia F. Ins. Co. 140 Mich. 266, 103 N. W. 616, 6 Ann. Cas. 87; Brunswick-Balke-Collender Co. v. Northern Assur. Co. 150 Mich. 315, 113 N. W. 1113.

Since writing the foregoing, my Brother Blair and I have been able to agree so far as dwelling house No. 1 and its contents are concerned, but, in view of his conclusions regarding the other property destroyed and the application of the doctrine of divisibility of the insurance contract to this case, I feel constrained to discuss that question, both for its effect on this cause and, in my opinion, its introduction of a new rule in this state. I am aware that it is no new thing for courts to apply different rules of construction to insurance contracts than are applied to other contracts. So far as such have become the established law of this state, we should certainly follow them, otherwise we should be sufficiently deliberate to be sure that such decisions are well grounded. The exact facts in this case are that this plaintiff procured insurance upon two frame dwellings, one frame barn, one or more log barns, one cow shed, and one pigpen, household furniture in dwelling No. 1, hay and other products, live stock, carriages, etc., in the barns or on the premises, each in separate amounts. Plaintiffs claimed the right to recover the entire amount of the policy. In his application he answered "Yes" to the question, "Are your chimneys secure?" By the terms of the application, the insurance was to issue "subject to the charter, by-laws, and policies on the property specially described in this application and schedule." In by-law 8 the following appears: "This company may insure all farm buildings without special reference to the distance of each to the other, provided all buildings in which fire is used shall be provided with good and safe tile and brick chimney," etc. The policy states: "And it is hereby declared and mutually agreed between the assured and this company, that this policy of insurance is made and accepted with special reference to the application for insurance, and all conditions therein stated," etc. The by-laws also provide: "All applicants for insurance shall state the amount of encumbrance on the premises whereon the property to be insured is situated. . . . Should additional encumbrance be placed on said premises without the written consent of the secretary, such policy shall be void, and the company will not be liable for any loss under them," etc. There were no brick or tile chimneys at the time the policy was procured, nor have there been such at any time since,—merely stovepipes through the roof.

It is conceded that an additional encumbrance of $1,500 has been placed on the real estate since, and was in force at the time of the fire, without the necessary consent. The learned circuit judge held the encumbrance to be a fatal obstacle to recovery for damage to the real estate, but permitted recovery for destruction of the personal property wherever situate. We agree that no recovery can be had for injury to the real property or personal property burned in the farm dwelling. We do not agree upon the subject of the other personal property. I assume that the breach of warranty as to the chimneys is the ground upon which we agree as to the personal property destroyed in dwelling 1, for, if the contract is divisible upon the ground that the encumbrance is upon the realty merely, this household property would be protected because not covered by the encumbrance. I also think myself warranted in understanding that the claim to the application of the doctrine of divisibility of the contract as regards the personal property is based on the idea that only that portion in dwelling 1 would be affected by this warranty as to chimneys. It has been truly said that there is a want of harmony in the cases upon the question of divisibility of the contract.

We are not without some light on this question from our own cases. See Ætna Ins. Co. v. Resh, 40 Mich. 241; Id. 44 Mich. 55, 38 Am. Rep. 228, 6 N. W. 114. This doctrine seems to rest upon, and to be limited in its application to, cases where it is reasonably certain that the parties intended that the contract should be divisible, and while Mr. Justice Marston, apparently out of abundant caution, in view of the want of harmony which he mentioned, said "there may be cases where the contract would be divisible," he also said that "the case should be clear and free from all reasonable doubt to warrant a court in carving out separate and distinct contracts from one common whole." Again, as Mr. Roger Cooley says in his Briefs on the Law of Insurance, vol. 2, p. 1898, "it is, of course, conceded that the rule"—i. e. of divisibility—"may be rendered inapplicable by special provisions of the policy"—citing Smith v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 118 N. Y. 518, 23 N. E. 883, where a policy declared that it should be void if the property insured, or any part thereof be encumbered, and it was held that the doctrine of divisibility would not apply.

Our case is similar. The provision here is that, "should additional encumbrance be placed on said premises without the written consent of the secretary, such policy shall be void." How can it be said that this meant that only a part of the policy should be void, without doing violence to the explicit agreement of the parties to the contrary? Again, by-law 19 provides: "False Statements. Sec. 19. Any applicant who shall falsely or fraudulently answer any of the questions contained in the application, or who shall make any false or fraudulent representations regarding his losses in case of fire, shall thereby forfeit all his rights under his policy." Is there a legitimate distinction between a provision that a policy should be void "if the property insured or any part thereof be encumbered," and a provision that "any applicant who shall falsely or fraudulently answer any of the questions contained in the application, or who shall make any false or fraudulent representations regarding his losses in case of fire, shall thereby forfeit all his rights under his policy?" Mr. Cooley's conclusions do not seem to be in accord with those of some others as to the better rule. Thus, 19 Cyc. 682, states the following: "A warranty must be literally complied with, and an unimportant breach will avoid the policy. The falsity of a statement or representation which is directly or impliedly affirmed in the policy itself, or by reference to some preliminary or collateral statement, renders the policy void from the beginning, or, if the statement is promissory, from the time of the breach." A discussion of this question of divisibility in which a cloud of cases are cited and discussed is to be found in Southern F. Ins. Co. v. Knight, 111 Ga. 622, 52 L.R.A. 70, 78 Am. St. Rep. 216, 36 S. E. 821, from which we quote: "The policy sued on in the present case insured both the stock of goods and the building in which it was contained. The premium due upon the policy was a gross sum. The question arises, therefore, whether the breach of a warranty relating solely to the goods, and which precluded a recovery for their loss, would also bar a recovery for the loss of the building. The stipulation prescribing that the insured must take an inventory of his stock provides that, in case of failure so to do, 'this policy shall be null and void.' What was the intention of the parties with respect to the question just above stated? If this intention is to be derived from the language used, and it must be, it would seem to be clear that the contract was entire and indivisible, and that the breach of a condition which would work a forfeiture would avoid the entire policy, and not simply a portion thereof. The parties contracted that 'the policy' should be void in case of failure to comply with the iron-safe clause. The policy embraces insurance upon both the building and its contents, and the premium is payable in a gross sum. 'If the consideration to be paid is single and entire, the contract must be held to be entire, although the subject of the contract may consist of several distinct and wholly independent items.' 2 Parsons, Contr. 519. It was competent for the parties to make two separate and distinct contracts,—one covering the goods, and the other the building,—but they did not see proper to do this. They combined the two, and made the consideration moving towards the insurer a gross sum. They further provided that the contract, not a part of it, should be void under certain conditions. It may perhaps seem to be unreasonable that simply for a failure to take an inventory of the stock of goods the plaintiffs should be precluded from recovering the value of the building. But this does not affect the question. The question is, What have they agreed upon? If there was any room to doubt as to the intention of the parties, that construction which is most reasonable and most consonant with justice would be applied. But there is none. The parties have deliberately chosen to enter into an agreement whereby the policy shall be forfeited if the insured fails to do certain things, and he has failed to comply with his agreement. In such a case there is but one thing for the courts to do, and that is to enforce the agreement as made. The question as to whether a policy of insurance such as is involved in the present case constitutes a separable or an entire contract is no new question. It has been the subject of numerous decisions by the courts in this country, and they are in hopeless and irreconcilable conflict. The weight of authority is to the effect that the contract is entire, and that the breach of a warranty which relates solely to one class of property will avoid the entire policy if the contract so provides. Text writers of great learning and ability have, after reviewing the decisions on both sides of this question, reached the conclusion that the contract is indivisible. We quote the following from 1 Wood, Fire Ins. p. 384: 'It is difficult to understand how it can be held that these contracts are several, when a gross premium is paid for the entire insurance. The court cannot say as a matter of law, neither can the fact be shown, that the insurer would have been satisfied to take the risk separately at the same premium. By consenting to pay a gross premium for the insurance, the assured has signified his willingness to let the policy stand as an entire contract, subject in all its parts to the conditions imposed by the insurer; and there is neither reason nor equity in permitting the assured, after he has violated one of the conditions of the policy as to a part of the risk, to turn around and say that this condition only affected that portion of the risk to which the breach related.' Mr. Ostrander, after an elaborate review of the decisions, reaches the conclusion that those which hold the contract to be entire announce the sounder and better rule. Ostrander, Fire Ins. §§ 23 et seq. See also 2 Joyce, Ins. § 1931; 1 May, Ins. § 277. In support of the views herein announced, we find the courts of last resort of Maine, Wisconsin, Maryland, Minnesota, Virginia, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Michigan, Indiana, Arkansas, Iowa, Alabama, and Connecticut. It would not be profitable here to do more than cite the decisions of these courts. Reduced to their last analyses, they simply hold that the premium, being for a gross sum, evidences an intention on the part of the parties that the contract should be treated as entire, and that the intention of the parties, when ascertained, must be enforced. Co. 57 Conn. 335, 4 L.R.A. 759, 17 Atl. 930, 18 Atl. 324. It is true that none of the cases above cited dealt with a breach of the iron-safe clause, but in many of them the condition in the policy which was violated had no more connection with the property for which a recovery was sought than does the iron-safe clause to the building insured by the policy herein involved. In principle the cases are exactly in point. Opposed to this view are decisions of the courts of last resort of Nebraska, Colorado, Kansas, and Missouri. See State Ins. Co. v. Schreck, 27 Neb. 527, 6 L.R.A. 524, 20 Am. St. Rep. 696, 43 N. W. 340; German Ins. Co. v. Fairbank, 32 Neb. 750, 29 Am. St. Rep. 459, 49 N. W. 711; Firemen's Fund Ins. Co. v. Barker, 6 Colo. App. 535, 41 Pac. 513; German Ins. Co. v. York, 48 Kan. 488, 30 Am. St. Rep. 313, 29 Pac. 586; Kansas Farmers' F. Ins. Co. v. Saindon, 53 Kan. 623, 36 Pac. 983; Loehner v. Home Mut. Ins. Co. 17 Mo. 247; Trabue v. Dwelling House Ins. Co. 121 Mo. 75, 23 L.R.A. 719, 42 Am. St. Rep. 523, 25 S. W. 848. The courts of New York and Indiana seem to have been at different times on both sides of the question now under consideration. Smith v. Empire Ins. Co. 25 Barb. 497; Kiernan v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 81 Hun, 373, 30 N. Y. Supp. 892; Merrill v. Agricultural Ins. Co. 73 N. Y. 452, 29 Am. Rep. 184; Pratt v. Dwelling House Mut. F. Ins. Co. 130 N. Y. 206, 29 N. E. 117; Havens v. Home Ins. Co. 111 Ind. 90, 60 Am. Rep. 689, 12 N. E. 137; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Pickel, 119 Ind. 155, 12 Am. St. Rep. 393, 21 N. E. 546." Our own case above cited is exactly in point. Mr. Justice Cobb concludes a learned and convincing opinion as follows: "Our conclusion is that where an insurance policy is issued in consideration of a gross premium, and provides that the policy shall be void in the event of a breach of a certain condition therein named, and this condition is broken, no recovery can be had on the policy, though separate classes of property are therein insured, and though the stipulation violated relates solely to a matter which could have connection with but one of these classes." And after all, when a policy provides that a breach of warranty shall render the policy void, what necessity or justification can there be for splitting hairs to make it a different contract than its unmistakable and unequivocal language clearly imports, thereby making a new contract for the parties; and especially can this be said in a case where, as in this, the parties have expressly said in writing that the entire policy shall be void. Will we apply the general rule of construction that a contract should be so construed as to give effect to all its language if it can be consistently done? And, if not, why not? What reason can be given for eliminating that word "all" from the contract? Indeed, the only reason for putting it in would seem to be to make assurance doubly sure, for ordinarily a provision that a written contract should be void would be construed to mean the entire contract. That is the natural and popular meaning which our statute (1 Comp. Laws, § 50) says shall be the rule of construction as to statutes. Why not as to contracts? It would be difficult to suggest language that could safely be relied on to express such intent if that used here does not.

For the reasons above given, I am of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed with costs of both courts and without a new trial; it being apparent that the plaintiff cannot recover a verdict on this policy.

UNITED STATES MORTGAGE & TRUST COMPANY, Resp't.

(208 N. Y. 218, 101 N. E. 871.)

Bank — payment of forged check — negligence in auditing account.

A bank depositor whose clerk has charge of the account is negligent in comparing only the vouchers returned to him when his account is balanced from time to time without looking at the check list or the balance in the pass book, so that, in case checks have been forged by his clerk, and the vouchers withdrawn from the package and destroyed before the genuine ones are delivered to him, which he does not discover, he cannot charge the bank with the loss if it was not negligent in paying the checks.

(April 22, 1913.)

APPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, affirming a judgment of a Trial Term for Jefferson County in defendant's favor, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover an amount paid by defendant on certain forged checks drawn in plaintiffs' name and charged to their account. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

I. Scope.

The present note is not concerned with the duty generally of a depositor to notify the bank of errors, or charges to his account upon forged checks, independently of his duty to examine his pass book and vouchers. That is, the rights and liabilities of the parties in case the depositor has discovered some error or irregular charge and has failed to notify the bank thereof are not discussed.

As to loss or prejudice to bank resulting from negligent failure on part of depositor or correspondent bank to give prompt notice of forgery, as a condition of its right to charge forged checks to latter's account, see note to McNeely Co. v. Bank of North America, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 79.

Neither is the duty of the depositor to examine his account apart from an examination of the pass book and vouchers considered. This class of cases is illustrated by Laborde v. Consolidated Asso. 4 Rob. (La.) 190, 39 Am. Dec. 517, where the failure of the depositor to at once investigate the state of his account with his bank when he was informed that it was overdrawn, where it appeared manifest from the bank book that the overdraft was not occasioned by the payment of the forged check, was held not to preclude the depositor from recovering of the bank where, within a few hours from the time his pass book was balanced and handed to him, together with the canceled check, he returned them to the bank and pointed out the spurious check.

As to the payment by bank of checks fraudulently raised by employee of drawer, see note to Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 529.

II. In general.

a. Doctrine that an examination is required.

1. In general.

That a duty rests upon a depositor to make at least some examination of his account as shown by the pass book and vouchers, to detect forgeries, alterations, or fraudulent charges, is sustained by the L.R.A.1916D.

Mr. Martin A. Schenck, with Messrs. Lexow, Mackellar, & Wells, for appellants:

The question of plaintiffs' negligence in the examination of their accounts was for the jury.
